

AP
4
A16++

The date shows when this volume was taken.
To renew this book copy the call No. and give to the librarian.

HOME USE RULES.

All Books subject to Recall.

Books not used for instruction or research are returnable within 4 weeks.

Volumes of periodicals and of pamphlets are held in the library
as much as possible.
For special purposes they are given out for a limited time.

Borrowers should not use their library privileges for the benefit of other persons.

Books not needed during recess periods should be returned to the library, or arrangements made for their return during borrower's absence, if wanted.

Books needed by more than one person are held on the reserve list.

Books of special value and gift books, when the giver wishes it, are not allowed to circulate.

Readers are asked to report all cases of books marked or mutilated.

Do not deface books by marks and writing.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

3 1924 066 328 216

THE ACADEMY,
November 13, 1909

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE
1909

VOLUME LXXVI

PUBLISHING OFFICE
63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

1909

T

AP
4
A16++

1.240276

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXXVI.

ARTICLES

	PAGE
"Academy" and the "Daily News," The	891
"Academy" and the "Evening Standard," The	917
Accent and Quantity	798
Adventure	181
Adventures Among the Publishers	155
Allen, James Lane	800
April	31
Archer and Hankin	678
Archer's Two Guineas, Mr.	871 and 894
Ardnamont Mystery Solved, The	968
Asquith and Anarchy	797
Author's Post Bag, An	208
Beauty	631
Burlington House	55, 81, 103
Canon Cleworth	112
Censorship and Common-sense, The	245
Cerberus in the House	221
Cocoa and the Censor	173
Coffin-side Verses	749
Collins's "Ode to Evening"	205
Commercial Muse, The	54
Common Sky, The	818
Conversationalist, The	836
Cornhill Poet, A	869
Cornish Bay, A	973
Counsel and Retrogression, The	630
Country Life, The	182
Dance and Music	86
Deinon to Thely	660
Discovery of Fairyland, A	633
Doubtful Affair, A	230
Dreadnoughts	941
Dreamer, The	38
Drink Question, The	62
"Electra" at Milan	40
End of June, The	254
February and its Saint	778
Field, The	924
German Forerunners of J. S. Bach, The	663
Hardy, Thomas	829
How the Law Favours Women	61
In the Time of Lilies	783
Israel, Joseph: An Appreciation	41
Italian Backgrounds	223 and 253
January	681
June	207
Letters from "Tay Pay"	727
Liverpool and the Poets	725
Lost Vocabulary, The	654
Machine in Modern Music, The	611
Mackenzie Bell and Watts-Dunton	775
Material Delight of Books, The	688
May	110
Meredith, George	126 and 730
Meredith, George, Poet	752
Mere Nervous Degenerates	125
Milton and Dr. Johnson	975
Morar Bheanachie	710
Murder of John Davidson, The	77
Naval Crisis, The	918
"Old Firm" in Publishing, The	10
Outdoor Breviary, An 16, 808, 854, 877, 949
Piercing Cries of Mr. Pearson, The	943
Poe and Baltimore	729
Poetry and Demos	198
Poetry of Oscar Wilde, The	702
Poor Burge	183
Poppycock and Snigs	847
Prize Patriotism	773
Publishers' Advertisements	222
Punch and "Rudy"	657
Problem and a Suggestion, A	218
Reach-me-down Lucas	632
Reflection of Realism, A	656

ARTICLES—continued.

	PAGE
Ronsard's "Mary, Queen of Scots"	974
Rosebery, Morley and Co.	197
Rustic Memoir, A	759
Rustic Religion	736
"Savage and Tartary"	102
Sense of Humour, The	106
Shaw's Obituary, Mr.	677
Sins of the "Saturday," The	174
Sleep	950
Socialist in Oxford, The	967
Some Old-fashioned Children's Books	79
"Sphere" and the Bubble, The	821
"Star" Comes of Age, The	704
"Star" Turn, The	29
Suffragist Parliament, The	629
Sweet Contemporaries, Our	965
Swift, Jonathan	776
Swinburne, Algernon Charles	5
Swinburne as a Metriician	32
Swinburne's Prose	7
Sycorax at Knightsbridge	149
Tennyson, Poe. and Shaw	703
"These Three"	128
"Through a Glass Darkly"	246
Tono Wells	845
"T. P." the Monopolist	750
True Simplicity, On	876
Twilight of the Poets, The	229
Waves	181
Whiteley's at the Comedy	680

BOOKS RECEIVED

Pages 643, 667, 691, 715, 739, 763, 787, 811, 835, 858, 883, 907, 927, 953, 978, 19, 67, 91, 115, 139, 163, 187, 211, 235, 260.

CORRESPONDENCE

Pages 643, 666, 689, 712, 738, 761, 784, 810, 833, 856, 881, 903, 928, 951, 976, 18, 65, 90, 114, 137, 159, 185, 210, 232, 257.

ETYMOLOGY

Pages 689, 760, 879, 925, 88, 113, 158, 206

LIFE AND LETTERS

Pages 627, 651, 675, 699, 723, 747, 771, 795, 819, 843, 867, 891, 915, 939, 963, 3, 27, 51, 75, 99, 123, 147, 171, 195, 219, 243.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

Pages 711, 809, 879, 902, 925, 17, 42, 64, 88, 113, 136, 158, 231, 254
--

POETRY

Angela, Olive Douglas	917
Bonchurch, April 15, 1909. T. W. H. C.	5
Candle-Light, Olive Douglas	773
Charmed Pool, The. M. Jourdain	125
Daffodil Dawn, Olive Douglas	917
Days of the Halcyons, The. M. Jourdain	911
Dead Sailor, The. M. Jourdain	629
Dedication, A. A. D.	845
End of the Day, The. A. G. H.	101
Goldfinch, The. Pamela Tennant	893
Goose-Boy, The. S. S.	173
Horace, M. Jourdain	845
Hush—On this One Evening	749
Hyalanthus, Olive Douglas	54
In the Park	725
In the South, Olive Douglas	51
Le Récit de Cornil, M. Jourdain	77
Magic Orchard, M. Jourdain	677
Ninth Symphony, The. J. V. C.	155
Pageant, The. S. S.	197

POETRY—continued

	PAGE
Poet, The. A. D.	965
Ransomed, The. A. D.	29
Sonnet, M. Jourdain	173
Sonnet, Olive Douglas	869
Sonnet, S. S.	221
Tithonus, M. Jourdain	701
To Francis Thompson, W. G. F.	653
To Sestius, M. Jourdain	797
Travellers, The. S. S.	245
Villon, S. S.	119
"Votes for Women" T. W. H. C.	831

REVIEWS

	PAGE
Achamians of Aristophanes, The. With Introduction, Critical Notes and Commentary. W. Rennie	969
Actress, The. Louise Closser Hale	252
Adventure in Exile, An. Richard Duffy	15
Adventures of Louis Blake, The. Louis Becke	806
Æneas Silvius, William Boulting	755
Æchylus in English Verse. Part III. A. S. Way, D.Lit.	779
Alcun Club Collections XII. Pontifical Services, Vol. IV. Athelstan Riley, M.A.	805
Americans: An Impression. A. Francis	150
Annals of Tacitus, The. Translated by G. G. Ramsay	260
Araminta, J. C. Sneath	781
Arrows in the Dark. Sophie Cole	971
Art of Hunting, The. W. Twiss	36
Awakening of Turkey, The. E. F. Knight	201
Banzai, Parabellum	923
Baronet's Wife, The. Florence Warden	686
Bridge Builders and Other Poems, The. H. Johnson	640
British Mountaineering. C. E. Benson	828
Burden Bearer, The. Francis Howard Williams	660
Canon's Dilemma, The. V. L. Whitechurch	922
Capture of Paul Beck, The. M. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C.	686
Charlotte Mary Young, Ethel Romanes	782
Chippendales, The. Robert Grant	225
Church and Chieftain, For. May Wynne	14
Church Principles for Christians, J. Hammond, L.L.B.	756
Church Teaching for Church Children. Rev. J. N. Newland-Smith	828
Christmas Songs and Carols. Agnes H. Begbil	638
City of Jerusalem, The. Col. C. R. Conder	133
City of the Golden Gate, The. E. Everett-Green	832
Comedy of Ambition, A. A. Gowans	85
Whyte	86
Concerning Himself, V. L. Whitechurch	252
Counsels and Precepts, From the French of Mgr. C. Gay	923
Craft of Venerary, The. Edited by Miss Dryden	36
Cry on the Mountain, and Other Poems. The. J. A. Mackreth	659
Davina, Frances G. Burnester	135
Day Dreams of Greece. C. W. Stork	641
Did She Do Right? A. J. Macdonnell	832
Dramatic Odes and Rhapsodies. F. P. B. Osmaston	660
Dream—and the Woman, The. Tom Gallon	832

REVIEWS—continued.

Dromina. John Ayscough	946
Dukedom of Portsea, The. Alice Maud Meadows	875
Early Christian Hymns. Translated by D. J. Donahoe	84
Education of the Will, The. T. Sharper Knowlson	133
Elizabeth Davenay. Claire de Pratz	135
Elizabeth Visits America. Elinor Glyn	227
Eliza Brightwen: The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson	972
End and the Beginning, The. Cosmo Hamilton	972
England and the English, from an American Point of View. P. Collier	150
Essays on Literature. Edward Caird	970
Every Man a King. Orison Swett Marden	708
Experiences of Cyprus, My. Basil Stewart	707
Faith and Works of Christian Science, The. The Writer of Confesio Medici	131
Faith of His Fathers, The. A. E. Jacob	734
Family of Influence, A. W. H. Williamson	204
Fancy O'Brien. Ella Macmahon	203
Fatality. G. G. Chatterton	710
Fault, The. C. T. Podmore	783
Fifty Years of It. The Rt. Hon. Sir J. H. A. Macdonald	132
Flashes from the Orient. John Haselhurst	639
Flower of the World. Mrs. Henry Tippett	687
Flying Months, The. Francis M. Peard	58
Forsaken Garden, A. Jessie Ainsworth Davis	947
General Lee: Man and Soldier. Thomas Nelson Page	829
Geoffrey Cheriton. John Barnett	875
Gervase. Mabel Deamer	61
God With Us. W. R. Boyce Gibson, M.A.	900
Gramercy-Park, Mrs. A. R. Goring-Thomas	179
Greater Love, The. Anna McClure Sholl	759
Great Masters of Dutch and Flemish Painting, The. W. Bode. Translated by Margaret L. Clarke	732
Green Curve, The. "Ole Luk-Oie."	37
Gay Paradises, The. Mrs. Stephen Batson	203
Heart of a Gypsy, The. Rosamond Napier	807
Heart of Scotland, The. Painted by Sutton Palmer. Described by A. R. Hope-Moncrieff	59
Haliburton, Lord: A Memoir of His Public Service. J. B. Atlay	757
High Life in the Far East. James Dalziel	710
History of Art, A. Dr. G. Carotti	60
Holborn Hill. Christian Tearle	85
Hugo of Arendon. E. L. M.	659
Idealism as a Practical Creed. Henry Jones. LL.D., D.Litt.	177
Ideas of a Plain Country-woman	16
Infamous John Friend, The. R. S. Garnett	109
Inns of Court. Painted by Gordon Home. Described by Cecil Headlam	204
Isle of Lies, The. M. P. Shiel	709
Julian Revelstone. Justin McCarthy	759
Key of Life, The. A. A. Methley	947
King in Yellow, The. Robert Chambers	252
Laurus Nobilis: Chapters on Art and Life. Vernon Lee	250
Lausanne. Painted by J. Hardwicke Lewis and May Hardwicke Lewis. Described by Francis Gribble	946

REVIEWS—continued.

Leaves of the Lower Branch; the Attorney in Life and Letters. E. B. V. Christian	179
Leveller, The. Alexander McArthur	853
Life's Enigma. M. Brada	638
Life of Canon Fleming. Arthur Finlayson	13
Lil of the Slums. "Dick Donovan."	853
Links in the Chain. Headon Hill	832
Love and a Woman. Charlotte Mansfield	686
Love and Battles. Frank Sidgwick	947
Love as Pedlar and other Verses. Lady Alice Ayre	638
Love of Eros, The. Vaughan Grey	640
Love That Kills, The. Coralie Stanton	758
and Heath Hoeken
Living Chalice and Other Poems, The. Susan L. Mitchell	638
Lucius Scarfield. J. A. Revermort	807
Madrid. A. F. Calvert	897
Malaria and Greek History. W. H. S. Jones	56
Man's Vengeance and Other Poems, A. George Barlow	639
Manual of Occasional Offices for the Use of the Clergy. The Rev. J. L. Saywell	226
Maurice Masterlinck. Gerard Harry	252
Measure of Our Youth, The. Alice Herbert	806
Memories of Famous Trials, The Rev. E. Burnaby	636
Merry Heart, The. Frank A. Swinerton	902
Military Needs and Military Policy. The Rt. Hon. H. O. Arnold-Foster	899
Mockers, The. Jane Barlow	639
Modern Goddess, A. Gertrude M. Savery	109
Moran of Kildally. Lauchlan Maclean Watt	59
Motor Tours in Yorkshire. Mrs. Rodolph Stawell	945
Much Ado About Something. C. E. Lawrence	109
National Songs and Some Ballads. Harold Bolton	639
Natural Monopolies in Relation to Social Democracy. Charles Darwent Smith	898
Nature Poems. W. H. Davis	659
Netta. Fred M. White	179
New June, The. Henry Newbolt	902
Old Beliefs and Modern Believers. Percy Ansley Ellis	827
Old London. Walter L. McNay	758
Olive in Italy. Moray Dalton	15
One Immortality, H. Fielding Hall	736
Opinions on Men, Women and Things. Harry Quilter	920
Ornaments, Rubric and Modifications of the Existing Law Relating to the Conduct of Divine Service, The. 176, 849.	919
Our Little Town. Charles Lee	251
Panama Canal and its Makers, The. Vaughan Cornish	921
Pan-Worship, and Other Poems. Eleanor Farjeon	660
Perjurer, The. W. E. Norris	154
Poems. Evelyn Moore	659
Poems. J. Griffith Fairfax	640
Pomp and Circumstance. Dorothea Gerard	901
Pools of Silence, The. H. de Vere Stacpoole	927
Powder and Patches. Vera Canute	660
Prince Karl. A. C. Gunter	781
Prince's Franks, The. Charles Lowe	875
Psyche, and Other Poems. John Garth	859
Psychic Philosophy as the Foundation of a Religion of Natural Law. V. C. Desertis	851
Psyche's Task. J. G. Frazer	896

REVIEWS—continued.

Psychology and Crime. Hugo Munsterberg	57
Question of Means, A. Margaret B. Cross	781
Redvers Buller, Sir. Lewis Butler	130
Reginald Peacock's Book of Faith	12
Religion of the Common Man, The. Sir H. Wilson	707
Render unto Caesar. Mrs. Vere Campbell	38
Richmondshire. Edmond Bogg	637
Romance of a Nun, The. Alix King	58
Round the Lake Country. The Rev. H. D. Rawnsley	228
Royal Palaces of Spain. A. F. Calvert	918
Rustic Choir, The. A. R. Throckley	640
Salome and the Head. E. Nesbit	948
Samson Unshorn. Reginald Turner	154
Samuel Pepys. Percy Lubbock	83
School of Madrid, The. A. de Bernete Y. Moret	225
Seekers. Frank Savile	852
Sense of the Infinite, The. Oscar Kuhns	36
Short History of the English Stage, A. Side-Tracks and Bridle-Paths. Lionel James	59
Silent Ones, The. Mary Gaunt and J. Ridgwell Essex	783
Sixpenny Pieces. A. Neil Lyons	204
Six Oxford Thinkers. Algernon Cecil	108
Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. W. Warde Fowler	873
Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology. S. Schechter	914
Someone Pays. Noel Barwell	853
Songs Without Music. F. G. Attenborough	639
Songs of Manhood. F. B. Wood	640
Stairway of Honour, The. Maud S. Rawson	14
Stormy Petrel, The. L. T. Meade	736
Story of Pisa, The. Janet Ross and Nelly Erichsen	830
Story of Thyrsas, The. Alice Brown	110
Sunburnt South, The. Francis Carey Slater	709
Tales of John Oliver Hobbes, The	81
Tears of Desire, The. Coralie Stanton	135
and Heath Hoeken
Teresa. Edith Ayrton Zangwill	923
Terror of the Macdoughs, The. C. E. Playne	901
Trade and Tariffs. John M. Robertson	781
Trials of a Country Parson, The. Augustus Jessop	833
Two Goodwins, The. R. Murray Gilchrist	735
Unbeloved, The. Ethel Hill	807
Under Petraia, With Some Saunterings. By the author of "In a Tuscan Garden."	780
University Administration. Charles W. Eliot	850
Ways of Men, The. Herbert Flowerdew	687
Wax. George Somes Layard	972
Wander Years, The. J. H. Yorall	874
What Woman Wills. Lucas Cleere	687
Wheel Magic. J. W. Allen	227
Where Every Prospect Pleases. Edmund Francis Sellar	155
William Morris. Alfred Noyes	684
Wooden Horse, The. Hugh Walpole	186
Women's Looking-Glass. Constance Evan Jones	38

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

Pages 928, 954, 979.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

Pages 634, 658, 682, 706, 804

LOVE AND MALCOMBON LIMITED
PRINTERS,
LONDON AND REDHILL.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1913

JANUARY 2, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"He prides himself on the fact that he is a bard and terrible hater. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonere believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thighed scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonere goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

'A fœdus sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His votaresses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonere steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice.

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a sour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonere to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S WINTER EXHIBITION of PORTRAITS and LANDSCAPES by Early British Masters is NOW OPEN.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON. (UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education—J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor of Education (Head of the Department).
Ethics—Rev. A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt. D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy.
Psychology—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, M.A., Lecturer.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, or the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year if paid in advance, or Eight Guineas per Term (Three Terms in the Year).—Application should be made to Prof. ADAMSON, King's College, Strand, W.C.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature, or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO. BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.

BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).

37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6 Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/- is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. RYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

KING ALFRED'S JEWEL

A THREE ACT DRAMA IN BLANK VERSE

With Coloured Frontispiece reproducing the Jewel now in keeping at Oxford in the Ashmolean Museum

Cr. 8vo. 5/- net.

"The living Alfred lives in this gracious play, for the author has woven his own words into his speech and fashioned his great spirit out of the mist of time. . . . The charm of the play is in its simple style, its delicate poetry, and its melodious songs. . . . There is also a rousing battle chorus which calls aloud for crashing music."
—James Douglas in "The Star"

"Written with a charming delicacy of style, and contains several melodious songs. King Alfred's noble and vigorous character is limned with great skill, while Elfreda flits through the play like a woodland fairy."
—"Glasgow News"

"This beautiful little volume . . . will appeal to patriotism and to poetry on both sides of the Atlantic."
—"Observer"

"It realises in simple but effective fashion that early world when men's hearts could be stirred by a tale, and it has some of the grace of 'As You Like It.' . . . The verse and lyrics are alike good, and the whole play is a worthy study of the great king."
—"Glasgow Herald"

JOHN LANE · PUBLISHER · THE BODLEY HEAD

Mr. EVELEIGH NASH'S NEW BOOKS

I. A NEW LIFE OF THE EMPRESS EUGENIE.

The Life of an Empress.

By FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE, Author of "Women of the Second Empire." Illustrated. 15s. net.

"* Every woman should read this engrossing story of one of the most fascinating personalities of modern times. It is the most complete life yet published of the EMPRESS EUGENIE, and the author presents her as she walked in beauty, the brightest star of her brilliant Court, with a magic vividness which takes us back to the great days of the SECOND EMPIRE."

II. A WINTER-NIGHT BOOK.

The Book of Witches.

By O. M. HUEFFER. With Coloured Frontispiece by W. Heath Robinson. 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Hueffer has chosen a fascinating topic . . . and, what is more, he has treated his topic in a fascinating manner."—TRUTH.
"Exceedingly good reading."—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

III. A POPULAR BOOK ON A NATIONAL SUBJECT.

The English House.

HOW TO JUDGE ITS PERIODS AND STYLES.
By W. SHAW SPARROW, Author of "Old England," etc. Profusely Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

"A fascinating work . . . ought to be eagerly read."—THE GLOBE.
"The book is one that we can heartily recommend."—THE ESTATES GAZETTE.

IV. A NEW BOOK BY H. BELLOC.

The Eye-Witness.

By H. BELLOC. 5s. net.

"A book of great cleverness."—THE EVENING STANDARD.
"The Eye-Witness" is full of imagination and good writing."—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

V. A BEAR IN A THOUSAND I

Joseph: A Dancing Bear—Some Chapters from his Autobiography:

By JOHN BARNETT. With Illustrations by L. Leslie Brooke. 6s.

"No other bear has ever drawn us so closely to his heart; Joseph is a person whom it is a privilege to know. . . . The book is really amusing, and is told with the sly humour which is one of Joseph's most endearing qualities."—THE PAUL MALL GAZETTE.

VI. A BEDSIDE BOOK.

Sayings from the Saints.

Collected by ANNIE MATHESON. Pocket size. Cloth 2s. 6d. net, leather 3s. 6d. net.

"A very suitable gift-book for lovers of devotional literature"—THE GLOBE.

VII. A THRILLING GHOST BOOK.

Some Haunted Houses of England and Wales.

By ELLIOTT O'DONNELL. 2s. 6d. net.

"One of the most gruesome collections of ghost stories on record."—THE OBSERVER.

EVELEIGH NASH
LONDON

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 627	The Way of the World . . . 634
The Dead Sailor . . . 629	The Parson at the Bar . . . 636
The Suffragist Parliament . . . 629	A Yorkshire "County" . . . 637
The Counsel of Retrogression . . . 630	Snow 638
Beauty 631	The Machine in Modern Music 641
Reach-me-down Lucas . . . 632	Correspondence . . . 643
A Discovery of Fairyland . . . 633	Books Received . . . 643

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Duchess of Sutherland has probably considerable ground of complaint against the Evening News. For on Tuesday last, under the head of "Sayings of the Day," that organ attributed to her Grace the following words:

We live in a transition period; the old days of patronage and of the rich being kind to the poor are coming to an end.

Without its context this bald passage might help people to conclusions about the views of the Duchess of Sutherland which would not be of the pleasantest. "The days of patronage and of the rich being kind to the poor" are not coming to an end. "The days of patronage" may be coming to an end, but the day when the rich will cease to be kind to the poor is very far distant, and it does not become Duchesses or other fortunately-placed, and presumably rich, persons to herald it with trumpets. The only business in life of him or her who possesses is to give, which is a blessed act. When the rich cease to be kind to the poor the rich will cease to be worth a moment's consideration, or a moment's mercy. We are aware that there is in existence a type of rich person who professes to look upon "charity" as a harmful and degrading thing, and who buttons up his pocket and makes his heart as a flint, all for the moral benefit of the indigent. When this kind of rich person wishes to salve his conscience he sends a cheque for half a guinea to some hide-bound charitable organisation, which can be warranted to keep a starving man filling up forms and producing certificates of character for weeks on end before he will be advanced so much as a shilling. The rich need no charity organisation, and the poor need no characters. The fact of their poverty should be character enough for any reasonable being. Despite the Duchess of Sutherland, our advice to rich people is that they should give continually and without any other than ordinary discrimination. The cant about "deserving cases" is sheer cant. If you have superfluous money, give it away, and make a point of giving it to the poor. One hears continuously of misdirected charity. We should like to wager that the sum total of the money given away in the course of a year in England by rich people to poor people who don't deserve it would be as a molehill to a mountain compared with the sums which the rich will spend in a year on gegaws for the rich, who don't need them. The wealthy humbug who will spend fifty pounds on a diamond brooch to present to the bride of some young gentleman richer than himself omits to give the battered and, it may be, gin-sodden match-seller, with a babe in her arms, a shilling, on the grounds that she is probably undeserving. This is absolutely the wrong principle. If all of us, rich and poor, received only what we deserve, the rich amongst us, at any rate, would receive a great deal less. Let the Duchess of Sutherland follow the dictates of her heart, and let her be most careful not to follow or suggest that other people should follow the stupid exhortations of the curmudgeon.

We have received the appended letter from that wonderful poetess, Miss Acadia Panter:

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—My attention has been called to an unwarrantable attack upon me appearing in THE ACADEMY of December 26th regarding my Sonnet on Milton, published in The Outlook of December 12th. First, I will demand why your critic presumes to insinuate to your readers (after suddenly breaking off his quotation from my sonnet, which, by the way, was not sent to him for review) that "Modesty compels me not to proceed further," thereby implying that my verse contains something offensive to decency? Is not this a striking instance of libel by implication? I protest against this grave libel. I regret the absence of poetic perception in your critic when he asks, "Will no one tell us what she sings?" concerning these lines:

"Then climb didst loftiest where Olympus' mount sublime
Cradleth the clouds, and Morn's child sunbeams leap!"

I will instruct Ignorance as follows:—Milton, I here suggest by imagery, soared in the later period of his career as a poet, even above his earlier exquisite verse-power, into regions of a diviner sublimity, where he mentally beheld, springing from the Cloud-mystery of Eternity, the young Morn of Time in Eden, as pictured by him so fresh and fair.

I trust this definition of my meaning will not overmount your critic's understanding! Then he carps at a plus in the tenth line. Here, unfortunately for his pre-eminence as a critic, he shows an astonishing ignorance of technique, the most simple of the art of poetry. One of the greatest effects of ease in versification is obtained by the appropriate use of the plus or minus in the line. Is he quite unaware that Shakespeare, Wordsworth, and others of our greatest sonneteers use frequently either the one or other to fortify or smooth the cadence of their measures?

Lastly, I take serious objection to the word "graceless" as employed by him in his attack on me. The dictionary meaning for that word is "abandoned," "profligate." For the entirety of these libellous statements I must request a public apology from you, to be inserted in your paper, and also in the Outlook.—Yours faithfully,

L. L. ACADIA PANTER.

Miss Panter is clever enough to save us a great deal of trouble. Her letter speaks for itself. We do not suppose for a moment that anybody in his senses would be able to construe our phrase about "modesty" into a suggestion that Miss Panter's "sonnet" contained "something offensive to decency." We refrained from quoting the whole of her "sonnet" for very simple reasons, not unconnected with the law of copyright. We should be sorry if any foolish person, not even forgetting Miss Panter herself, should misconstrue what we said. And we shall be pleased to express this sorrow in The Outlook at the cost and charge of the editor of that journal as soon as he, on his part, expresses the regrets which he owes to his readers for having foisted on them such an uncouth piece of work as Miss Panter's fourteen lines of German-English.

And this brings us to a far more serious case. Some weeks ago we had occasion to notice what we can only describe as a distinct failure in the matter of critical sagacity on the part of Mr. W. L. Courtney, who, it will be remembered, devoted a column and a half of the valuable space of the Daily Telegraph to a flowery appreciation of Miss Maud Allan's fribbling book, "My Life and Dancing." As we pointed out at the time, Mr. Courtney rounded off his foolish pæan by misquoting one of the most familiar tags in Wordsworth, an offence which would have been shocking in a schoolboy, and is quite unpardonable in a person of Mr. Courtney's presumed literary consequence. Among other literary offices, Mr. Courtney edits The Fortnightly Review, and he has just issued a number of that review for January. It contains a poem initialled "W. L. C.," from which we take the following stanzas:

How shall we pay the debt we owe
To the God who ordains the tribute just?
How can the creatures that are but dust
Give of their fulness, or out of their woe,
To the Primal Fate who arranges it so
Not as we will it, but as we must?
* * *

How shall he pay it, old and grey,
Whose feet just skirt an open grave?
Little enough has he managed to save
From the dolorous toil of every day—
Little enough! He can but repay
His life, his life, to the God who gave.

Our opinion of Miss Maud Allan's literary abilities is not an exalted opinion. But we imagine that if she were put to it seriously she could write a better poem than this of "W. L. C.'s," and we assert that we have here still another case of an editor printing verses which lack the distinction one has a right to expect in poetry appearing in a literary organ of supposed weight and importance. Mr. Courtney's effort has just one good point about it—namely, that it enables us to conclude by implication that the editor of The Fortnightly Review has not gone over to the camp of literary atheism. On this fact we may congratulate both himself and his readers; and we do so sincerely.

Yet in another part of the field, as it were, we find Mr. Courtney publishing a seventeen-page article, entitled speciously "The New Poetry." Now, an article so named is obviously calculated to excite the anticipations. And there are people in the world who, observing such a title on the cover of The Fortnightly, would be provoked to buy and peruse. But, unfortunately for itself, The Fortnightly prints on its cover opposite the article the name of the author, which is the name of a gentleman who has been wont to describe himself in Who's Who as "literary editor of the Daily Mail." So that the wise know exactly what to expect, nor will they be disappointed.

"The New Poetry," if you please, consists simply and solely of an impudent puff of the poetical works of none other than the "tousy tyke." We use the words "impudent" and "puff" advisedly. That there may be no mistake as to the sense in which we employ these words, we will set forward their meaning as stated in the nearest dictionary, which happens to be Chambers's:

IMPUDENT: Wanting shame or modesty, brazen-faced.
PUFF: An exaggerated expression of praise.

We contend that nothing in the way of critical writing could be more shameless or brazen-faced than the following "gems of critical appreciation" by the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail:

"To destroy this unfit world, and make it over again in my own image"—that is the task Mr. Davidson has set for himself, and it is essentially a religious task. We desire to invite from serious people—if, indeed, it be necessary—a patient respect and attention for this utterance.

We should grievously misrepresent Mr. Davidson, however, if we presumed to show him as a disappointed kicker against the pricks. . . . He is magnificently above complaint.

A world without worship, for example, immediately suggests to the ordinary mind a world without reverence or guiding sense of any kind: a dreadful place. Yet Mr. Davidson means something very different from that; the "knowledge" of his sentence is a deep and high thing, very different from the ordinary man's mere cognisance of things, and includes what the ordinary man would feel when he used the word "worship."

This latter piece of delicate sophistry, by the way, is the comment of the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail on the following words of Mr. Davidson:

We can never know enough that man is the universe capable of self-consciousness, that there is nothing higher than man. This is the knowledge that will change the world.

We are told, further, that "there can be no question of the grandeur of his [Mr. Davidson's] conception of life and the universe; it is immensely stimulating, it is brave, it is inspiring, it is tremendous." The fact that it is also impious and blasphemous, the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail carefully omits to mention.

Now, as to the "puff." We assert that the following statements with regard to the genius of the "tousy tyke" and the beauty of his multifarious small works are so many "exaggerated expressions of praise":

Mr. Davidson is more staple in intellect than Burns was, his mind is far better equipped, and far more powerful; he is more spiritual than Carlyle, and therefore he talks of matter, while Carlyle talked of Spirit—both meaning wonderfully nearly the same thing. Less perfect a poet than Burns, less tremendous an intellectual power than Carlyle, yet of splendid poetic and intellectual endowment, Mr. Davidson completes this triad of Presbyterian Scotland's revolt against the world and Christianity.

[Mr. Davidson's publications] make up a body of work which contains, one would say, every quality of genius that can command attention and following, not from the few, but from the many.

It is literally true of this poet that you cannot open any book of his without finding on the chance page an example of peerless mastery in the use and combination of words, as well as powerful, stimulating, original thought.

As for our poet himself, we certainly do not deem it likely that the Poetic Spirit will again manifest itself in so generous a quality during this century; might the world but realise that, and learn to offer some welcome to that Spirit, when from beyond Time and Space he comes to make sojourn with us, it would be well for the world.

It is notable that, in common with the rest of the "tousy tyke's" champions, the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail does not attempt to substantiate his noble view of our poet's "great Testaments" by quotation of the more idiotic and blasphemous passages in the last of them. If such quotation had been duly and properly made, Mr. Courtney could not very well have printed the article, at any rate side by side with his own poem about the Deity. And thus the "tousy tyke" would have missed his advertisement. As it is, the readers of The Fortnightly Review are, in our opinion, being not quite fairly dealt by. First, in that they are invited to believe that the writings of Mr. Davidson represent "the new poetry"; and, secondly, in that Mr. Davidson's blasphemies are not nailed to the counter, but glossed over and praised with faint and half-hearted damns. We are not astonished that the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail should have committed himself to such a sophisticated and dubious appraisal of a middling poet, but we consider that it is at once amazing and distressing that the editor of The Fortnightly Review should permit him to do it in a journal which lays claim to serious importance. We sympathise with Mr. Courtney to a certain extent, and, as a sort of golden rule for his editorial guidance in the future, let us advise him to be aware of the contributions of persons who have at any time been associated with the Daily Mail. The judgments of such people may be sincerely and honestly intended, but they are bound, in the fundamental nature of things, to be crooked and unsound.

We have received the second number of The English Review, which may be considered notable, inasmuch as it contains a long ballad by Dante Gabriel Rossetti which has not before been published. Here are the first four stanzas:

Full of smoke was the quaint old room
And of pleasant winter-heat;
Whence you might hear the hall-door slap,
And the wary shuffling of feet
Which from the carpeted floor stepped out
Into the ice-paved street.

Van Hunks was laughing in his paunch;
Ten golden pieces rare
Lay in his hand; with neighbour Spratz
He had smoked for a wager there;
He laughed, and from his neighbour's pipe
He looked to his neighbour's chair.

Even as he laughed, the evening shades
Rose stealthily and spread,
Till the smoky clouds walled up the sun
And hid his shining old head,
As though he too had his evening pipe
Before he tumbled to bed.

Van Hunks still chuckled as he sat:
It caused him an inward grin,
When he heard the blast shake shutter and blind
With its teeth-chattering din,
To fancy the many who froze without
While he sat thawing within.

We can well understand that Rossetti himself should not have seen fit to include this ballad in his serious poetical publications, and the persons who have unearthed it for the consideration of a gaping world have a surer eye for the main chance than they can be said to have for the memory of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. For the rest, No. 2 of The English Review is neither better nor worse than No. 1. We have no doubt that there is plenty of "poetry" in existence which has hitherto been considered unpublishable by the eminent hands who wrote it; and people possessed of such stuff may be glad to know that The English Review is apparently prepared to make a market on it.

THE DEAD SAILOR

WOULD I had herded goats upon the brown
Stones where Pan pipes at noonday, and I knew
Cyllene still, and the webbed clouds that strew
Their shadows on her fine-breathed mountain crown,
And o'er Stympthalus. Better are her down,
Rough with grey lavender and clots of thyme,
Her thorn-choked gullies and bright-streaming rime,
Than where the Hyades have washed me down.

For not this sod, nor this blue-lettered stone,
Nor high Nonacris holds my relics; these O'er Doliche or steep-up Dracanon
Are broken on sands by the Icarian seas,
And by the lentisk-bush mark is strown
In grave-deep herbage of the Arcades.

M. JOURDAIN.

THE SUFFRAGIST PARLIAMENT

It has been said that while woman is most fertile in the manufacture of trouble, she can be equally ingenious in discovering ways out. There is an old tale of a woman who had a banking account. The banker sent her a beautiful pink cheque book, and whenever she wanted money she wrote in it. And one fine morning the banker wrote to point out that the lady's account was "seriously overdrawn." Whereupon she wrote sweetly again in her pretty pink book and "begged to enclose cheque for the amount." The banker gasped, as bankers will. And so we are inclined to gasp when we find the Suffragist factions beginning to look round for a dear, delightful feminine way out of the Donnybrook Fair they have themselves created. "We want the vote" has ceased lately to be a cry of the smallest importance. The mob, which has ever possessed its full share of horse sense, is no longer amused by this shibboleth, and it has already determined that woman with a vote would be an entirely deadly and dangerous creature. What we are pleased to consider the ruling classes are a trifle wobbly and tremulous on the point; but they take good care that while soft speeches and counsels of patience may be forthcoming, the vote for an Englishwoman is kept just as far off as ever it was. The Suffragists themselves recognise these important facts. Some of them shriek all the louder in consequence. Others of them are bent on the saving of the face, the modus vivendi, compromise, and a delectable way out. In this latter category we must give a high place to Miss Caroline E. Stephens, who, in the current issue of The Nineteenth Century, publishes an article entitled, "A Consultative Chamber of Women." Miss Stephens believes "that a Consultative Chamber of Women recognised by Parliament would satisfy many of the women, who are now taking it for granted that votes are the only possible channel for the expression of their opinion on legislative questions." And she goes on to say that in her opinion it would not "be beyond the skill of constitutional experts to devise such a method if three main conditions were kept in view," the three main conditions being as follows:—

1. The political office of women should be purely consultative, not legislative.
2. Women should be elected to fill this office by women only.
3. The representatives thus chosen should deliberate in a separate chamber.

She adds: "My dream would be" ["dream" is an engaging feminine touch] "that a certain number of representative women (say two for each county) should meet during the session of Parliament to consider, revise and suggest amendments to any Bills sent to them by either House, at its own discretion. These would, of course, be chiefly Bills relating to social subjects, and especially those affecting women and children—for example, educational, sanitary, and Poor Law measures; such Bills to be returned to the House in which they originated, by which the women's suggestions could be either adopted or rejected, as the House saw fit."

The italics are our own. Miss Stephens is clearly a sound, old-fashioned, womanly woman, and we take this opportunity of rising up most respectfully and calling her blessed. For the good creature has actually hit upon the way out. A wagonette with white horse should be prepared for her at once, and the sooner Miss Christabel Pankhurst calls to render the lady her allegiance and fealty, the better it will be for all parties concerned. We approve most heartily of the aforesaid proposals, because, while they should quieten all sections of the Suffragists, they amount practically to nothing. Women will elect their county representatives, who will meet and deliberate, as Miss Stephens very wisely puts it, "in a separate chamber"; the Lords and Commons will send down Bills, as Miss Stephens very wisely puts it, "at their own discretion," in order to give the woman's chamber suitable opportunities for the suggestion of amendments, and, as Miss Stephens very wisely puts it, "such Bills will be returned to the House in which they originated, by which the women's suggestion can be either adopted or rejected, as the House saw fit." What woman in her right mind could desire more? She will get her vote. She will be able to prance round excitedly at election times, and she will have a chamber in which her own particular and special representatives may hold forth at length, and, if needs be, pull each other's hair to their hearts' content. And out of this chamber is to come forth, not peremptoriness, not rude demand and impudent insistence, but sweet and comfortable suggestion, which the other chambers may adopt or disregard according to their own sweet will and pleasure. We are all the more in favour of this scheme because it seems to us to be a perfectly natural scheme, and possessed of many of the attributes which are commonly associated with successful domesticity. In every properly-managed household, women, and even little girls, have a vote. The man who fights the wolf and pays the beer bills, be he ever such a hector, and ever such a master, and ever such a bully, does in reality consult his womenkind in pretty well all the actions of his domestic life. When he proposes to go forth in a silk hat, it is a woman who suggests to him mildly and by way of amendment that the glass is going down, that it seems to her that we may have some rain, and hadn't he better put on a bowler, or take an umbrella? This is a trivial matter, and my lord can either accept the suggestion or reject it. In any case, the lady has done her duty; she has registered her protest, she has given him due warning and counsel, and she has consequently fulfilled the duties of her being. It is so when the man proposes to take a holiday, or when he purposes buying a house, or when he is of opinion that the garden requires to be "re-done up." The woman will vote on these questions, because it is her natural right so to do, and she will formulate more suggestions and amendments in five minutes than would fill a pantechicon. The man accepts or rejects, as seems to him best, and the inner spirit of Pankhurst, which inhabits all feminine breasts, flaps its wings in triumph or feels snubbed, as the case may be. This has been the rule of life from time immemorial. Adam was doing very well in Paradise, but Eve insisted on bringing in an amendment or suggestion, and the bitter consequence of it is that here we are. It is perfectly obvious that a system which has conferred such benefits on the individual might be brought to bear with equal profit upon the affairs of the State. We consider that the hands of the present Government, at any rate, would be greatly strengthened by such a chamber as Miss Stephens suggests. If ever there was a Prime Minister who was plainly in immediate need of the advice and support of the Blessing of Heaven, that Minister is Mr. Asquith. And another really serious case is that of Mr. Lloyd George. Here, at least, you have persons of splendid genius who would be running round to the Consultative Chamber quite frequently. At question time in the Commons we should have Mr. Asquith explaining that he did not propose to answer the right hon. gentleman opposite until he had consulted with the Ladies. And Mr. Lloyd George would tell us that he had decided to rob such-and-such hen-roosts, on the advice of the supporters of the Government "in another place," at which he hoped he might be permitted to call "the Boudoir." We believe indeed that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer might find the Consultative Chamber so helpful and so restful and so soothing to tired and weary brains that they would be fain to go and live there. What is more, when the dignity of the Ladies had become sufficiently established, it seems to us more than possible that "elevation to the Boudoir" might become an honour similar in degree to elevation to the Lords. Lady Grove would like this, not to mention Lady McLaren, who, we take it, would insist that Mr. George Bernard Shaw, Mr. Israel Zangwill, and the rest of the "chivalrous knights" who have "so nobly assisted the women's cause," should be made the first recipients of the honour. And in process of time, no doubt, when the average height of womankind has risen to anything between eight and nine feet as Lady Grove so majestically prophesies, there will be such a rush of poor little five-foot-five men into the Boudoir, that the Lords will be entirely vacated, and the ambition of all political male persons will be to become peeresses. Depend upon it that here we have the only sure method of dealing drastically with the gilded chamber as it now exists, and we commend the idea to that great reformer, Mr. Augustine Birrell, in order that unnecessary bloodshed may be prevented. Let us have a Woman's Consultative Chamber by all means. It will please the women, whom Heaven help, and it will take that furtive look out of the eyes of the poor, hunted persons who are so anxious about Cabinet Ministers' pensions.

THE COUNSEL OF RETROGRESSION

WHAT strikes them as the melancholy spectacle of British Art has often left our censors mourning; their critical tears well forth because of its desperate condition. The writer in the Saturday Review (we hope for pardon if we give its name in full) these many months has uttered his lament over the shallowness of present efforts and achievement compared with the graver inspirations of an earlier time. Considering his environment—and we refer less to Southampton Street than to Great Russell Street—this is very natural, for at the Museum he is steeped in the fine austerity of very earnest work. Conspicuously among critics Mr. Binyon has lifted voice against the eclipse of serious artistic endeavour by the flashy notes of colour, plein air, and line, which so engross so many of our younger bloods as to lead to the public exhibition of the merest sketch-book jottings, ad nauseam. Mr. Binyon's message is "For heaven's sake, give us less of this competition with the actual realism of Nature, if by so doing you can see your way to more of the dignity, design, and import of the older masters." Thus far the scholarly pen at work in the Saturday Review deserved the eager gratitude of all who inevitably are depressed by the glut of tricky superficialities which at present cumber us.

For consider but a moment how epidemic is this sickness, how it flourishes in New English Art, how it has carried off, bodily almost, the young disciples of Impressionism and Whistler. It assails the technicalities of painting seriously, and more deeply yet the mental fibre of our Art. The other day we had it from an artist of considerable rank, whose opinion, say, is probably tinged by his particular obsession, that the art of painting, so as to extract the full quality and colour of pigments, is as lost as that of oratory. And certainly modern exhibitions are rich in unmasterly bravura, in pigments piled to dull opacity, in coarse, unbeautiful technique. Regrettably, we find Mr. Tonks' latest canvas, "The Strolling Players," exposing this annoying quality, destroying thus his usual distinction. This, then, is the one flaw of contemporary technique: the opposing one is more disgusting; but between an excess of freedom, which easily is confused with wildness and unpleasant texture, and an academic soapiness, there is ground for a safe and beautiful manipulation.

But this dashing spirit now abroad is more disastrous to the mental quality in pictures, fathering execution rather than a thoughtful art. So that painters go about intent on the hasty indication of obvious effects, and a modern symbolism, pregnant with menace, can be seen on the horizon. Tumbling over each other in the desire of deft "impressions," our artists have no ambition to cherish the unobvious and subtle revelations of Nature: the standard of the ideal is threatened by the baldness, or slightness, of those in high places, who, in their abhorrence of finish, fail to satisfy the definition of completion so justly set forth by Rousseau.

Such grounds there are, then, for Mr. Binyon's uneasiness, and while he is content with demanding more dignity of composition, thought and form at the expense of all this "snapshotting" of effects he must command our attention and sympathy. But when we see him, as the other day, unfeignedly preaching a return to the past for salvation rather than a further excursion to Nature our sympathy is curiously checked. For what does he suggest as the cure for "the raw literalism of clever bits of observation"? As far as one follows him, he advocates what he is eager to condemn—namely, the throwing away of our inheritance, and a trooping back to pre-Turnerian water-colour in place of Nature; whereby, abandoning the precious qualities of sunniness, of atmosphere, and breeze, now seen to be translatable in paint, we shall regain the "static elements" of Girtin's art, which, though wonderful in beauty, is an immature expression, cut off in its adolescence. We would suggest that if it were expedient to revert to older methods, why should we not select the water-colours of Turner and David Cox, which reached maturity? But, after all, the safer plan, regarding the probabilities and the history of Art, would be for our painters in a body to throw off this burden of clever bits of observation by seriously approaching Nature herself, taking with them, as a map, the precious legacies of Turner and Barbizon, of Whistler and Impressionism.

We cannot say whether at the time of Claude or Rousseau it was accepted that the final range of artistic expression had been gained, that Titian and Delacroix had reached the summit. Nowadays it seems we are resigned to the enervating conclusion that Rembrandt, Turner, Corot, Whistler, and Claude Monet have filled the book of Art, leaving for our embroideries but the margins and the covers. If, however, we will brush from our eyes the webs of our proper awe of these masters' accomplishments, looking out on Nature we shall everywhere see that the infinities of character, of form, of light and atmospheric influences have been only fingered in the past, and that the London Thames, or Berkeley Square in the winter's sunset, a slum in Notting Dale, or Piccadilly Circus glowing through the obscuring mists of nightfall, suggest what even Turner never neared, while within doors, the quiet light and subduing atmosphere of almost any room gird at the hard prose of those dreary interiors which seem peculiarly beloved by New English Art. Realising this, the most despondent critic need preserve a little hope, and set about proclaiming the only cure for contemporary stagnation. Very clearly he will see that our painters have no call to relapse to the period of more incomplete compromise, but that they must arm them with the utmost they can learn from modern art, and set about renewed perception in the fields of Nature.

And, on the other hand, the optimists are justified in taking courage here and there. For there are not wanting, in Dering Yard, and in Scotland, and in that contemned and motley gathering at Burlington House, clear signs of substantial promise, and more rarely of notable achievement: work of which any period in Art might well be proud. Holding firmly on his own course, observant of external influences, though independent of them, Mr. Aumonier, for example, makes yearly for a vaster expression of Nature's bigger aspects. And, ably proving that to be enrolled with Academicians does not necessarily involve decadence, Mr. Clausen has undoubtedly attained the rare position of revealer. To posterity his name will be significant of a rarely beautiful and adequate approach to the poetry of sunlight and shadow, and of foliage flickering in the light and wind. Unequaled, so far, has been his expression of these qualities. Another painter in whom the sure advance towards the impressive wonder of the Infinite in light and atmospheric influence can cheer the pessimists is Mr. Annesley Brown, who perceptibly acquires more penetrating insight. With such men as these, we think the future of our Art is intimately bound up, for they are never so complacent as to throw off smugly slight suggestions, nor so unfertile as to revert to mannerism by frankly throwing overboard the possibilities revealed to them of attempting the real light and atmosphere which are Nature.

They, on the other hand, who wilfully maim their art by lopping from it "the charm of lightness, of airy and translucent colour," though they may please Mr. Binyon by their pleasant company, are making straight, without excuse, for mannerism; and for a pretty comprehensive definition of the mannerist, Constable's is far from despicable.

BEAUTY

THE seeker after beauty has fallen on evil times, for unless he be a hermit content to pass his days in the country, or a Poet inhabiting a dream-world of his own, or has that fine temper of things spiritual, he can never hope to behold The Blessed Vision, to bless his eyes with a glimpse of the loveliness that is at once without reproach, and beyond criticism. And even for the hermit the haunts of peace and dwelling-places of Beauty grow yearly harder to find and more difficult to keep with the inroads of the motor, and the increasing invasion of the tripper, with his noise, his sacrilege, his trail of banana skins and dirty paper. The hermit finds Beauty in his surroundings, the poet and spiritually-minded in their own dreams and thoughts, but how seldom do we see it in the human face. A hideous age truly, whose children grow daily more animal-like—the board school notwithstanding, and the ways of higher education. If this higher education be reflected from the faces and conversation of those we see in the crowded train, or pass in the busy street, the epithet applied to our present educationary system is a paradox, a hopeless misnomer. But if education consists of a taste for cheap literature, and cheaper journalism, of a love of tawdry finery, and sham jewellery, then we are the most educated people in the world. In the faces of how many persons that sit opposite to us in the railway carriage, or at the restaurant—be they those of the rich or poor—can we trace a thought beyond the thought of self, and of that self's baser desires and appetites! False ideas, false complexions, false hair—these are to be heard and seen in plenty, but how rarely do we surprise in the eyes of those who throng our streets and railways, that awed and sacred light of the spirit within, whose rays are truth and purity and loveliness. It is a light that we do not look for in the eyes of the very young—in them we look for the joy of life, that first and purest child of Beauty, but how seldom do we find it, rather do we surprise discontent, peevishness, ill-temper, proofs of a nature warped and spoiled by licence and a surfeit of its own desires. The child is father to the man; can we hope that out of such sterile soil will spring the good seed that no one has taken the trouble to sow—a love and honour of parents, a reverence of things pure, holy, and of good report? No; such a child was yonder stodgy youth who chuckles to himself over the obscenities of his so-called sporting paper; such a child, the girl who sits opposite with her penny novelette, who has drawn off her gloves that we may see the rings upon her dirty hands. And can we hope to find that light in the eyes of those richer brothers and sisters, whose only god is wealth, who sleep and eat and drink between the whiles of more questionable pleasures? Look at them as they file into some fashionable after-theatre resort! Rouge on the face of youth, the hair of dead woman on its brow, the powdered cheek, the bisted eye, the sickly perfume, and the idle clatter! Is it here that you would see the face of Beauty, hear her voice? Aye, the form is here, but not the spirit. For Beauty looks and speaks from the soul, and here we eat, drink, and are merry, for to-morrow we die. It is a curious and mournful reflection on the civilising claims of Christianity, and its spiritualising influences, that here, now in the twentieth century after Christ, we, as a nation, are less enlightened worshippers of, and seekers after Beauty than were the pagan Greeks and Romans. We have a less universal appreciation—if, indeed, we have any at all—of what Beauty is than had the worshippers of Jupiter, and Mars, and Venus. And this is because the Greeks and Romans followed the only ennobling way of education: they sought—and with what success history shows—to inculcate a love of the beautiful in the hearts and minds of their children. And is it not true, and proved in the case of the Greeks themselves, that a love of the beautiful, and a practice of it, give beautiful forms and faces to its disciples? For such a love teaches restraint, moderation, refinement, and after a while comes to be reflected from the faces of those who practise it. Even athleticism was looked upon by the Greeks as a means to the attainment of physical beauty, giving, as it does, the elastic step, the clear skin, the bright eye of perfect health. But here, again, we have gone astray: we do not practise athletics from any aesthetic sense, but as a means of money-making, or of gaining cheap notoriety, as worshippers of that golden calf which to-day serves us in the place of Apollo. And we have so much more to beautify our thoughts, and spiritualise our lives than had the Greeks and Romans, for to us the Blessed Vision has been vouchsafed, with the bread of life, if we will but eat, the living water if we will but drink. And it is from the lives and faces only of those who have eaten of this bread, and drunken of this water, that we catch a glimpse of The Loveliness.

REACH-ME-DOWN LUCAS

We continue to be a nation of shopkeepers. And whereas there was a time when some of us were supposed not to keep shop, and when some of us made a pretence of not keeping shop, at the present moment even the very finest and most exclusive of us would appear to have turned huckster. Now the excuse for huckstering, as put forward by the huckstering element, has always been that times are bad, that genius is seldom properly paid, and that one must live. On the whole we are disposed to agree that something is to be said for these arguments. The poet who finds himself equal to, say, one thin small volume per annum, cannot hope—unless he be a very lucky man indeed—to keep the wolf at bay on the proceeds. It is clear that he must eke out his income in other ways. He may review, he may write for the comic papers, he may prepare anthologies, he may even work at the British Museum, or get a soft job at the Treasury. The poor devil has to live, and the poor devil's wife and children are just as hungry and just as anxious to keep warm as the next man's wife and children. So that when you find a poet doing his best with the scissors, or with the feather duster on that heavy rag "note" stamped with the crown, which is so useful in Government offices, you must not be displeased with him, but disposed rather to applaud him for a great man, fighting his way through the world like a common, little, ordinary man.

If Mr. E. V. Lucas were a poet we should be sorry for him. And while we should still be compelled to say our say about his work in other departments, we might temper our civilities with a certain mercy. As it is Mr. Lucas is not a poet of any parts. He has never published a volume of strict poetry; he writes here, there, and everywhere under various pseudonyms; he is an authority on Lamb, and a great purveyor of children's books; he writes comic almanacs; he is a contributor to Punch; and he has compiled many successful anthologies. Now it is plain that a man with so varied a mind is cut out by nature for a literary shopkeeper. Here is your beautiful French-polished counter. Behind it is a charming array of vermilion canisters with gilt on them. And between the counter and the canisters, with his hair neatly parted and pencil behind ear, and all bows, smiles and fine manners stands Mr. E. V. Lucas. "Good-morning, madam; beautiful weather we are having. Humour, mum; yes, mum. We have a very choice little article here called 'If,' price one shilling, and a cheap line, mum. Full of pictures of fat men, just sufficiently vulgar—you'll pardoning me, won't you, mum—and warranted not to make you laugh in an unseemly fashion. One shilling net, mum. Perhaps you would like something a little more serious—get down the top left-hand canister, Johnnie—here you are, mum, a sweetly pretty line for the household—'Domesticities'—all about muffins and bright firesides and carpet slippers and hot tea. And for missy, mum—oh, yes, mum, we have a speciality for young missies, mum—teaches them always to be good and kind, mum, and to spend their money on copies of the Sphere, edited by Mr. Shorter, mum, and contributed to—if I may say so, mum—by yours truly." And so the little man might continue ad nauseam and as grocers will.

If you asked him for literary mousetraps he would oblige you. He has made a special study of the market and of public requirements, and he makes a point of "being out of nothing." All goods of the far-famed Lucas brand are guaranteed of fine quality and up to sample, and are issued to patrons in accordance with the provisions of the literary food and drugs act. You can depend on them, and though he may say it himself as shouldn't, Mr. Lucas never sent out a bad tin in his life. This is greatly to the credit of his neat spick-and-span, double-fronted, plate-glass windowed, brisk, bright and breezy little establishment, and we shall not deny it. One of the Lucas leading lines for the present season consists for the most part of other people's poetry. It is all about women—woman in the shape of the Suffragists being pretty much to the fore just now—and it is warranted to suit all tastes and every pocket. The article is called "Her Infinite Variety." This title is excellent. And of course our principal did not invent it himself, and he desires to be grateful to Mr. J. L. Garvin for the title. All the rest of the book, excepting, of course, the words in it, are Mr. Lucas's own. Quite legitimate and proper. The book is divided up into compartments, and it is in the bestowing of appropriate sub-titles on these compartments, and on the arrangement under the sub-titles of appropriate matter that Mr. Lucas particularly shines. Here are a few of the sub-titles:—"The Buds" (this means little girls); "Virginal" (explains itself); "The Poets and the Ideal" (Good Lord!); "A West Country Bevy," "Daughters of Erin," "The Tender North" (the requirements of all classes met, you will note, with neatness and dispatch); "Wayside Flowers" (dear, dear!); "Shakespeare's Women," "Sir Walter's Ladies" (a choice and gratifying distinction); "Good Company" (whoever knew a woman who wasn't); "The Wife Perfect" (naturally); "Family Friends," "Mothers" (heaven, home and mother!); "Dianas" (do you hunt?); "Aunts and Grandmothers" (a shrewd touch); "Adventurers" (where's my fan?), and "Dead Ladies." Nothing in the world could be more complete or more closely calculated to appease the righteous demands of all purchasers of reach-me-down goods.

To his help, aid and assistance under these various ravishing heads, Mr. Lucas has summoned the mighty dead from Shakespeare to Leigh Hunt, and the mighty living from Mr. Wilfrid Whitten to his own perky and business-like self. There is no deception. Each author gets his name; each of them is represented by his mildest, most dulcet, or most bewitching utterances; nothing unsavoury or unsafe has been allowed to creep in, and the volume is quite fit to be adopted as a reading book in young ladies' schools, and, for that matter, might constitute a pillow book for that ardent admirer of little singing birds, Mr. Max Beerbohm. "Her Infinite Variety" is a book into which you may dip or let anybody else dip, just as you might dip into a bran pie. It is full of threepenny bits and they are all bright and shiny, and though some of them are wrapped up in a paper that has a motto on it which it is intended to make you cry, the tears you will shed, if you shed them, will be "happy tears." On the face of it there is no great harm in all this, any more than there is harm in other kinds of shopkeeping. The pity of it is that literature should be dragged down and scissored, if not exactly butchered, to make a feminine holiday. "Her Infinite Variety" is a book for young men to give to their sweethearts, and old men to give to their wives when they wish to curry favour with them. Mr. Lucas intended it "as such."

Out of his own writings it can be proved that he knows a good deal about women, and he will not contend that, though this book represents woman in many of her infinite varieties, it does really represent what it purports to represent. That is to say, the picture is not filled out in accordance with the title. And why not? Well, it would not have been "safe," and consequently it would not have been business. In other words, it would not have been smart shopkeeping. We say seriously that it is evil for letters that such books as "Her Infinite Variety" should be thrust upon a gaping market. The public taste should not be mollicoddled and pandered for in this subservient manner. If anybody wishes to know about Shakespeare's women, let him read Shakespeare, who has writ plain and bold for the reading of all who run. The plausible scissors of Mr. Lucas can be of no earthly use. It is so in the case of Sir Walter Scott; it is so in the case of Robert Burns, and in the cases of all the rest of them who happen to be of consequence. Of Mr. Whitten it is true we should never have heard as gynæolater had it not been for Mr. Lucas, but none of us—not even the women—would have repined for that. And had it not been for Mr. Lucas we should never have suspected that a woman who unfortunately suffers from congenital idiocy has any sort of right to a compartment in his box of pretty pictures. It is true that the poor creature in question has been invested with some pathos by her poet, the poet being Mr. Lucas himself, but that she represents a "variety" in the sense of Mr. Lucas's title is preposterous on the face of it. And if the poem had been by any other hand than his own, the strict anthologist in him would most certainly have prevented him from including it. We are far from wishing to asperse Mr. Lucas in his figure as a literary person. His single contribution to serious letters has been an important and creditable contribution. As journalist, also, he is not without a legitimately-earned distinction. But as sheer shopkeeper we do not like him, and we shall refuse to like him. Mr. William Archer would doubtless call the literature of England "a mine of gold." It is right that we should have a high opinion of literature, and that if we are trite enough to describe English literature as a gold mine we should not be altogether blameworthy; but when we become literal about it, and begin to serve up gold out of our mine in the shape of gilt on gingerbread for the sentimentalist and the feather-head, we resolve ourselves into one of the undesirable hangers-on of the decent Muses. People will buy "Her Infinite Variety" for a boudoir book. Why should Mr. Lucas press Shakespeare and the rest of them into the service of chiffon and the curling tongs? Literature ought never be confounded with face cream.

A DISCOVERY OF FAIRYLAND

THE honest truth about fairies has yet to be written. We have previously pointed out in these columns that literary opinion on the subject is not to be trusted. It is the pose of our minor poets, and of our middling journalists, that they believe in fairies, and that they can put their inky fingers on Fairyland at any moment, if they so desire. We cannot count ourselves among the fervent holders of this faith in fairies. Quite half of the people who write about it, write giggling clap-trap, which the other half dare not but applaud for fear of being considered "out of the movement." Hence we are all the more disposed to welcome a real square and fair handling of fairies and Fairyland when it happens to come our way. And we are of opinion that it has come our way with considerable force and certitude at His Majesty's Theatre, where Mr. Tree is now producing nightly, to audiences which have been rather thinned out by the late blizzard, a piece of fairy drama entitled, flatly and obviously enough, Pinkie and the Fairies. The author of this work, Mr. W. Graham Robertson, is to be congratulated on two circumstances, one of which is that he has contrived a fairy spectacle which, in the main, will amuse and bewilder small children, and the other is that he has written a treatise about fairies which will confirm the intelligent world in its suspicion that fairies and Fairyland alike have no tangible existence. With regard to the spectacle, we can only say that it is a sweetly pretty affair, much more charming indeed than "Faust," absolutely devoid of a trace of artistic vulgarity, and nicely calculated to bewitch the eye of youth. It is not every day in the year that you may take a child to the theatre with the certainty of offering to his delighted gaze a Fairy Queen of the right diminutive stature, with a fairy court to match, and glimpses of Cinderella, the Sleeping Beauty, Dick Whittington and his Cat, and Beauty and the Beast thrown in for luck, as it were. But these personages, who are pleased to be able to announce, are now on view at Mr. Tree's theatre in their manner as they are believed by infancy to live, and the prices of admission are as usual. Of Miss Craven's Fairy Queen a great deal has been written which fires the imagination. She has been described as the infant Genée, and her dancing, not to mention her deportment, are said by competent judges to be well nigh too wonderful for words. It is no disparagement of this pretty little girl to say that her dancing, though excellent and remarkable in one so young, is not by any means the revelation which the enthusiastic believe it to be. And as for her deportment, it seems to us to be a trifle stilted, and rather too obviously learnt by heart. We have seen a young lady at the Empire, who is, perhaps, a head taller than Miss Craven, whose dancing is much nearer Genée's than her Fairy Majesty's is likely to be for a year or two to come, and who is much more graceful and easy and captivating. What we say, as has already been explained, is not intended as disparagement of Miss Craven, but merely by way of a hint to people who are disposed to visit a public entertainment focussed for marvels on the strength of over-enthusiastic Press notices. We consider that Miss Craven is an entirely satisfactory Fairy Queen, and that is as much as we shall say for her. One does not require a child Fairy Queen to be either a Genée on the one hand—or, should we say, on the one foot?—or an Ellen Terry on the other. The fact is that Miss Craven delights the children, and wins the hearts of their elders, and no child should be expected to do more. As a spectacle for children, we can cordially recommend Mr. Graham Robertson's effort, though it is not always suited to their comprehension.

In other respects, the work may be best described as a rather humorous treatise upon fairies, specially intended for the edification of "grown-ups," which is the author's phrase for adult persons. Right through the piece the author exhibits and insists upon a contempt for human beings who happen to be more than ten years of age, which is positively distressing. If the youthful part of the audience is capable of appreciating Mr. Graham Robertson's cynicisms on the subject of their elders and betters at all, we are really sorry; for never in the history of the stage has the truth about children's elders and betters been so plainly and brutally stated. For one thing, Mr. Graham Robertson makes it quite evident that your "grown-up" is absolutely stone blind and stone deaf where fairies are concerned. Your Elf Pickle, your Elf Whisper, your Elf Twinkle, and the rest of them, may sing and dance and cut airy capers, as fairies will, but "grown-ups" are quite incapable of seeing or hearing them. The "grown-ups" senses are entirely concerned with the concrete things of life. Their imagination is dead within them, and their fancy utterly blunted and destroyed. As an example of the "grown-ups'" degraded condition as conceived by Mr. Graham Robertson, we may instance the fact that he makes them sing the following Philistian chant:

AUNT CAROLINE.
Here you see our homely cot—
AUNT IMOGEN.
Latticed casement! Latticed casement!
CAROLINE.
When we came we found dry rot—
IMOGEN.
In the basement. In the basement.

CAROLINE.
Then of course the kitchen sink—
IMOGEN.
Something frightful! Something frightful!
CAROLINE.
Yet the place is now, I think—
IMOGEN.
Most delightful! Most delightful!
AUNTS.
East or North or South or West,
Though you travel, though you travel—,
When you come to make your nest,
See the soil is of the best.
Build on gravel—build on gravel.

There is a great deal more to the like effect, and one wonders what the innocent child of the period can possibly make of it all. The whole spirit of the play, qua play, appears to us to be "grown-up" in the extreme. On the whole, however, we must be grateful, because even if it fails at ideality, Pinkie and the Fairies is a distinct step in the right direction. There are no politics in it; there are no jokes about strong drink, red noses, mothers-in-law, suffragists, widows, policemen, and kindred butts of the popular comic spirit, and the passages which may be difficult for the understanding of childhood can at least be explained to babes who make enquiry without damaging their moral outlook. Furthermore we are inclined to think that the play is to be welcomed as a much-needed relief to productions of the Peter Pan order. Mr. Barrie's "masterpiece" is all very well in its way, but one grows a trifle tired of seeing it served up as if it were the only honest nursery dish in the wide, wide world. We hope that Mr. Graham Robertson will try his hand again. He has a delicate touch, and a nice sense for shrewd humour, and although his faith in fairies is neither here nor there, he manages to pretend that he believes in them, without being in the least boisterous or offensive, or sentimental or silly. We need scarcely say that Mr. Tree has done very handsomely by his author in the matter of general cast, dresses and scenery. The pictures presented to us are all beautiful, and the stagecraft is perfect. For the acting, whether of the youngsters or their elders, we have nothing but praise. Miss Craven's Queen of the Fairies is a very finished and charming bit of work. Miss Ellen Terry plays Aunt Imogen with a skill which only herself could command. Mr. Frederick Volpé is admirable as Uncle Gregory. Miss Stella Patrick Campbell makes an effective Molly, and Miss Viola Tree, Miss Marie Löhr, and Miss Winifred Beech, in the respective parts of Sleeping Beauty, Cinderella, and Beauty, do very well indeed. We hope that the common ruck of pronounced fairy worshippers, Messrs. Shorter, Noyes, Chesterton, and the rest of them, will make a point of visiting His Majesty's Theatre forthwith, and thereby convince themselves of their extreme foolishness in this matter of Fairyland. Even Dr. Robertson Nicoll and Mr. J. M. Barrie, whom the good doctor once actually described as a fairy, might, we think, occupy occasional stalls to their great intellectual improvement.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

MR. W. T. STEAD has been contriving a further "symposium." He has written to the eminent in various walks of life to require and demand of them a strict account of the number of hours they may spend in slumber; and the eminent appear to have replied in amazing numbers. We gather from Mr. Stead's tabulated results that authors, as a body, are a fairly sleepy lot. Mr. W. M. Rossetti, for example, confesses that his night's sleep runs to nine or nine and a half hours. Mr. Israel Zangwill is another nine-hours man; and Mr. W. L. Courtney—the rapierist—spends eight hours in bed, though he does not undertake to sleep all the time. Other eight-hour men in the writing way are Mr. Goss, Mr. Sidney Lee, Dr. Nicoll, and Mr. Frederick Harrison. Mr. William Archer would appear to be the sleepless boy of the galaxy, for he is only fifty-one years of age, and six to seven hours of innocent slumber suffices him. Coming to other professions, we find that one of the politicians, Mr. Alfred Lyttelton to wit, sleeps only five and a half hours “consecutive,” with one and a half hours “broken” thrown in for a make-weight. This is terrible enough in its way, but poor Professor Ramsay (Professor of Humanity) is in worse case still, for he manages only three to four hours. Actors seem to be fairly good sleepers in the main, but it must be noted that Sir Charles Wyndham puts himself down for no more than five and a half hours, and that Mr. George Alexander fluctuates between four hours and a comfortable eight. On the old principle of six hours for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool, the best of us would seem to come out rather badly.

It would be interesting to know what real advantage Mr. Stead imagines will accrue to the species from a knowledge of the foregoing and kindred wonderful facts. The symposium may nowadays be reckoned rather an antiquated journalistic fetch, and of late at any rate, one has heard very little of it. A few years ago every editor, worth his salt, was keen on symposia; with the result that the distinguished in art, letters, and science were more or less worried out of their lives. Invitations from able editors to answer this, that, or the other stupid and frequently impertinent enquiry were fired at “people who were talked about” without rhyme or reason. In time, of course, there was a rebellion. Having projected a series of illustrated symposia, which included pictures of the eyes, noses, mouths, finger-prints, and we had almost said birth-marks of our chiefest celebrities, some genius in the purlieu of Fleet Street hit upon an idea, which he considered to be one of the brightest “scoops” of a bright age. He prepared sundry basins of gelatine and sent them out to the usual addresses with the request that the great man or the great woman, as the case might be, would make a print of his or her naked foot on the gelatinous substance, and return it carriage paid for the purposes of reproduction in Smart Chunks. The editor’s letters ran something like this:—

DEAR SIR,

Will you kindly oblige me by putting your nude foot into the accompanying basin, so that I may have the pleasure of publishing a photograph of same in the April number of the above Magazine.

The idea, however, did not “take on” quite as it should have done, and a certain irascible, literary gentleman is said to have replied as follows:

DEAR SIR,

I have received your basin of gelatine, which I beg to return. Will you please have the goodness to put your head in it?

Such is life. We do not vouch for the truth of the story, and it is certainly not a new one, but Mr. Stead might take a warning from it lest some day he comes to similar grief.

In the Fortnightly Review for January, Mr. Stead has an article which he calls, “How I know that the Dead Return.” The subject is obviously rather serious. Needless to say, Mr. Stead holds that the dead really do return, and he proffers “personal experiences” in proof of his belief. “For me,” he says, “the problem is solved; the truth is established.” Frankly we are glad to hear it, and without the smallest desire to be flippant, we can assure Mr. Stead that he is to be complimented on having settled (for himself) an infinite question. We reserve the point as to whether his testimony will be received with approval by the properly constituted authorities. The “influences” which have caused his hand to write and brought him to his condition of sure conviction, may or may not be holy influences. A bishop, probably, could tell Mr. Stead a good deal more than he believes he knows. And we must leave it at that. In a book entitled “First and Last things,” Mr. H. G. Wells expresses himself on practically the same subject in a manner which will please neither bishops nor Mr. Stead. Here is Mr. Wells:

Indeed I dislike the idea that those I have loved are immortal in any real sense; it conjures up dim uncomfortable drifting phantoms, that have no kindred with the flesh and blood I knew. I would as soon think of them trailing after the tides up and down the Channel outside my window. Bob Stevenson for me is a presence, utterly concrete, slouching, eager, quick-eyed, intimate and profound, carelessly dressed (at Sandgate he commonly wore a little felt hat that belonged to his son) and himself, himself, indissoluble matter and spirit, down to the heels of his boots. I cannot conceive of his as any but a concrete immortality. If he lives, he lives as I knew him and clothed as I knew him and with his unalterable voice, in a heaven of dædal flowers or a hell of ineffectual flame; he lives, dreaming and talking and explaining, explaining it all very earnestly and preposterously, so I picture him, into the ear of the amused, incredulous, principal person in the place. I have a real hatred for those dreary fools and knaves who would have me suppose that Henley, that crippled Titan, may conceivably be tapping at the underside of a mahogany table or scratching stifled incoherence into a locked slate! Henley tapping!—for the professional purposes of Sludge! If he found himself among the circumstances of a spiritualist séance he would, I know, instantly smash the table with that big fist of his. And as the splinters flew, surely York Powell, out of the dead past from which he shines on me, would laugh that hearty laugh of his back into the world again. Henley is nowhere now except that, red-faced, and jolly like an October sunset, he leans over a gate at Worthing after a long day of picnicking at Chanctonbury Ring, or sits at his Woking table praising and quoting The Admirable Bashville, or blue-shirted and wearing the hat that Nicholson has painted, is thrust and lugged, laughing and talking aside in his bath-chair, along the Worthing esplanade. . . . And Bob Stevenson walks for ever about a garden in Chiswick, talking in the dusk.

Many men many minds. And neither party edifies us.

The British Weekly, which is always interesting reading for anybody possessed of a sense of humour, announces a small symposium of its own on the “Early Struggles of Popular Novelists.” It seems that the early strugglers include Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Sir Gilbert Parker, Mr. George R. Sims, Mr. Frankfort Moore, Mr. Silas K. Hocking, and “one well-known novelist who has written so frankly of his personal experiences that he prefers to remain anonymous.” It is a thousand pities that all the other gentlemen named in the advertisement should not have indulged a similar preference. And if some of them would struggle to write a reasonably entertaining piece of fiction the libraries would probably be grateful. The accounts of the early struggles of authors are, as a rule, most depressing fare. Occasionally, of course, they are also passable fiction. We hope that the Bookman has managed to get hold of some of the fiction. Meanwhile it is satisfactory to learn that the January issue of Dr. Nicoll’s famous literary journal will contain, in addition, to the “exceptionally” interesting symposium in question, “results and announcements” as to the Bookman’s prize competitions.

The very latest thing in Socialism is an organisation which calls itself "The Reform Tea Association." There can be no doubt in the world that those responsible for the success of this association have a wide and accurate acquaintance with the Socialist mind, for they head their "business announcement" with the magic words

SOCIALISTS HELP YOURSELVES.

The red-tied "stalwart," not to mention his "com-ride" "intellectual," who can resist this fiery appeal deserves to be excluded from the meetings of the Fabian Society. The association announces that "arrangements have been made that (sic) half the profits resulting from the sales of the undermentioned goods through this advertisement will be handed to the Directors of the New Age Press for disposal at their discretion in aid of Socialist Propaganda Work." So that the directors of the New Age Press are evidently coming in for still further barrels of money. What with the enormous profits on the wonderful Christmas number of the New Age which was to be printed and printed and printed until "the machinery broke down," and the fifteen hundred pounds which was lately subscribed by the smaller fry of Socialism in the way of capital for the New Age Press, the company should by this time be fairly well breeched. But no doubt the half profits of the Reform Tea Association will come in most usefully for the work of propaganda. The goods which the association offer for sale comprise several kinds of China and Ceylon tea, together with pure coffee and cocoa essence in tins. Clearly the "movement" is making rapid headway. If the New Age is desirous of increasing its advertising connection on the half-profits principle, we believe that there are several firms of hair restorer, and pill and potion people who could be roped into the advertising columns of "the best penny review" without difficulty. Mr Orage and Mr. Victor Grayson are evidently possessed of sound ideas as to the possibilities of modern advertising.

We are glad to be able to announce that the "tousy tyke" with the rapier and his doughty henchman, Mr. James Douglas, have ceased to bawl and complain about THE ACADEMY. We admire their wisdom, though we cannot say much for their pluck. Of course, it may be that they meditate further ululation, and that it is the Christmas festivities and not wisdom at all which have kept them silent. Possibly, too, their rapiers are just now out at the grinder's. Meanwhile, Mr. Douglas is missing no opportunity of proclaiming the "tousy tyke's" atheistical exercise in blank verse for a work of shining genius; though he continues to refrain from the harmless necessary quotation which to people who understand these matters would appear so desirable in the circumstances. The fact is that the Star newspaper dare not quote with approval the passages from the "tousy tyke's" testament, which THE ACADEMY has already quoted with condemnation. The Star very properly is compelled to consider the feelings of Dr. Clifford. And Dr. Clifford is still a thousand years behind the massive intellects of the "tousy tyke" and Mr. James Douglas, the which, on the whole, is very much to his credit. We note also with satisfaction that Mr. Parks, who so ably edits the Star, will not now be able to take up our challenge with regard to "The Yoke." It would be a frightful thing if the Star were at any time to be seized by the police. So that "menace to freedom" or no "menace to freedom," the Star scarcely gets the best of the argument.

It is also worthy of mention that Mr. Jacob Tonson, who lately bragged in the New Age that he was formerly a contributor to THE ACADEMY, fails to reveal to us indications of his identity which might enable us to verify his statements. The matter is of small consequence, but it shows plainly what manner of person Mr. Tonson really is. It may be admitted that a writer who issues his lucubrations over a pseudonym is in somewhat difficult case when he is invited to disclose his real name. Persons who cannot find it in their hearts to print their own names to what they write should be careful to steer clear of writing which concerns their private selves rather than the public. It can be of no possible interest to readers of the New Age that Mr. Tonson may formerly have written for THE ACADEMY. We should have imagined on the whole a red-hot Socialist is ill-advised to confess, by way of a boast, at any rate, an old connection with a Conservative journal. However, Mr. Tonson is nothing if not an indiscreet writer, and as he brings his own trouble on his own head we shall not offer him sympathy. There is really no excuse for pseudonymity in the case of a paragraphist like Mr. Tonson, other, of course, than the possible fact that if he signed his own name he might be prejudicing himself in the estimation of editors who are not particularly convinced of the literary consequence of the New Age. We gather from the current issue of Mr. Orage's paper that Tonson is full of money just now, and that he is in a position to survey himself "lapped in luxury and clinking multitudinous gold coins extorted from publishers by my hypnotising rascal of an agent." This is good socialism, even if it be vulgar writing; and on the whole we can readily comprehend Jacob's indisposition to let out the ghastly secret of his name. Some day perhaps he will oblige us. Meanwhile we must live patiently.

REVIEWS

THE PARSON AT THE BAR

Memories of Famous Trials. By the REV. EVELYN BURNABY, M.A. (Sisley's, 3s. 6d.)

"I CAN truly say 'Vixi.' I have lived my life. I have lived to see no less than six Lord Chief Justices of England. I have lived to see the old Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer abolished, and all merged into one King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. I have lived to see the quaint little courts adjoining the famous Rufus Hall in Westminster demolished, and the Royal Courts of Justice set up in their place. My late brother was a prominent figure at the opening of the Royal Courts of Justice." A man who can say "Vixi" and "I have lived my life" because he has seen "six Lord Chief Justices of England," and the rest of it, is plainly a complacent and, on the whole, perhaps, rather a foolish person. We have heard of people who boasted that they had seen such and such a number of races for the Derby; but to have seen six Lord Chief Justices of England is somehow less magnificent. The fact is that the Reverend Evelyn Burnaby writes himself down in the volume before us for a shining example of the cleric who has missed his vocation. Not that we wish to suggest that he is inefficient or careless in the exercise of his holy office; for if we are to believe the learned, it is possible to be a very good minister of religion and still take one's chiefest joys in the secular world. Mr. Burnaby's joys—and he appears to have indulged himself in them pretty freely—have amounted to "being present in Court" when such and such blackguards were tried, or such and such a judge "made his famous summing up," or such and such counsel fired off his brilliant speech in defence of this, that, or the other scoundrel. It is a strange taste for a minister of religion, but it is deeply rooted in Mr. Burnaby, and he has cultivated it for all it is worth. It is impossible to recall the name of a judge or pleader of eminence during the later Victorian period who was not "a close personal friend" of Mr. Burnaby. The Court clerks and understrappers have also enjoyed his friendship, and he is not above claiming acquaintance even with some of the subjects of judicial attention; for it is apparently a rule with Mr. Burnaby that when one is writing a book one should never miss the smallest chance of indicating one's self-importance. Hence it comes to pass that we find our trial-obsessed parson writing on the one hand of the late Baron Huddleston as "poor old Huddy," and explaining on the other hand that he knew Lee the Babbacombe murderer "very well," and that Lee waited on him at dinner "when he was footman to Colonel Brownlow of Torquay." Hence also it is that "Memories of Famous Trials" is prefaced with four pages of biographical particulars concerning the Reverend Evelyn Henry Villebois Burnaby, all of which particulars, with the exception, perhaps, that Mr. Burnaby is the brother of the late Colonel Fred Burnaby, appear to us to be entirely uninteresting and superfluous. We have read Mr. Burnaby's chapters with mingled feelings. They are not ill-written, and they deal with matters which have a fascination for a certain type of mind, but in the main they irritate the intelligent, inasmuch as while they purport to deal with famous trials, their intention on the whole is to advertise the friendships and importance of Mr. Burnaby. Egotism of this cheap sort is not becoming in a common man. Still less does it become a man of our author's family, not to mention his cloth. We deplore it altogether, and we hope Mr. Burnaby will have the good sense to refrain from treating the public to further similar exhibitions. There are passages in this book which we should scarcely wish to quote as coming from the pen of a parson; and on the general question we are disposed to think that it is a thousand pities that Mr. Burnaby could not stay at home with his flock, instead of gallivanting about the country in order that he might be present at murder trials and hob and nob with roaring counsel and whiskyful reporters when the "day's work" was over. There can be no doubt that the life of the Bar mess is, or used to be, pleasant enough and jolly enough, and there is probably no reason in the world why its pleasantness and jollity should be interrupted because some poor creature has just been sentenced to death; but, as we have said, the consistent presence of a sort of free-lance chaplain, whether at trials for murder or the subsequent relaxations of the Bar, does not strike us too pleasantly. On the whole, "Memories of Famous Trials" is a book which may conceivably effect a good purpose, though it is a purpose not foreseen by the author. We are of opinion that no clergyman could read it without learning from it the important lesson that it is undignified for the cobbler not to stick to his last. The Church has been the mother of many distinguished persons. She offers leisure, or, at any rate, she permits leisure to be compassed by many of her servitors, and some of them use that leisure to the great advantage of mankind. There have been Churchmen who have performed great feats of scholarship and great feats of authorship in what a Scotchman would call "the Church's time." To these persons we suppose it would be improper to offer reproof. But at the present moment we have amongst us a really monstrous regiment of ministers of religion who, it seems to us, contrive for themselves a great deal too much leisure, and employ that leisure in dubious, if not entirely unworthy, side occupations. For example, there is scarcely a parson in England who, given the opportunity, will not undertake as much literary work as any literary layman. And the great majority of these parsons will be found to be engaged in departments of literature and journalism which are concerned with sheer money-making. These men will write for anybody who will pay them, and they will write sympathetically about anything under the sun, not even excluding new religions. We believe that Mr. S. R. Crockett, to take an instance in point, commenced life as a Scotch minister. He took to fiction and ultimately discovered that his duty lay in that beautiful medium, and not in the professional service of God. So that he forsook the ministry, thereby doing, let us say, the absolutely proper and correct thing in the circumstances. If the other parsons who write for gain, and make a point of getting it, were to follow Mr. Crockett's admirable example, we should hear very little more about clergymen without benefices, and curates with large families who are unable to obtain employment. This is not intended to suggest that Mr. Burnaby has neglected his clerical duties, or that he should have relinquished his living; for it cannot be charged against him that his peculiar hobby is likely to have brought him emolument. But we do say that the clerical profession is different from other professions in that a member of it should make a point of devoting himself to it, and leave other businesses to take care of themselves. There has never been a time when the cure of souls was a more important or exacting affair than it is to-day. And we say that it is not seemly that the responsible shepherd, whether he be bishop or curate, should be amusing himself at the Law Courts, or writing idiotic stories for Messrs. Harmsworth, Pearson, and Newnes what time the sheep graze where they will and die as they may. While there is a soul to be saved or helped no parson in the world has a title of right to leisure which enables him to turn out even so little as a thousand words a week for the secular press. Mr. Burnaby, who has had the satisfaction of seeing "six Lord Chief Justices of England," must not be angry with us for these our words, which words we intend, not for his injury, but for the benefit of all other persons who have taken upon themselves the professional duties of religion.

A YORKSHIRE "COUNTY"

Richmondshire. By EDMOND BOGG. (Elliot Stock, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE question which may possibly suggest itself to some who first see the title of this book is "Where on earth is Richmondshire?" and it takes very careful reading to find out its exact boundaries. We read that it was "an ancient Palatinate enjoying Royal privileges," and that "through this shire of Eld . . . the Swale and the Yore flow to their union in the Ouse and their bourne in the Humber Sea," and Mr. Bogg adds to the history of the Palatinate that of the adjoining shire of Allerton. We do not think that this work deserves its introduction, "a Geological Sketch of Richmondshire." Mr. Fowler, who writes it, complains that the remark is often heard, "How dull the country is!" Undoubtedly a knowledge of geology adds immensely to the interest of country, but there are comparatively very few geologists, and the beautiful land which is described so minutely in this compendious volume will not be made a bit more interesting to the ordinary lay reader by the knowledge that its carboniferous beds are known "as Palæozoic or Primary." The history is written in three sections: Richmondshire, the Wild Borderland, and Wensleydale, and it includes seven maps and no less than 230 illustrations. We gather that the Palatinate extended from the river Tees on the North to Wensleydale on the South, and from the North Sea to the Western border of Yorkshire; but it would be well if there were a map which included the whole area. He who reads this book will know the Northern part of Yorkshire by heart. The author misses scarcely a stick or stone. Every town, village, and hamlet is conscientiously chronicled, with its past history to its present, omitting no detail from the signboard of the inn to tombstones in the church. There is no connection between the things suggested, unless it is the unusual length of years recorded on many tombs, for Mr. Bogg encourages the idea that the longevity of Allerton was due to the brewing in that shire of remarkably strong ale. And many capital legends are told. Perhaps the best is of the Royal group that lies below the keep at Richmond. There, King Arthur and his knights of the round table are said to lie in state. The tale goes that they have been visited twice—first by a wastrel cobbler, who saw the King and knights and stretched out his hand to draw "Excalibur," but whose heart then failed and he fled to the open air. The second time a drummer of the Castle Guard marched boldly in beating his drum lustily, but he has never since been seen, though sometimes there is still heard the roll of his drum under the keep. Genealogy is given full place. We read, again, of the quarrel of Scrope and Grosvenor as to which should bear the Bend Or on his shield, and also of the doings of the Nevilles and of other great houses; but the families of yeoman, of farmer, and of cotter are not neglected. None is better reading than the record of the Yeoman House of Broderick, from all time Richmondshire men, and no scene is more picturesque than the burial of one of them in his own rock-hewn tomb on the hillside that he had loved.

Mr. Bogg appreciates the beauties of nature very really, and has written with much feeling of the scenery in the country of which he tells us. But sometimes he is betrayed into extravagance of language, and a redundancy of words. His imagination peoples castle and inn with the shades of those that once were there, and sometimes very aptly; but sometimes, too, it runs away with him, and not always along roads that vary quite enough. But what would such a work be worth without imagination?

Perhaps too much detail has been included, too much conscience has been devoted, by Mr. Bogg to his task. Thus when we read on page 45 that he had been told that the sites of other lost villages are known, we feel almost thankful that their secrets have not been divulged. The illustrations are exceedingly pretty, and we have no complaint against their number. There are three good chapters on botany, and it is a book which those will enjoy who love archæology, folklore, and nature.

SNOW

The Living Chalice, and Other Poems. By SUSAN L. MITCHELL. (Maunsell, 1s. net.)

WE gather that this is Miss Mitchell's first appearance in volume shape. It is an appearance of some promise. A poet who can produce lines like the following may one day have to be reckoned with:

LONELINESS.

They lift me up, they set a crown on me,
Fold upon fold their love enwraps me round.
Beyond them all I strain my eyes for thee,
Without thy crowning, love, I am uncrowned.

Soft dews fall round me but my heart is dry,
I stand in melting sunlight yet am cold,
Lonely across the world to thee I cry,
Here on my breast thy wandering pinions fold.

There is great emotion in several other of the lyrics in this slender booklet, and always the workmanship is fair and sound. If Miss Mitchell has staying power—which is a quality so many modern poets lack—she will go far. Meanwhile, if she never writes another line, she has given us matter for which we must be grateful. One of her pieces begins:

Age cannot reach me where the veils of God
Have shut me in,

There can be no denying that this is poetry. The defect of the work generally lies in its treatment of trite subjects. But this is a defect capable of removal by process of intellectual growth.

Life's Enigma. By M. BRADS. (Allen, 2s. net.)

MR. BRADS is a moderate performer on what is usually termed the oaten stop. This is how he begins to deal with Life's Enigma:

Fair Goddess of the far Pierian hills,
That o'er Thessalian realms in days of old
Held magic sway, whose gift divine instils
The Soul of Song where Genius would unfold
Its ear-compelling strains, help me to sing
In strains seductive such as may too hold
The ear enraptured while on Fancy's wing
We range the ages till my tale is told.

We are not enthralled. Still less do we rejoice when Mr. Brads proceeds to warble as follows:

By the Esk's meandering stream
Of my love I often dream,
Dream with joy of when we met,
Of our parting with regret,
And those visions bright I see
Bring my lost love back to me.

The River Esk, which is doubtless a very good river in itself, has been responsible for many bad verses, and the present increase to the number does not appear to have helped matters.

Christmas Songs and Carols. By AGNES H. BEGBIE. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.)

CHRISTMAS is past, but in all probability it will come again, and it may be that there are people in the world who will like to read Miss Begbie's songs and ballads—next Christmas. Taking them all round, they are not ill done, but they fail of the supreme quality which alone would make them acceptable from a literary point of view. We append an example, entitled, "Unto us a Child is Born."

While the Angels sang hosannas!
And the stars in glory span,
When the lambs slept on the meadows
Then was born the Son of man:
Sweet, his mother in the shadows
Leant, and sang a lullaby,
While the lambs slept on the meadows,
And the stars watched in the sky.

The elder songs are better than this.

Love as Pedlar, and Other Verses. By LADY ALICE AYRE. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.)

It is about time that love in the figure of pedlar was presented with an old age pension. However, the Lady Alice Ayre does not distress us overmuch. She sings gaily:

Round Pedlar Love, like swarms of bees
Women thronged of all degrees:
Peasant, actress, high-born dame,
Shop-girl, beggar—still they came.

And some of them might choose their fate
While others for the gift must wait,
And some went desolate away
To live sans love their life-long day.

Bella chose poppies, crown of pleasure
And luxury, and golden leisure,
With a drug within to lull the pain
Of a heart that's sold for love of gain.

And Veronique, with the gentle eyes,
Forget-me-nots—Alas her sighs
And tears too soon, like evening dew
Will dim the lustre of their blue.

Which is not half so bad as it might have been. There are other pieces in the book, some of them a trifle less airy, and on the whole we are inclined to think that our poet will not hurt anybody if she tries again.

Flashes from the Orient. By JOHN HASELHURST.
(Hazzell, Watson and Viney, 2s. 6d.)

WE are compelled to describe Mr. Haselhurst as an incorrigible writer of sonnets. In the booklet before us he offers to people who can read a matter of three hundred pieces in the sonnet form. In a literary sense, nothing could be more appalling, not to say scandalous. If Mr. Haselhurst had contented himself by printing fifty or sixty examples of his attempts at the sonnet we might have forgiven him. As it is, he bores us beyond measure. What is one to say of the "sonnet" we print below?

Somnolency and summer rule the day,
A lotus-langour steals o'er sense and soul,
And indolence doth Fancy's flights control.
That laureate of the grove, the tireless thrush,
In silence his eternal song doth hush,
Or idolently chirps spasmodic lay.
As in a bath of tropic heat we roll,
Abortive are all efforts to be gay.

Imagination's flights are feebly flown,
And Poesy hangs up his tuneless lyre.
We might long for the northern frozen zone,
Did not the effort panting spirit tire.
E'en Pegasus is limp and wingless grown,
And from low earth is powerless to aspire.

And this is not by any means Mr. Haselhurst's worst.

A Man's Vengeance, and Other Poems. By GEORGE BARLOW. (Glaisher, 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. BARLOW has published a great deal of verse in his time, but somehow he does not seem to get "any forrader." The present volume has nothing in the way of excellence or defect to distinguish it from its predecessors. It is simply the old, old sesquipedalian and fairly correct metricism over again:

While our puny tasks engross us, while the hearts of thousands dream,
While we dally with our pleasures or our grief,
Gladly, sadly, the world marches towards some destiny supreme
And it may be that the fatal hours are brief.

We quite agree. On the other hand, it may not be so. In the meantime we suppose hearts will continue to dream, though how they manage it is beyond us.

The Mockers. By JANE BARLOW. (Allen, 2s. 6d. net.)

WE have here a Barlow of another sort. Miss Jane Barlow's poetical contributions to the Saturday Review and similar journals have been greatly admired, and they certainly deserve admiration. In the present volume the author gives us some of her best work. We reproduce a short lyric, which sufficiently indicates her quality:

SUNSHINE.

With never a cloud from north to south,
The faint blue sky is bright and clear
As a mirror held to a dead man's mouth
Whilst one breathes quick for hope and fear.

All day the harvest fields lie blest
With a golden glow no mist-fleck mars:
All day a heart cries toward the west:
Come, night, but bring nor moon nor stars.

National Songs and Some Ballads. By HAROLD BOLTON. (Constable, 5s.)

AMBITION is a bold quality, and Mr. Bolton has a full share of it. In his preface he tells us that, under the title of "National Songs," he has "brought together a limited collection from many verses written during the last quarter of a century." And he adds that, "Lovers of our indigenous folk-song music will recognise old acquaintances from 'Songs of the North' and 'Songs of the Four Nations,' made familiar by the musical arrangements of Malcolm Lawson and of Arthur Somervell respectively." We hope they will. Our poet presents us with English songs, Scottish songs, Irish songs, a Canadian national song, and so forth. From the Welsh songs we take the opening lines "Gwenlilian":

Oh, know you the maiden
That robs my repose,
With her brow like the lily,
Her cheeks like the rose?
Her lashes are darker
Than the dark clouds of night,
Bright eyes glance beneath them
Like the moon's tender light.

We have heard, in Welsh connections, of robbing hen-roosts; but robbing repose savours of the tall order. Probably Mr. Lloyd George is the only man now living who could tell us how to set about it. Besides which, what should glance beneath a lady's "lashes" save and except "bright eyes"? If Mr. Bolton expects that his songs will attain to the dignity of consideration as national songs we imagine that he is doomed to black disappointment. It is true that some of his verses have a lilt and a swing with them, but this of itself is not exactly a soaring merit. We are of opinion that our poet will be well advised to drop the epithet national from his title. English, Welsh and Scotch Songs would be a fairer description.

Songs Without Music. By F. G. ATTENBOROUGH. (Walter Scott, 1s. net.)

IT seems that Miss Attenborough writes for the press under the engaging pseudonym of Chrystabel. She is a very frank poet, and she describes the collection of verses hereby put forward as "lyrics suitable for composers, orchestral ballads, cantatas, etc." We like the "etc." And we are free to confess that musical composers in search of words whereupon to exercise their gentle arts might do worse than consult Miss Attenborough's collection. Many of these lyrics are of the drawing-room drawing-roomy to the last degree. "Scotch Rose" is a good sample:

The little Scotch Rose is on the thorn,
With a look of snow on a summer morn.

There is almond scent for the bee to praise,
As he loiters long in the tangled ways;
Whilst eager butterflies drop to see
What this pale compeer of their wings may be.

Oh, little Scotch Rose that's on the thorn,
Let me thank you twice for your buds new-born!

Mr. Lulu Harcourt himself could not produce a more treackly "composer's lyric."

The Love of Eros. By VAUGHAN GREY. (Simpkin, Marshall, is. net.)

THE ripe lusciousness of Mr. Vaughan Grey's verse does him credit:

My wrath upon this mortal who so dares
Her beauty thus to flaunt in face of Heaven.
Go Eros! Seek her; then by subtle snares
With love contemptible this Psyche leaven;
Teach her, forsooth, that she may know the gods are mighty,
Beauty belongs of right alone to Aphrodite.

The people who arrange "books" for pantomimes may be glad to hear of Mr. Vaughan Grey. The rhyming of "mighty" with "Aphrodite" will move them utterly.

Songs of Manhood. By F. B. WOOD. (Routledge, 5s.)

OUR poet of manhood is an old-fashioned gentleman with a fancy for "toasts." "Charge your glasses, gentlemen," would appear to be his motto. And his toasts are of the good old honest sort:

Here's health to him who dares to do
At any cost what he deems right,
Who struggling bravely keeps the path
That leads at length to manhood's height.

Here's health to him who triumphs o'er
Whate'er would bring the blush of shame,
Who leaves to those who follow on
As heirloom—an untarnished name.

And here's a health to him who refrains from printing all such "havers." And when Mr. Wood is not toasting, he writes like this:

I know a little vixen,
She's only five years old,
Who is to me more precious
Than all the Klondyke gold.

Vera, little Vera,
With her sparkling eyes,
The sweetest lass, the dearest lass,
Beneath the sun-crowned skies.

Surely this song is related in some way to that touching ballad, "The Bird in Nellie's Hat." In any case, it seems to run away with itself.

Poems. By J. GRIFFITH FAIRFAX. (Smith, Elder, 4s. net.)

THE frontispiece of this volume is an exceedingly black affair. At a distance it looks like the end of a coffin. But on closer approach we read beneath it:

There are four windmills on the hill
And a stream that glides below.

And a minute examination convinces us that the picture does not represent the end of a coffin, and has really nothing to do with goliwogs. Fortunately, the poetry itself is a trifle more convincing, though in the main it lacks body and force. Here is the beginning of "Better So":

O whither should we turn, love,
If ever love were dead,
With all the strange things answered
And all the sweet things said?

If this lyric were continued with a sustained skill, we should have little room to grumble. But, unluckily, the note of interrogation is kept up till one imagines that one must be reading the Daily Mail. Mr. Fairfax fails, in our opinion, because he will not wrestle, and because he will not select. It is easy to warble, but difficult to make a song.

The Rustic Choir. By A. R. THURLOCKE. (The Samurai Press, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a fine-looking volume, well printed on good paper, and neatly bound. It appears that the author has contributed to the Pall Mall Magazine and the Pall Mall Gazette. His opinion of himself may be gathered from his opening sonnet, part of which we quote:

Full many a dream of beauty have I known
When the wise soul, within itself withdrawn,
Mused absently: full many an emerald lawn,
Or purple wood, or lofty mountain lone,
Rose, like a bright ethereal picture thrown Upon an inner curtain;

But all were evanescent, fugitive—
• Mirage-like fading in a waste of sand,
• Dying when most I needed they should live—
Till something moved a kindly Fate to give
The Poet's sceptre. Then I bade them stand
And make for me perpetual Fairyland.

We discern nothing in Mr. Thurlocke's subsequent pages which justifies the assumption that either Fate or anybody else has handed him the poet's sceptre. He seems to us to have been born to wrestle rather than to reign. But he writes with some poetic feeling, and sometimes he hits upon a happy thought, and expresses it with reasonable skill.

The Bridge Builders, and Other Poems. By HARROLD JOHNSON. (Nutt, is. net.)

MR. HARROLD JOHNSON believes in giving honour where honour is due. It rather takes the breath to find him writing three whole lyrics about bridges; but when one comes to think of it, bridges are useful erections, and some of them have just as much right to be praised in song, as, say, "old" farm houses or moated granges. And bridges have been painted by the masters rather finely. Mr. George Cadbury, however, is not a bridge. All the same, he will probably be pleased with the appended lines which Mr. Johnson addresses to him:

While others with their gold crushed Love and Beauty,
Square-jawed, with ruthless will,
You, pitying men, held it to be your duty
To raise them still.

Fair cottage-homes, a garden-land of flowers,
And a clean Press, the Guardian of the Age,
More than our thanks and the rich crown of hours
—These are your wage.

We shall make no demur, particularly if Mr. Cadbury has, indeed, created "a clean press." And we are not winking at Homer down the road; inasmuch as a "clean press" is greatly to be desired.

Day Dreams of Greece. By CHARLES WHARTON STORK. (Elkin Mathews, Is.)

MR. STORK dedicates his volume to his father, thus proving once again that the storks are a filial people. But, alack and alas, Mr. Stork, junior, does not strike us as being properly qualified to indulge in day-dreams of Greece. His verse is very young, and his dreams are the dreams of the confirmed undergraduate. We have all loved the classics in our time, even as Mr. Stork loves them; we have all tried to rewrite them, and only the very greatest of us have succeeded. Mr. Stork must not be discouraged; for some day he may, perhaps, write a satisfactory poem. Meanwhile, let him dismiss from his mind any suspicion that the view from the chimney-pots is at all similar to the view from Olympus.

THE MACHINE IN MODERN MUSIC

THAT music is the most emotional of the arts will be to many a debatable question. For architecture, they will remember, there are "stories in stones," and the vision of a great cathedral may hold us spellbound in an instant; for painting, that there is the same arresting power in a beautiful picture; for sculpture, that feeling is aroused readily enough by some well-carved statue, say, of an angel "Whose stony hands pray for ever tender words of peace." Undeniably, and it is not disputed, these arts can touch us; the weak spot is that the gamut of emotions which they reach is limited, and, as a rule, too restricted. There is a sense of wonder, maybe, and of admiration and of approval, but—not much more. When moved at all it is, so to speak, like the rippling of water by a summer breeze; we have been stirred only on the surface, played upon only by the shallowest and least energetic of impulses. And this, from the emotional point of view—which must also be reckoned the artistic point of view—is the short-coming of the arts of architecture, painting, and sculpture. With the drama and fiction generally, it becomes another matter. Here, in a seemingly realistic presentation of humanity, there is an appeal direct to the human heart, an appeal direct to all that is sympathetic in a man's nature. As a consequence, an individual, or a whole audience, may be excited to boisterous hilarity, to the deepest grief, to the sternest anger and indignation, or to a dozen other emotions as turbulent in their effect. It is no longer the rippled water, it is rather the storm-tossed ocean; for who has not seen a theatre-full of sobbing people, or a villain hissed furiously from the stage? Who has not heard of Charles Reade's influence on the laws of this country? And, if the proposition be enlarged, and the art of oratory ranked as fiction—which may be done without straining the fact—then who can deny that fiction, in one form or another, and as the result of its emotional effect, has gone far towards ruling the world? But, even so, amidst all this possibility of emotional influence, there is a weakness as compared with music; for each of these arts is well-nigh worthless in a primitive state. Let, for example, the orator make his statements without colouring, let the novelist tell his tale in the fashion of a newspaper report, let the stage-play run its course without stage, scenery, trappings, or embellishments—in short, take away the tinsel and the spangles and all deception—and your appeal is no longer to the emotions, but to the intellect. Are you right, or are you wrong? True or untrue? That is the only consideration arising in such circumstances, a consideration which one may safely say will be dealt with by the reason alone.

Hence the claim for music that it is the most emotional of the Arts because, unlike all others, it can accomplish its purpose, it can reach the heart-strings, fully and completely, when presented in an elementary shape—that is, in the shape of a simple flowing melody. We know, of course, that this effect may be enhanced by the surroundings, that there is something that moves us out of all reason in the Hungarian peasants' dance to the wild music of their country, and in the overpowering solemnity of the Dead March at a military funeral; we know, too, that there never has been within our history, or is ever likely to be again in any history, so emotional an event as when the skirl of the bagpipes floated at last over the plain to those spent men and women in Lucknow. But such things are quite beyond the point. There is in them a dramatic element which is outside the realm of music proper, and which, therefore, is not to be considered. What concerns us is the bare fact that melody in music is intrinsically and powerfully emotional. The clearest evidence lies in its immediate incitement to action, for this is characteristic of all strong emotions. When we are amused, we laugh; when we are in sorrow, we cry; when angry, we contort the limbs or the muscles of the face; when jubilant, we give vent to exclamations. These things result by a natural process, and, unless restrained by an effort, are unavoidable. Thus, with melody in music, it needs no more than the lilt of a jig to set all the children capering in the street, or the swing of a march-tune to make the grown man square his shoulders and step out more firmly; and this, though the melody be played inaccurately enough on nothing more pretentious than a penny whistle.

But, if this is clear evidence, it is yet far from reaching the bed-rock of the argument. We have spoken of a well-defined rhythm which is pleasing to the ear and excites it; we may part with much of this rhythm now, and, turning to the music of Eastern races, take a cruder form of melody altogether and still find no less an influence on the emotions. In India, when you listen to the droning of the Nautch dance, it resembles nothing that can be satisfactorily transcribed into musical notation; the series of notes cover an extremely limited range, and, to our understanding, follows a somewhat uncertain sequence; it is music in its infancy, not wholly indefinite—for the rhythm is unmistakable—but nearly so; yet it serves and never fails to stimulate the dancing girls. On the Nile, too, one may see the boatmen turning up their eyes in ecstasy at music which is much on a par with this. And, again, there are the war-songs of the savages. We have never heard them; but it is likely, seeing that they have not been reproduced by musicians, that they were of as primitive a type, and yet it is on record that they have always managed so to rouse the singers and listeners as to instil them with a fierce fighting spirit. And, lastly, to jump to an opposite extreme, to remember those great composers whose popularity is established in more civilised lands and who never cease to charm, there is not one of them—no, not one!—whose work is not distinguished by the abundance of its melodies. So that, clearly, it has become a mere matter of enquiry to show conclusively that the emotions of the inhabitants of all countries, and of all grades of those inhabitants, respond instinctively to the influence of melody, even though, in some cases, that melody may be presented in the least attractive form. With this natural instinct, then, so firmly planted in our nature and so easy, apparently, to satisfy, the wonder comes that we should have so little music written to-day of the more advanced type which is pleasing and so much that is displeasing. The fact, of course, is not to be disputed: it is the common complaint of musical people, and the never-ending source of regret that, as the programme grows more modern, it grows in proportion more dull. It is a question of degree which might be fixed with some accuracy by the years. Watch the unmistakable signs of enjoyment displayed in the faces of an audience listening to Beethoven or Tschaikowsky, and note at the end that really genuine outburst of applause. Then, in contrast, watch the same audience listening to one of these later composers—obviously, we may name no names—and see how the interest dies gradually from their faces, and the heads begin to nod; watch the look of boredom, the drowsy eyes, the wriggling in the seats which tells its own tale of aching backs and cricks in the shoulder; and, finally, note again the applause when it is all over, the feeblest flapping of the hands, as half-hearted as you please, the merest compliment—in fact, offered out of good nature. To say that such stale periods occur in the history of every art is merely to state the fact; there are runs of luck, as it were, a plethora of talent or of mediocrity. Yet, though this, no doubt, is in part an explanation, it is far from being the whole of it. For in music, it is submitted, another cause has been at work, one which has tended directly to the encouragement of mechanism rather than of Art. It may be summed up under two headings—the difficulty of writing melody and the comparative ease of writing music (of a sort) without melody.

The first of these propositions seems to negative what has been already said. Melody even in its crudest form has, as we have seen, proved its ability to exercise an emotional influence. How, then, can there be difficulty in devising so simple a thing? Why, even the savages have done as much! Yes, and that is just where the point comes in—we are not savages; we have advanced with the times, we have been going through a lengthy education and a wide experience of melody, and—now—we ask for something new. That is the difficulty. The old hackneyed ideas will not suffice. Many of them, of course, still have the power to charm and will retain that power to the end; but, when a new composer enters the arena, we look for new ideas. And that, we repeat, is the difficulty. For, the conception of an original melody is just like the conception of any other original artistic thought, it must spring from an artistic mind. And artistic minds are scarce. They are born, not made; they cannot be produced to order, they cannot be created in the schools. On the other hand, the least talented may go a long way in composition (of a sort) by a process of thorough and diligent study. Consider, as evidence of this, the evolution of music. If we may believe Herbert Spencer—and he certainly makes out a plausible case—"all music is originally vocal." The speaking voice rises or falls, increases or decreases in power, and indulges in many other marked variations responding instinctively to some emotion of the moment. "Every one of these alterations . . . is carried to an extreme in vocal music . . . Thus, in respect alike of loudness, timbre, pitch, intervals, and rate of variation song employs and exaggerates the natural language of the emotions; it arises from a systematic combination of those vocal peculiarities which are the physiological effects of acute pleasure and pain." In short, the singer suggests the emotions by a play upon the qualities just enumerated; and such, briefly, is the philosophical view of the elemental stage. Later, it was found that the charm of a single note could be enhanced by the simultaneous sounding of some other note; and, later again, that not one note only but many could and should be added to produce the best effect. Hence, Harmony and Counterpoint. And, concurrently with this discovery, came the further knowledge that there was beauty in contrasting the different qualities of tone. So, to state the transition broadly, we progressed from the single voice to the four-part song, then to the small orchestra (chiefly "string"), and then to the great orchestra which we know to-day. But this was not quite to end it. The treatment of the orchestra developed apace, and, with this development, there grew up a clearer recognition of the dramatic and illustrative possibilities of which it was capable. Thus, the blare of the trumpets sounded the triumphant or militant note, the triplet rhythm suggested the galloping horse, the groan of the basses would do for grief, the rattle of the kettle-drums for musketry, the tootle of the flute or piccolo for the singing of the birds, the reedy tones of the oboe for the rustic "pipe," and the sweeping downward scale passages of the violins, finished off by a crash on the big drum, for the climax of a storm or battle.

Here, then (stated in outline), were the mechanical aids to the effective handling of a beautiful thought—the science of the art—and we know how right well the great masters of melody have used them. But here, too, in the very perfection of the science, is to be found that fatal call to the uninspired to step forward and believe themselves musicians. Here is the door held open, it would seem, for the incompetent. The whole thing is cut and dried. There is a symbol for everything which may be learnt with industry, and the way is made easy. Admit a minimum of aptitude and a maximum of study and application, then the intellect can do the rest, and, presently, this man, without one original thought in his head, without any real qualification whatever for composition, may launch out into "programme" music, and produce, forsooth, a "tone-poem"! Why not, when the machinery can take him so far? Yet what a mockery it is—this substitution of brain for heart! What a palpable sham inevitably, and what a hopeless pretence thus to appeal to our judgment, and our judgment alone, and try to stuff it with such humbug as this! In such circumstances, surely, in this cold, machine-made atmosphere, where we listen critically and without emotion, to imitate the birds can only be to burlesque them, to counterfeit rifle-fire simply to rattle the drum, and to symbolise the storm to leave us wondering at the fiddlers. Yes, indeed; for the means have been mistaken for the end, the entire concern is topsy-turvy, and there is nothing left to think upon but the naked truth—the resin and catgut and the many hours that the fiddlers must have practised. Whilst, all the time, the real land of Art is so different—a land of dreams where there can be no room at the moment for dissection or analysis, where the thought becomes idealised and lifted up, the true vision clouded. Then, the shams are shams no longer. It is not the fiddles that matter now, or the drums, or the trumpets, though we hear these with delight; it is first, and above all, the fancies which they conjure up. But the melody which is to create this emotional state, which is to bewitch the listener and carry him off into this land of dreams—that is the difficulty!

The trouble, then, lies in a nutshell, in this possibility of aping the artists without an artist's capacity. And what applies to the creative musician applies equally to the executive. Through one cause or another, some individual is pitchforked into the musical profession; he is the son of his father, say; or, for some equally idiotic reason, it becomes his fate to depend for bread and butter upon the following of an inexpedient pursuit. It is not actually distasteful to him, we will suppose, and he has a certain aptitude, but—and he himself may know this well enough—he has no very deep sense of emotion in music, and, therefore, a correspondingly trifling power to arouse emotion in others. In short, he is not an artist. What, then, remains? Why, clearly, that he shall endeavour to become a perfect machine, that he shall cultivate the muscles until they can accomplish something prodigious. There are the jugglers, he remembers, who earn applause and bread and butter in exact proportion to the number of balls kept rotating simultaneously in the air. Why not, then, be a juggler in music? It means slogging hard work, of course, but it opens out a way to popular favour which must otherwise remain closed. What is the natural consequence of so inviting a prospect? What but this, that the musical juggler is a standing dish in every concert menu—always some singer reaching out for the topmost note, and, to speak the truth, generally hitting it—always some instrumentalist gallantly struggling to prove that he can play some particular composition in just ten or twenty seconds less time than any other man breathing? And the number of the musical jugglers is legion. Indeed, we may be wonder-struck, almost any day, by the astounding development of the throat or by the strength and agility of human fingers; whilst, alas! it will rarely be our fortune to meet with the sympathetic rendering of music.

Whether this is ever to cure itself is a question. Most likely not. This attitude of the professional is all too apt to re-act upon the public and persuade them that mechanism is the most acceptable thing. The public demands much music, and, with not enough artists to go round, will have it—or the imitation of it—nevertheless. So, for a time at least, probably a long time, we must live in the age of the machine, of the pianola, the orchestron, the gramophone, and, worst of all, the human machine. D.

CORRESPONDENCE

MR. ANDREW LANG'S ACCURACY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Birmingham University,
December 25th, 1908.

SIR,—Mr. Andrew Lang in the Illustrated London News of December 26th, replying to my remarks on his criticism of the late Professor Churton Collins, concludes as follows:—"Mr. Macmillan should not accuse me of inaccuracy. He heads his own letter 'Aliquando dormitat bonus Homerus.' Does he think that Horace wrote prose, or can he scan the Latin words as part of a hexameter, which they are, in Horace, but not as Mr. Macmillan arranges them?"

Here Mr. Lang, while accusing me of inaccuracy, is himself guilty of a double inaccuracy. In the first place, I headed my letter not "Aliquando dormitat bonus Homerus," but "Aliquando dormitat bonus Homerides." It is not Homer, but an eminent member of the noble order of Homeridae, whom I accuse of nodding. In the second place, the words "Aliquando dormitat bonus Homerus," which I am wrongly asserted to have put at the head of my letter, cannot be arranged so as to form part of one of Horace's hexameters, because the word "aliquando" does not occur in the line of Horace referred to. Horace wrote "quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus" (whenever good Homer nods), which, being a dependent clause, can hardly be utilised without alteration as a heading. Can it be that Mr. Lang by a slip of memory supposes the exact words of Horace to have been "Aliquando bonus dormitat Homerus," although this combination of words, if inserted in the Ars Poetica l. 359, would make the final "o" of "aliquando" short in accordance with the practice of the silver age, would entail a false quantity in the last syllable of the preceding word, and would spoil the sense of the passage?

Mr. Lang calls Prof. Collins's lapsus calami "a very comic inadvertence, for surely he read his proof-sheets." Surely Mr. Lang does not think the reading of proof-sheets an infallible preventive of slips not due to ignorance. If he does, let him turn to page 204 of his own Homer and the Epic, where it is asserted that "all the heroes, except Odysseus, Diomedes, and Aias, are capable of fear," although clear evidence of the susceptibility to fear of two of the heroes mentioned is afforded by Iliad VIII., 77, 79, 93-98 XI., 544, 546, XVII., 242, Odyssey V., 297, 406, IX., 256, 257, XI., 43, 633. Yet the proofs of this book were read by Mr. Lang and Mr. Munro, both of whom must have been perfectly familiar with the lines to which I have referred. Sarpedon should be substituted for Odysseus and Aias in the list of exceptions.

In case anything that I have written in defence of the late Professor Churton Collins or myself should appear to be disrespectful to one from whose writings I have received much instruction and delight, let me conclude with the modest words addressed by Hector to Achilles, which have, indeed, been present to my mind since I first had the temerity to engage in this controversy:

Οἶδ' αὖ δ' οὐκ ἐνὶ μέν' ἐσθλός, ἐγὼ δὲ σίθην πολλὸν χεῖρων,
'Αἶψ' ἤτοι μὲν ταῦτα θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κείναι.

Perhaps Apollo may still preserve me from the Pelian spear that has been recently wielded with such power in the chivalrous task of defending the Maid of France against all detractors.

MICHAEL MACMILLAN.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

W. B. Yeats' Collected Works. Vol. VII., The Secret Rose, etc., John Sherman and Dhaya. Vol. VIII., Discoveries, Edmund Spenser, Poetry and Tradition, etc. Bibliography. Shakespeare Mod. Press.

MISCELLANEOUS

Critical Examination of Socialism. W. H. MALLOCK. Murray, 1s. net.

JUVENILE

Little Perkie. SETON MAY. Simpkin, Marshall, 2s. net.
Favourite Fairy Tales. HANS ANDERSEN. Blackie, 1s.

POETRY

Songs of London. A Medley, Grave and Gay. H. FURST. Gowan and Gray, 2s. 6d. net.

Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. A reprint by E. FITZGERALD, with decorations by BLANCHE McMANUS. De la More Press, 1s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

The Life of the Spirit. An Introduction to Philosophy. By RUDOLF EUCHEN, translated by F. L. POGSON. Williams and Norgate, 5s.

For Those Who Want Something Fresh.

THE LOG OF A SAILORMAN

6s. By W. BROOKE

Spectator.—"It is quite obvious that Mr. Brooke writes of that which he knows. His descriptions are true, realistic pictures of life at sea."

Athenaeum.—"Capital reading and full of good yarns, such as we expect from a man who has spent a score of years at sea."

Daily Chronicle.—"This moving and undoubtedly true account of the wanderings of a nation's nomad. . . . And it is all here—touching and finding quick response in one's heart as only human doings, privations and successes can touch us. Here we see the brutality of Then, the greater humanness of Now—the humour, and humour happily without tragedy—the downright heroism—the grandeur. . . . By heaven! it must have been something worth seeing."

Standard.—"It is a first-rate yarn."

At this season of the year new novels flow from the publishers in a ceaseless stream, and the reader finds it difficult to make his choice among them. At such a time there is always a danger of missing a book that really is worth reading; and we would therefore recommend you to lose no time in ordering from your library or bookseller.

"FEET OF WOOL"

By MARY DEWETT

The book is neither "startling" nor "sensational" nor "daring," like so many that are forcibly thrust upon your notice at this time. It is a wholesome, well-written story of English family life, which gains its effects by legitimate means, and never fails to interest. The plot follows naturally from the well-drawn characters of the different actors, and never flags for an instant from the day when Jaqueline comes to visit her wealthy relative to the final scene, which shows us that, in spite of human schemes and treacheries, the gods have all the time been "creeping on with feet of wool."

6s.

THE CENTURY PRESS,
69 SURREY STREET, STRAND, W.C.

6s.

Books for Sale

ABOUT YORKSHIRE. By THOMAS and KATHERINE MACQUOID; new edition, with 67 illustrations by J. R. Macquoid; post 8vo, cloth; new; pub. by Chatto, 1894, at 7/6; offered 2/9, post free, by WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE. Plates, 20 vols., cloth; new; 50s. (cost £7). Another copy in half-morocco, 70s. (cost £10).—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

A. LIONEL ISAACS,
59 PICCADILLY, W.

RARE BOOKS, AUTOGRAPHS, & MSS.

Speciality:—French Illustrated Books of the Eighteenth Century and Modern French EDITIONS DE LUXE.

* Gentlemen wishing to dispose of any of these will oblige by kindly reporting same to me.

Catalogue of Rare Books and MSS. now ready.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently copied, 10d. a thousand words. Neat, accurate work. Yost typewriter. Address Y., 49 Primrose Mansions, Battersea Park, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

GIVEN QUEEN ALEXANDRA'S AWAY HALF-CROWN
CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOK

2/6 parcel for 1/3	RAPHAEL TUCK'S XMAS CARDS. HALF PRICE including Envelopes and sent Post-free. Containing 25 Charming Xmas Cards, all TUCK'S folding and inserted designs. C1. CUSTAR DE LUXE, Post Free with Envelope, 2 stamps extra. Send early for these.	2/6 parcel for 1/3
-----------------------------	--	-----------------------------

Fine Fun for the Fireside, six stamps.
—100 for 1s. 6d.—
Tuck's Xmas Cards. Big Bargain Bundle. 10 for 4d. Xmas Postcards, very pretty, 20 for 6d. Perfumery Par Excellence, 3 Sixes Post Paid.
BIG BOX OF TEN TOYS FOR A SHILLING.
T. B. L. KING'S PREMISES, Savoy Corner, Strand, London.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

Now Ready, completing the record of the Book Year, the January BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR.—Small Talk on some Large Literary Matters, with Illustrations to Brighten the Way.

WHAT BOYS READ.—A Talk with the Editor of "The Boys' Own Paper."

"SKIED!"—Conquest of the Air a Literary Necessity.

"PUNCH" POETRY.—And a Quarrel between Tennyson and Lytton.

MISSES WINKWORTH.—And their Gossip about Some Great Victorians.

A LONDON LETTER.—Do "Grown-Ups" read Books Written for Young Folk?

THE GENERAL READER.—Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

LIGHT AND LEADING.—New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.—Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH.—A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS.—Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT

Eight years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the chairman. The object in view is clearly stated in the following extract from a letter signed by the Bishop:—

"At present the Institution has an income of only eighteen pounds a year, and this is insufficient for its due maintenance. The front of the Museum has recently been stored, but the two rooms now used for exhibits are overcrowded, and we feel that the whole of the house should be devoted to the public, who would then be admitted to the 'John Gilpin' room and other rooms now occupied by the Curator. For this purpose it will be necessary to form a small endowment, and it has been calculated that the sum of £2,000 is required. We sincerely trust that the public will respond generously to this appeal."

"HANDLEY DUNELM, Chairman of the Committee."
The Secretary is MR. THOMAS WRIGHT, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

Concerning Debating Circles

All who are interested in the formation of Debating and Reading Circles in Clubs and Social Institutes, in Town and Country, should send a penny stamp for a Sixteen-Page Booklet on

How to Form a Debating Circle

— TO —

PUBLIC OPINION

31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

Each week PUBLIC OPINION gives a series of subjects for debate. It not only gives subjects, but puts the questions to be answered, and furnishes a multitude of facts and opinions with which speeches can be made on all sides. No other paper gives so much valuable information on all the great topics of the day. It presents the cream of all the best thought in the best papers and magazines and books.

Every week lengthy and informing summaries of two of the most important books are given, so that in the course of a year the reader is put in possession, by direct quotation, of over one hundred books. In fact, the information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of many pounds.

If a paper like this interests you, write for a Free Specimen Copy to the

Manager of PUBLIC OPINION
31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

It is published at Twopence Weekly. Post free in the United Kingdom 10s. 10d. yearly, or 13s. yearly abroad.

Numerous complaints having reached this Office
as to difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY, we publish below a first list of the names and addresses of Newsagents and Booksellers at whose establishments THE ACADEMY is always on sale. Further lists will be published from time to time.

Messrs. Samuels and Taylor, 7 New Broad Street, E.C.	Mr. W. Morflew, 19 Edgware Road, W. 1	Messrs. F. Calder Turner, 1 Bathurst Street, Hyde Park Gardens, W., Also 8 Craven Road, Paddington, W.
Messrs. Davies and Co., 23 Finch Lane Cornhill, E.C.	Messrs. Scripp's Library, 13 South Molton Street, W.	Mr. M. E. Wilson, 8 Clarendon Road, Holland Park, W.
Mr. E. Born, 80 Cophthall Avenue, E.C.	Mr. H. Offerd, 15 Avery Row, Brook Street, W.	Murley Brothers, 112 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Mr. James Barker, 2 Castle Court, Birch Lane, E.C.	The Manager, Foreign Bookstall, Café Royal, 68 Regent Street, W.	Mrs. E. Jarvis, 186 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Messrs. Leathwait and Simmons, 5 Birch Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bolton's Library, 81 Knightsbridge, W.	Mr. M. Pittman, 41 Notting Hill Gate, W.
Mr. George Blair, 16 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Mr. E. George, 13 Swallow Street, Regent Street, W.	C. H. Cooke, 11 Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Messrs. Pottle and Sons, 14 and 15 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Messrs. Knowles and Co., Crown Court, Pall Mall, W.	Mr. S. C. Carter, 1 Porchester Gardens, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Mr. T. Jenner, 40A King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.	Messrs. Jones, Farrell and Poulter, 8 Bury Street, St. James Street, W.	Messrs. Stanesby and Co., 179 Sloane Street, Belgravia, S.W.
Messrs. Wm. Dawson and Sons, Ltd., 121 Cannon Street, E.C.	Messrs. May and Williams, 160 Piccadilly, London, W.	Messrs. M. Sturroth and Co., 10 and 11 Fulham Road, S.W.
Messrs. E. T. Bottom and Co., 51A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. Also at 165A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 32 Chancery Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bingham and Co., 97 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, W.	Mr. Henry Roberts, 2 Lower Grosvenor Place, S.W.
Mr. George Blair, 11 King Street, Cheapside, E.C.	Mr. F. Batson, 82 Grosvenor Street, W.	Messrs. Scott and Law, Belgrave Mansions, Grosvenor Gardens, S.W.
St. Bride's Publishing Co., 96 Fleet Street, E.C.	The News Stores, (next) Hyde Park Hotel, Albert Gate, W.	Mr. J. Shrabbs, 165 Ebury Street, Pimlico, S.W.
Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Co., 37 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.	Messrs. T. Bastall and Son, 81 Ebury Street, London, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith, Bookshop, Sloane Square, S.W.
Mr. Harrison, Devereux Court, Temple, W.C.	Mr. T. Wyatt, 198 Ebury Street, Pimlico, W.	Messrs. Wright and Son, 43 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.
Messrs. Parnell and Co., 63 Southampton Row, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.	Mr. W. Weaver, 157 Great Portland Street, W.	Messrs. Jesson Bros., 129 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookstall, Hotel Russell, Russell Square, W.C.	Messrs. Toler Bros., Ltd., 10 Coptic Street, Bloomsbury.	Mr. A. F. Vody, 265 and 420 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. C. G. Norton, 38 Marchmont Street, Russell Square, W.C.	Mr. William Green, 138 Great Portland Street, W.	Mr. George E. Riches, 510 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. R. G. Willis, 1 Green Street, Leicester Square, W.C.	Mr. Noble, 28 Upper Marylebone Street, W.	Mr. R. Smea, 81 Lower Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Mr. J. Browne, 5 New Street, Covent Garden, W.C.	Messrs. Keith, Prowse and Co., Bookstall, Langham Hotel, W.	Messrs. Blake and Co., 62 Putney High Street, S.W.
Mr. H. Hunt, 12 Bury Street, Bloomsbury, W. C.	Mr. I. Carpenter, 17 Lancaster Street, Lancaster Gate, W.	The Idler's Own Newsagency, 169 Upper Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Messrs. Yates' Library, 79 Wigmore Street, W.	Mr. M. A. Ridge, 43 Craven Road, Hyde Park, W.	Mr. R. Andrews, 120 Upper Richmond Road, East Putney, S.W.
Mr. H. Perkins, 3 Seymour Place, Portman Square, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookshop, 19 Craven Road, Paddington, W.	Mr. Wm. John Arnold, Approach Book Stores, London Bridge, S.E.
	Messrs. Crockett and Co., 22 Leinster Terrace, W.

Persons who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested kindly to communicate with

The Manager of THE ACADEMY,
 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C.

GAY & HANCOCK'S LIST

Sixteen Illustrations of subjects from

KIPLING'S JUNGLE BOOK

ONLY

26

COPIES LEFT

By MAURICE and EDWARD DETMOLD.

The Plates 10 in. by 12 in., are mounted and inserted in a Portfolio.

Published by Macmillan and Co. at £5 5s. net.

Now offered at £2 12s. 6d. net.

N.B.—The last ten copies will be considerably increased in price.

ONLY

26

COPIES LEFT

AN IDEAL PRESENT FOR A LADY. THE "ELLA WHEELER WILCOX" BIRTHDAY AND AUTOGRAPH BOOK.

With dainty Drawings by REGINALD RIVINGTON. Size 9 in. by 6 in. Cloth, gilt extra, 5s. net. Also handsomely bound in velvet, calf, or lambskin. 10s. 6d. net each.

Madame—"The most sensible production of its kind we have seen . . . the result is altogether admirable."

Ladies' Field—"The book is altogether charming and will prove a feast of fascination to many."

Each of the three hundred and sixty-five pages has a verse of four or six lines at the top, the rest being left blank for autographs.

The only complete and Authorised Editions of the

POEMS OF ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

POEMS OF PASSION	} Limp White Cloth, 1/- net each.
POEMS OF PLEASURE
POEMS OF POWER	} Limp Lambskin (four colours), 2/6 net each.
POEMS OF CHEER
KINGDOM OF LOVE	} 7 vols. in leather in case to match, 21/- net.
MAURINE
THREE WOMEN	} 2 vols. in 1, half vellum gilt, or in lambskin, 4/6 net.
POEMS OF PASSION
POEMS OF PLEASURE

THREE EXCELLENT NOVELS

Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 6/-

The Sword of Dundee

A Tale of Bonnie Prince Charlie

By THEODORA PECK.

Morning Post—"Those looking for a good gift-book cannot do better than consider this."

Daily Express—"An acceptable gift-book."

Daily Telegraph—"Carries the reader on and makes him loth to put the book down till it is finished."

Scotsman—"In this 'Tale of Bonnie Prince Charlie' liberal use has been made of historical facts to form the foundation of as delightful a romance of Scottish story as has recently been published."

Christian World—"One of the best historical stories of the season."

Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6/-

The Tailor of Vitre

By MAY WYNNE.

Times—"A sound historical romance of XVth Century Brittany."

Daily Telegraph—"The story must be pronounced a complete success."

Birmingham Post—"A vigorous and exhilarating piece of romance."

Liverpool Courier—"This romance should take a high place among the historical stories of the day."

Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6/-

As Queens are Wed

By ANNE WARNER.

Methodist Recorder—"Is a very clever story. The plot is good, but the conversations are simply fascinating."

Dundee Advertiser—"A love story out of the usual run with a charm of its own."

The Gentlewoman—"This is a very clever piece of work, full of humour and vastly entertaining."

Truth—"A brightly-written and entertaining story. The book should enhance Miss Warner's reputation."

London: GAY & HANCOCK, Ltd., 12 & 13 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.

EVERETT & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS

THE LIFE OF COL. FRED BURNABY

By THOMAS WRIGHT, Author of "The Life of Sir Richard Burton," etc.

One Vol. Demy 8vo, with 60 Plates, 12s. net.

"All the stirring incidents in Burnaby's meteoric career are related with force and fidelity, and the many anecdotes of his deeds of prowess make delightful reading."—Sunday Times.

"A Cœur de Lion in physique, strength, bravery, and magnanimity. . . . The author has told the story of his life right well."—Daily Graphic.

"Admirable amongst biographies."—Army and Navy Gazette.

LONDON IN THE SIXTIES

By "One of the Old Brigade"

With Illustrations by HAROLD PIFFARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A Book of interesting Recollections and many anecdotes of London as it was nearly two generations ago. The greater part of them are sporting and dramatic, but for the social historian there is much that is interesting in connection with old streets, inns, and clubs.

MY LIFE AND DANCING

By MAUD ALLAN

Illustrated from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

(SECOND EDITION NOW READY.)

"Gives some delightful stories of her youth in California, her student days, her début in Berlin, and of her triumphs at the Palace."—Outlook.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

ENGLISH BIRD LIFE

By H. KNIGHT HORSFIELD

With 100 Photographs from Nature specially taken for this Book. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"An admirable book."—Country Life.

"The text combines in an unusual degree familiar description with scientific knowledge. . . . The book is one that will be eagerly welcomed."—Glasgow Herald.

"A wholly delightful book, as conspicuous for its close and sympathetic observation as for its graceful and scholarly style."—The Bulwark.

"Splendidly illustrated."—Scotsman.

"Among the many excellent books on ornithology which have been recently produced a conspicuous place must be given to this delightful volume."—Outlook.

SPORT INDEED

By THOMAS MARTINDALE

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt extra, 6s. net. Illustrated from Photographs.

CONTENTS:—A Caribou Hunt; Calling the Moose; The Fun of Hunting; A Day in the Big Woods; A Close Call; etc., etc.

THE SCOTTISH TERRIER

By O. J. DAVIES

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Illustrated from Photographs.

"Mr. Davies is a master of his subject, and to all who are interested in terriers his book should appeal."—Badminton Magazine.

HORSES

THEIR POINTS AND MANAGEMENT IN HEALTH AND DISEASE.

By F. T. BARTON M.R.O.V.S.

Demy 4to, 15s. net. Fully illustrated from Photographs.

"A handsome volume, and as a present to a beginner in horse-lore likely to prove acceptable. The illustrations are excellent."—The Field.

THE PRACTICE OF EQUINE MEDICINE

By FRANK T. BARTON, M.R.O.V.S.

Author of "The Veterinary Manual," etc., etc.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON

Author of "The Call of the Wild," "Love of Life," etc.

"There is no sign in 'The Iron Heel' of any falling-off from the strong virile style to which Mr. London has accustomed us. . . . It is a remarkable book."—Daily Mail.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM

Author of "Ezra the Mormon," etc., etc.

"In these days of anæmic fiction a novel inspired with such passionate indignation is something of a rarity, and, alike for its matter and its manner, deserves the attention which it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

"A justifiable attack on those who think to honour God by dishonouring His methods."—Daily Telegraph.

"The novel is ably written. It should find favour with all except the peculiar sect to whom it is frankly and fearlessly antagonistic."—Scotsman.

A ROYAL HOAX

By FRED WHISHAW

Author of "The Great Green God," etc.

"A good story, chock-full of adventure."—Times.

"We will leave Mr. Whishaw to tell in his crisp and humorous fashion the tale of the imbrolios and complications which ensue. They are so dramatic that the novel would undoubtedly make an admirable and very modern play."—Yorkshire Post.

ROSALIND AT REDGATE

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Author of "The House of a Thousand Candles," etc.

"Mr. Nicholson has invented a new style of romance. . . . The reader is kept stimulated and enthralled to the end."—Morning Post.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM

Author of "The King's Scarlet," etc., etc.

London: EVERETT & CO., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, ros. 6d. net.

[Shortly

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.d., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL, and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

Printed for the Proprietors, THE WILSFORD PRESS, LTD., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., by W. H. SMITH & SON, 91 Fetter Lane, London, E.C., and Arden Press, Letchworth, and Published at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1914

JANUARY 9, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

CREIGHTON MEMORIAL LECTURE.
SHIP, founded in memory of the late Dr. Mandell Creighton, Bishop of London.

The CREIGHTON MEMORIAL LECTURE for the year 1908-9 will be delivered at King's College, Strand, W.C., on Tuesday, January 19th, 1909, at 5 p.m., by Dr. G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., LL.D., M.A., F.B.A., Hon. Fellow of King's College, Cambridge.

Subject—
"THE ARRIVAL OF NAPOLEON III."
Admission free.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature, or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING
TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education—
J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor of Education (Head of the Department).

Ethics—Rev. A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt. D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy.

Psychology—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, M.A., Lecturer.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, or the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year if paid in advance, or Eight Guineas per Term (Three Terms in the Year).—Application should be made to Prof. ADAMSON, King's College, Strand, W.C.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS, &c.

32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.

AGENTS for OLD POST OFFICE DIRECTORIES.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—
SHEPHERD'S WINTER EXHIBITION of PORTRAITS and LANDSCAPES by Early British Masters is NOW OPEN.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street,
St. James's.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.

BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).

37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pen, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. MYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDAR LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 15½x11½. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immortal story and her brief passage through Time. Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.

"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no book."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of overstatement, has the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.]

"The greatest poetry is always impersonal. But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."

First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.

"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.

"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TANNER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile.

"Had Browning written pirate instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. They go with a dash and vigour, a melody of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.

"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a whoddy. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTLETON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.

"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by the adulteries of art that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lyttleton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

"Charming verses . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.]

"These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.

"His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearean quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collootypes. Fcap. 4to, 5s. net.

"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GWINNARD. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SEARA. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.

"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.

"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.

"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.

"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.

"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musical.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman.

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOGG. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.

Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.

"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TUCKER.

"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

GEDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREENO. By C. W. STORK.

VOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 651	Reviews 659
Poem: To Francis Thompson 653	Deinon to Thely . . . 660
The Lost Vocabulary . . 654	The German Forerunners of J. S. Bach . . 663
A Reflection on Realism . 656	Correspondence . . . 666
Punch and "Rudy" . . . 657	Books Received . . . 667
The Way of the World . 658

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Author's Club has decided to celebrate the centenary of Edgar Allan Poe by a dinner on March 4th, at which Sir Arthur Conan Doyle will preside. There is something delightfully incongruous in the association of the name of Poe with that of the principal stand-by of the Strand Magazine. Edgar Allan Poe was at his best a very exquisite poet and a prose-writer of cunning and poignant power. He is, on the whole, the finest product that American literature has given to the world, and if that is not saying very much, one may add that he takes his place definitely with the masters of English letters. We altogether fail to see what constitutes the claim of the inventor of that wearisome character, Sherlock Holmes, to "preside" over anything connected with Poe, even a dinner at which the American Ambassador is to be present. On the other hand, it is gratifying, in a sense, to find the Author's Club endeavouring, according to its lights, to do honour to the memory of a poet. A dinner in honour of Poe, even presided over by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, is better than a dinner in honour of, say, Mr. Max Pemberton presided over by, say, Mr. Pawling. Thus, ever, can the optimist find consolation in a woeful world. On the whole, the worst doesn't often come to the worst.

We must confess that the arguments for "simplified spelling" propounded in the December number of a new publication entitled Modern Language Teaching, in an article by Professor Skeat and Mr. William Archer, fail to convince us. No doubt we are prejudiced in favour of our conventional spelling, but we cling to our prejudices for all that, and we maintain that nothing that could be gained by spelling the word "give," "giv," could reconcile us to the change, while as for the word "jogd" for "jogged," it seems to us barbarous and hideous on the face of it. The joint authors of the article to which we have referred tell us in their own spelling that: "It ought to giv these gentlemen (the so-called purists who believ that our conventional spelling contains some treasure of historic instruction which would be lost to the world were it amended) some pause to note that not a single profest student of the history of language attaches the smallest importance to this argument." That may be all very well for "the profest students of the history of language," but what about the poets and the writers of prose who use, for purposes of beauty, the language which the "profest students" seem to imagine is their own private property? We frankly admit that we are conservative to the point of hating on principle any change that cannot be shown to possess overwhelming advantages. We deny that Professor Skeat, to whom we naturally listen with the greatest respect, has made good his case as to these overwhelming advantages. We quote Professor Skeat alone advisedly, for we are at a loss to understand why he should have thought it necessary to drag in Mr. William Archer. We have yet to learn that Mr. Archer has the smallest claim to speak as an etymologist, or even as a "profest student of the history of language," though we have it on his own authority that he did not discover that Milton was "a mine of pure gold" till he was over twenty-one, and then on a railway journey. Professor Skeat would have been well advised if he had endeavoured to secure as his collaborator in his plea for simplified spelling some great poet or man of letters. The name of, say, Mr. Swinburne would not have failed to "giv us pause" in this connection; the name of Mr. William Archer produces no such effect—quite the contrary, indeed.

Mr. Collinson, to whose interminable reiteration of the same arguments against judicious and judicial corporal punishment we have at various times allotted more than their fair share of space in our correspondence columns, is getting quite perky. In the current number of the Humanitarian he accuses one of our correspondents of "ruffianism," and makes scathing references to the supposed badness of "Academical manners." The fact is that we allowed him a very sufficient quantity of rope in his squabble with one of our correspondents, "R. S.," who ventured to point out certain logical dilemmas into which Mr. Collinson's methods of discussion had landed him; but because, chiefly in his own interests, we did not let him have the last word in a controversy in which he manifestly met more than his match, he abuses us, as one might say, "like a pickpocket." Mr. Collinson's zeal on behalf of such people as the young ruffian who was recently convicted of torturing a donkey in such a manner as to elicit from the magistrate the remark that it was the most horrible case of cruelty he had ever come across, and that he regretted that the law did not allow the culprit to be flogged, leads Mr. Collinson into a quite naughty violence of language. With some of the objects of the Humanitarian League we are, as we have already said, in hearty agreement, but we cannot follow them in their tenderness for the hides of animal-torturers, garotters, and others of like nature. We have before now expressed our regret that the good work of such a Society as the Humanitarian League should be marred by the ridiculous intemperance, and want of sense of proportion, of many of its members. Mr. Collinson is indignant because "R. S." referred to his League as a "crank society." We are sorry to say that, in spite of its well-meaning efforts, it deserves the epithet, and a glance at the list of the names of the members of the committee of its Criminal Law and Prison Reform Department shows clearly enough that it is a happy hunting-ground for every conceivable kind of meddlesome, loose-witted, "advanced," "intellectual," and "stalwart" believer in his or her infallible nostrum for the regeneration of mankind, who make rational social reform next door to impossible, and who alienate from what might be a praiseworthy and useful movement all those who are not infected with their own particular form of crankiness.

A lady from Finland has kindly come over to this benighted country to explain the advantages of Female Suffrage. The daily papers have accordingly blossomed out into columns of interviews, while in the Daily Mail we are favoured with a portrait of the fair prodigy. It appears that her name is Miss Thekla Hultin, that she is a Doctor of Philosophy, secretary of the Statistical Bureau of Finland, and a member of the Finnish Diet, who "impresses one with a sense of alert sanity." Needless to say, Miss Thekla is of opinion that the mixing of the sexes in politics is a great success. In support of this opinion she announces that there are twelve women members of the Finnish Diet, and three married couples. That in itself does not seem to prove very much, except that if a married woman becomes a member of Parliament, her husband's best chance is to become one, too. Far be it from us to interfere with the domestic concerns of Finland, but as we have yet to learn that this particular country is in any sort of position to pose as a model worthy of imitation by this great Empire in any single particular, we shall endeavour not to be unduly cast down. We should like to hear the views of the male portion of the married couples, and the other male members of the Finnish House. It is just possible that they may not be found to agree with Miss Thekla Hultin. But even if they were in agreement with her to a man, it would prove nothing. No doubt a gifted lady from the South Sea Islands might be found who would consent to come over to England and explain the advantages of the cannibal method of dietary, and the undesirability of superfluous clothing, to those who sympathised with these peculiarities; but it is probable that the rest of us would not therefore feel impelled to adopt her habits. When the insignificant—not to say tin-pot—little State of Finland has furnished to mankind at large proofs that it has achieved any kind of superiority, mental, moral, or physical, owing to the influence of petticoat government, it will be time enough for its emissaries to go forth and preach the glad tidings of Woman's Suffrage. Meanwhile, in spite of her appearance of "alert sanity," we shall take the liberty of regarding Miss Thekla Hultin's recommendations as so much entirely superfluous impertinence.

Mr. Herbert Vivian (the rejected of Deptford and Constantinople) continues to disport himself elegantly in the columns of Mr. Horatio Bottomley's organ of culture, John Bull. He distinguishes himself this week by remarking that he has "now received what are, happily, the last two volumes of O. Wilde's unnecessarily collected writings." We venture to doubt if Mr. Vivian has done anything of the kind. We happen to know that the publishers of Oscar Wilde's collected works sent them for review to not more than six journals, and we question whether John Bull was included in the number. Of course, Mr. Vivian may have "received" the collected works in the sense that he has bought and paid for them, or that he has borrowed them from a friend, but when a reviewer talks about "receiving" books he implies that they have been sent to him or to his editor for review. That this has not been done in the case of Mr. Vivian or Mr. Bottomley we are prepared to wager. The value of Mr. Vivian as a critic of literature may be gauged by the fact that he refers to the late Walter Pater as "his (Wilde's) impossible friend Pater." Meanwhile, we note with some amazement that John Bull is organising a "defence fund" on behalf of its editor in connection with his trial at the Guildhall. Mr. Bottomley, it seems, is anxious that "the burden should fall" upon himself "alone"; nevertheless, he has "devised a scheme" which will rope in the public. It seems but yesterday that this ingenious gentleman was appealing to this same public to share with him the handsome profits derived from the sale of his publication. Indeed, in an advertisement of the John Bull company, which we were the only paper in London to refuse, he painted the condition of his financial affairs in very glowing colours. Mr. Bottomley, therefore, is either a rich man or he is not. If he is rich, he should pay his own way. If he is not, what becomes of the prospectus of John Bull, for particulars of which please see the Saturday Review and the Spectator of a few weeks ago?

The Westminster Gazette is very indignant with Lord Ardilaun because he does not intend to allow his house in Carlton House Terrace to be disfigured by having placed on it "a large medallion of blue, with a bright yellow wreath around it," to commemorate the late Mr. Gladstone, who at one time occupied the house. The Westminster Gazette, pushing aside the various other reasons which Lord Ardilaun gives for not wishing to have the outside of his house adorned by this beautiful effigy, such as that "there are three or four other houses once residences of Mr. Gladstone available," and that he would not have objected to a smaller tablet, remarks bitterly that the real reason of his refusal is to be found in the last part of Lord Ardilaun's letter to the Times of January 7th:

I freely confess that I should rather not have on my house a memorial of one, who, notwithstanding his "charm and genius," by his measures reduced the value of Irish property by a half, and reduced vast numbers of my countrymen and women to poverty, and who disestablished and disendowed the Church to which I belong.

We are inclined to agree with the Westminster Gazette that the strongest reason Lord Ardilaun brings forward is the last. If the Editor of the Westminster Gazette were called upon to allow his private residence to be decorated with "a large medallion of blue, with a bright yellow wreath around it," setting forth to the world the features or the virtues of, say, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, it is highly probable that he would not relish it at all. If he takes the trouble of looking at the matter from this point of view he will perhaps be able to arrive at a state of mind which may enable him to take up a somewhat less idiotic attitude about Lord Ardilaun's very natural and honest feeling of dislike to disfiguring the outside of his house by an ugly effigy of a man whose memory is the reverse of pleasing to him. It takes a "Liberal," and a very advanced "Liberal," to propose seriously to plaster the walls of other people's houses with hideous memorial tablets of their recently-deceased political opponents, and to get up a show of indignation when these people politely decline the projected "honour."

Referring to Mr. Watts-Dunton's recent note about "The Ballad of Jan Van Hunks," the British Weekly, of all papers in the world, remarks: "Mr. Watts-Dunton explains again why he did not do this piece of work or that piece of work, and seriously comments on the flight of time, just as he has done for many years, and will continue to do for many years." This is at once scathing and prophetic—for the British Weekly. There can be no doubt whatever that Mr. Watts-Dunton is far too prone to avail himself of opportunities for treating the world to triviality with respect to him and his "work." We noticed in the Daily Mail the other day a statement to the effect that during the present year Mr. Watts-Dunton is to publish quite a number of important works. We shall naturally be glad to see them, but we wonder if he will really produce them. "Alwyn," which Mr. Watts-Dunton will be delighted for us to notice once again is included in the World's Classics, did not see the light till after it had been many years in type. Mr. Watts-Dunton's reasons for holding it back, so to speak, were no doubt momentous, but so far as we remember, they amounted to a mere question of modesty. We trust that this consideration will no longer be allowed triumphant possession of Mr. Watts-Dunton's breast, and that in the promise of January we have something that will blossom into performance, say, in May. Our own opinion is that persons who possess unedited works from their own hand should not chatter about them until the act of publication is seriously and immediately contemplated. And we are glad to observe that the British Weekly, which has always been most civil to Mr. Watts-Dunton, should at length reprove him somewhat, even though it be with ethereal mildness.

The Poet Laureate has written a good many letters in his time, and there are people in the world who would be disposed to consider that he is afflicted with the somewhat inelegant habit—at any rate, in a poet—of putting his finger into too many pies. On the other hand, it seems to us that the bare fact of a man's principal writings being metrical in form should not debar him from expressing freely in prose, opinions which seem to him meet for expression. So that, while the letter about "Suffragitis" which Mr. Austin contributes to the Times will have to run the gauntlet of a good deal of cheap criticism, there can be no doubt as to its author's strict right to indite such a letter according to his discretion. For our own part, while we do not see that Mr. Austin raises any new points, we are glad to note that he emphasises an important old one.

"Great things, grave questions, weighty issues," he says, "arise from time to time, and in their solution stormy passions are aroused in Parliament, on platforms, and in the Press. Are these to rage equally on the domestic hearth and between men and women?"

It is plain that in the event of women being given the vote the Poet Laureate's query will have to be "answered in the affirmative." Even as it is, on the mere question of a proposed female suffrage domestic bickerings and hair-pulling in the family circle are not entirely unknown. When woman was not suspected of the desire for direct political representation it was virtually she, and she only, who voted. At all Parliamentary, or, for that matter, other elections, you will find that the strength of either candidate's canvassing is invariably directed towards capturing the women. And why? A clever woman can make a man vote for anything and anybody. And in effect she has hitherto had a great deal more to do with man's voting than either he or she suspects. But now that the cat is out of the bag, as it were, the mice are growing a trifle cautious, and the natural result is bickering. Until the Pankhurst troupe came upon the scene the women of England, at any rate, had all the cards in their hands, and all the real power, and all the real glory, and all the real triumph. And now they are asked to exchange their birthright—that is to say, their ability to do just as they like with a male person—for a common vote!

TO FRANCIS THOMPSON

DIED NOVEMBER 21ST, 1907.

Not when the poor breath fails and flutters forth,
Not when the eyes are closed, nor when the grave
Receives its solemn burden, when the earth
Rains down its pitiless stones upon the dead:
Not at the bedside, nor the graveside, comes
The catch of the breath, the realising pang,
The sense of loss: but when the living turn
Back to the olden ways—and understand.
So now I come, the long day rolling down,
To cry farewell, to pay the homage due,
My salutation to the passing soul.
Lean down awhile: I do not bring thee praise,
Nor adulation of a flattering tongue.
Thou didst not ask our praise. Doth the lone bird,
That to the night outpoureth his packed heart,
Wait on the condescension of our ears?
Thou didst not sing for us: thy passionate strains
Thrilled like the bird's strains—nay, were like the ring
Of beaten iron clanging to the blow
Of Vulcan's hammer: or the thunderous sea
Pealing to Heaven, when all its hungry deeps
Lift to the ever-unattained moon,
And know God close, crying "Where art Thou, where?"

Crying un comforted. Even such thy song.

Alas, what conflict of the soul was thine,
What storms, what desolation! What unplumbed
Terrific depths, dark tenements of grief,
Caverns of sorrow, did they feet explore!
Beneath thee what profound abysses yawned!
And all around thou sawest a grim world,
Whose golden fruit was ashes, and its streams
Ran tears; whose winds were naught but bitter sighs
Heart-breaking, irremediable pain,
Unslaked desires, yearnings unsatisfied.
Poor dreamer, with what disillusioned eyes
Thou looked'st on life, the sad and sorry thing
We build our hopes on, hug to ourselves awhile,
And all reluctantly put by at last—
Standing aloof, how thou didst look on life
With mournful eyelids humid, seeing yet
What Love could make it, might but his wings spread
Their aureate fulness over the cold world.
Well didst thou know, too well, his mighty power,
His brightness and his glory. And afar,
Sure-based upon an awful silent hill,
Whose head was in the clouds, whence ceaselessly
The dreadful lightnings cleft the liquid skies
With trailings iridescent, and the noise
Of terrible thunders shook the breathless air,
Thou sawest Beauty sit, her goddess form
Robed round with cloudy darkness, and a mist
Of distance inaccessible. And there,
There thou didst fix thine eyes, and thereto strive
With bleeding feet. Thou didst cry out to Love
And Beauty, the twin-shining stars of God,
Famished for need of them, and in thy dearth
Receivedst for thy portion endless grief,
Anguish of heart, immeasurable pain.

Anguish of heart, immeasurable pain.
Yea, for thou wast, dead singer, of the band
Of those rare spirits whose Æolian hearts,
Strung at the verge of life, where the two worlds,
Of mortal and immortal, mix their airs,
Make song, not as they would, but as they must.
Others there are, the blind world's sentinels,
Outposts on our beleaguered city's walls,
While the city sleeps watching the ominous fires
On the night-curtained hills, interpreting
Their march and counter-march: astrologers

To read the faces of the stars and tell
 Their high celestial meaning, drawing down
 The wide circumference of the universe
 Unto its centre, Man. Like some great bell,
 Calling, muezzin-voiced, from tower to tower
 The multitude to prayer, unceasingly
 "There is no God but God," their cry goes forth.
 Their witness-bearing cry. But ye are more,
 More than all this, even high ambassadors
 From Man to God, our princely mediates,
 Plenipotentiaries to Heaven's courts,
 To voice the prayers of so-much-suffering Earth,
 Her woes, complaints, rebellions—to win through
 The barring clouds, the frozen wilds of Space,
 The burning suns, if so that at the last
 Ye may draw near the throne, and at its base
 Dark-shadowed, falling at His dreadful feet,
 Speak for the tongueless world. And from his lips
 What voiceless messages of thundering sound
 Catch ye, vibrating on the shaken air—
 Dark imports of His will, oracular
 Dim sayings inarticulate, whose words
 Are clouds and stars, presences unperceived,
 Dawn-light and sunset, promptings spiritual,
 Visions of dreams, unloosings of the hair:
 Which for your fellow-men, as best ye may,
 By wandering paths, circumlocutions wide,
 Strange indirections and obliquities,
 As best ye may, things all ineffable,
 Ye mould into our little human speech.

Anguish of heart, immeasurable pain!
 Think they ye suffer, they that move and dwell
 Within the city and the noisy mart,
 Crying "What lack ye?" Let them ask thy soul
 What fiery places it inhabited:
 Thou that stretched forth thine arms in loneliness
 To grope the way to God: that from the earth
 Caught at the veil that hung from the high stars, Screening thy vision (oh, with what torn hands Flung back its hem) and with half-blinded eyes
 Stood for a moment—if but one short breath,
 Yet surely for a moment—stood at gaze
 Upon the very zenith-point of Life,
 Where shone the terrible glory of His face.

The ways are hid from them where thou went'st down

Alone and silent, even among the graves,
 The graves of love, the tombs of buried hopes,
 Houses of lone abandonment: the ways,
 The shivering paths that lead to Hades' doors,
 Nay, unto Hell herself. Thou atest the bread
 Of bitter dust: and tasted'st of the fruit
 Of the Tree of Knowledge, guarded though it be
 By flaming swords angelic. There was no road
 Of any sorrow thy feet did not tread.

Yet not alone of lamentations sad
 And black eclipses of disastrous suns:
 But mountain-sides where glad Apollo sits,
 Shaking from his bright wings the dewy morn
 Upon the valleys: glades of shimmering day,
 Where Artemis upon the expectant grass
 Presses her sandals, and the crocus springs
 Behind her journeying: twilight-shadowy woods,
 Where from the rugged tree-stems laughing Pan
 Looks out, and then again is gone, and now
 From some far interspace of misty boughs
 Pipes a low mocking note, and all the Fauns
 Rustle within the dusk invisibly.
 Even such is thine inheritance and fief—
 Whose sun is Beauty, and its moon is Truth,
 And Love the tiller of its soil: and there
 Walk the old gods, the mighty ageless ones:
 There thunders Zeus, and there Poseidon wields
 The fury of the sea, and in his den

Hephaistos fans the red earth-shaking flame,
 And the queen-regent, airy-charioted,
 Most-glorious Athene, rules the heart,
 Wisdom of God, the stainless Maidenhood.
 And in what starry places else ye move.
 What luminous heights and rapturous dizzy peaks,
 Thy song hath spoken, thine effulgent song,
 Thy gorgeous harmonies. So didst thou pass,
 By those strange pathways of unpeopled realms—
 Striving to utter things too great for sound,
 Things not to be encompassed by the lips
 Of poor mortality—so went'st thou up,
 Into thy land of Luthany, the high
 Passes of Elenore, to come at last
 Unto the Breast where Grief shall fall asleep,
 And wild-eyed Passion rock her heart to rest.

And for thy legacy to us thou leav'st
 Thy jewelled tears, which in the darkened mine
 And the white furnace of that fiery heart
 Were fashioned, and with trembling feverish hands
 Their shining facets carven. With thy blood
 Thou didst enrich them—and the world goes on,
 Unheeding of thy voice, and here and there
 Some two or three alone shall stay their steps
 To mourn thy passing and in silence pray
 A "requiescat" for thy parting soul.
 What matters it? Thou art beyond our hail (Unless some message like to this may still Reach to thine ears, and win a smile perchance
 From thy new-tuned lips). Thou knowest now
 The worth of thy work, its dignity appraised
 By other hands than ours, and art content.
 Lo, in thy name I thank the careless world,
 Which, when its nightingales sing forth, sleeps on
 With a deaf ear, and leaves the lonely bird
 To voice his silver sorrows in the night,
 The star-lit shrine of holy silences,
 In sacred stillness pure and unprofaned.

Farewell, sweet soul, the darkness comes: thou goest

I know not whither: the great veil falls between.
 But thou, O Earth, lift up thine eyes and mark.
 Thou seest a thing of dreams, a broken form
 Marred deep with scars and piteous wounds, the blood
 Mingling with tears. Oh, be not pitiful.
 Be silent, reverent, awed. He looked beyond
 The verge of the world, where God sat clothed about
 With Beauty like a burning dazzling fire.
 There, where we dare not look, his eyes were fixed.
 His soul was hungered for immortal light,
 It needeth not thy pity: all its pain
 Was but the wonder and excess of bliss.

W. G. F.

THE LOST VOCABULARY

A TRAVELLER returning to London after a few years' sojourn in the back-blocks of a remote colony, would be at once struck and bewildered by the large number of unfamiliar slang terms, catch-phrases, and unsanctioned colloquialisms, which figure in the ordinary conversation of those around him. This slipshod habit has grown to such alarming proportions during his absence, as to make it extremely difficult for him to converse intelligently with his fellows on the topics of the hour. Without presenting an extreme case, it is conceivable that such a person would fail to understand more than the gist of the racy remarks which the young man about town of the present day addressed to him; and that the latter would have equal difficulty in comprehending the speech of the returned exile. Yet both speakers might be persons of education, their diction marred by no burr, twang, or drawl, and the actual words made use of neither common argot nor unpardonable vulgarisms.

Many interesting observations suggest themselves to the returned wanderer faced with the necessity of re-acquiring the facility of conversational intercourse with his fellow countrymen. Yet, when he has once surmounted the irritation natural to his anomalous situation, he will, if he be candid, concede that the practice of coining words or expressions to describe newly-invented articles, or to define sensations hitherto unnamed, is a perfectly legitimate one. He will remember that during his absence in the trackless Australian bush, thousands of new problems must have arisen to puzzle the ingenuity of the national lexicographers. Yet, when due allowance for these facts has been made, the practice of substituting a newly-manufactured synonym for a word of ancient and honest lineage, which expresses the meaning just as well, is all too common. If not checked, this tendency will inevitably lead to the permanent injury of our language—the richest and the noblest heritage which our fathers have handed down to us.

It is interesting in this connection to note the effect which the requirements of the Patent and Trade Mark laws are producing upon the language. It is only fair to the inventors of talking-machines and mechanical piano-players that they should be allowed to label their ingenious contrivances with protective titles. But whatever the talents of these American gentlemen may be in other directions, they are not exactly the persons to whom we should address ourselves for lexicographical suggestions. Yet they are allowed, without protest, to put into circulation a host of dreadful verbal compounds, whilst the utility and popularity of the inventions they designate will ultimately compel us to admit these words into the dictionary. We have but to recall the thousands of names in vogue for the various systems of wireless telegraphy and continuous photography, the innumerable cleansing compounds, cereal foods, beef extracts, and patent medicines, to recognise that this license is threatening the integrity of the English tongue. In his wrath at the irresponsibilities of these advertisers of proprietary articles, with their dread composites, their punning abbreviations, and their artless onomatopoeia, the bewildered student of the language of London is tempted to confound all word-makers in one common damnation. Or, he will at least consider the desirability of the appointment of a select committee of scholars to examine the efforts of the gentlemen of the stage, the Stock Exchange, the sporting clubs, and the members of the learned and unlearned professions, to add an apocrypha to the dictionary, and to deliberate on all insinuating pleas of the appellants for a verdict of extenuating circumstances.

Nor are these the only difficulties which present themselves to the returned exile. He will be puzzled by the large number of words which it has become fashionable to use in fresh senses. Members of all classes of the community are responsible for these changes, from the empire-builder to the music-hall artiste, and from the Parliamentary wit to the Cockney cabdriver. An intelligent enquiry into the origin of these transformations would provide ample material for a philosophical treatise on the poverty of occasions. The use of these colloquialisms, prolonged beyond the period of their applicability, would likewise provide a strong argument against the doctrine of the survival of the fittest. Because many patent medicine vendors, and other less aggressive philanthropists, have achieved fame and fortune by the invention of showy catch-phrases, that is surely no reason why these expressions should be deemed necessary to the conduct of present-day conversation.

The fact that the homing Londoner is faced in his middle age with the prospect of serious study, or the irritating alternative of understanding no more than the gist of the remarks addressed to him, seems to call for the appointment of an educational adviser to the Colonial Conference, resident in the Metropolis, and for the foundation of Chairs of Quite Modern English in the outlying Universities of the Empire.

The establishment of cordial diplomatic relations with France has also influenced the development of up-to-date London speech. It is pleasing to note the disappearance of our insular prejudices. The spasmodic efforts of the converted Briton to become acquainted with the language of his neighbours is deserving of praise. The temptation to make a display of the fact that he has availed himself of the opportunity of a cheap excursion to Paris, is doubtless, at times, irresistible; but the prevalent mania for thrusting doubtful Gallicisms into ordinary English speech is an annoyance to the dweller in the Bush whose French "hath long lain a-rusting." The poser—which, by the way, is quite as good a word as poseur—will reply that there are French words for which there is no English equivalent; and, of course, so far as the practice is limited to the adoption of such expressions, it is legitimate. But the length to which this habit has now gone is beyond endurance.

Passing over a hundred side issues which will at once occur to him, let the conscientious Colonist pause to examine the deficiencies peculiar to his own vocabulary. That during his absence he has forgotten the correct use and meaning of innumerable English words is natural enough, since the conditions of life in remote territories are so strange and utterly unlike those at home. But, like the faces of old friends, they will come back to him, and he would not dream of complaining of having to re-learn them and of familiarising himself again with their varying significance. What he does complain of, is that so many words have been tortured into meanings which they were never intended to convey. Even though he has sought to keep in touch with the Homeland by studying the great English classics, it will avail him nothing; for he will find upon his return that the classics are the very last source to which his countrymen fly for inspiration in the making of new words and phrases. It seems to him that the sayings of great Englishmen were never more mis-quoted, or so prostituted to the purposes of advertisement, as at the present day.

To the positive grievance of having lost a vocabulary, moreover, is added the vexation of having acquired one which is of no use to him. He soon discovers that a large proportion of the terms he has been used to employ whilst in the Bush are barely intelligible to the Londoner; and he feels it an act of courtesy to his audience to arrest on the tip of his tongue the Australian slang and colloquialisms to which, for a decade or more, he has been accustomed. Is it too much to beg a reciprocal compliment on the part of his fellow countrymen, or have they lost all reverence for the purity of the mother tongue?

Thus the returned exile, already past his prime, is forced to take a course of linguistics, and sits thoughtfully down to learn a new language, the tongue of latter-day London. To some the task may be congenial. To others the heroic example of Cato beginning to learn Greek at eighty may be an encouragement. Historians, from Mommsen downwards, have explained at great length and with profound learning the reason of the noble Roman's suicide, and their views have been commonly accepted; but many a returned native, such as we have described, thinks he knows better.

A REFLECTION ON REALISM

THE truths of philosophy are often the truisms of experience; and when Emanuel Kant taught his disciples that an element of error is inseparable from the process of human thought, he merely enunciated as a dogma what generations of men had apprehended as a doom. Age after age, the light of a great truth bursts through the night of ignorance which envelops the human mind; but the very rays which reveal it, as if suffering refraction in their passage through a dense medium, exhibit as distorted and out of perspective objects which in their former obscurity were relatively distinct. The treasure of a great truth, in fact, serves too often as a fund of false analogy. History furnishes many instances of this in the political and intellectual spheres. In mediæval Europe, for example, how noble was the feudal system in its conception, how serviceable in its application, fortifying by the strongest moral appeal a social structure as marvellous as the material buildings of the time; and how disastrous were the consequences of the misapplication of this political theory to the intellectual and spiritual regions of human life! The cultivation of classical antiquity in the succeeding period yielded most precious results in the fields of philosophy, letters, and the arts of painting and sculpture. But when the practice of the same golden age was made the criterion of architecture and its attendant crafts, the fruit of centuries of labour and experience was irrevocably lost. The nineteenth century, which saw such a harvest of facts gathered into the storehouse of human knowledge, revealed the great scientific truth of evolution, which, once declared, was to serve thereafter as a guiding principle of thought. In the science of biology this theory produced invaluable results. The point of view from which living organisms were regarded was completely changed. Life was seen to be a single stream, and the various forms which reveal it were no longer isolated enigmas, but were recognised as related to one another as records in the varying course of the same river in its journey to an ultimate and unimaginable sea.

A theory thus brought forward in connection with life itself was speedily applied to the various activities of life. It was applied to the history of human industries, not without success; and to the history of human thought, not without justification. What concerns us at present, however, is one of many fatal misapplications of the theory—its introduction into the world of Art. This mistake was as plausibly excused as it was readily made, and the apology must be noticed in order that the error may be exposed. Art, then, it was said, is a product of the cultivated imagination, and the imagination is one of the activities of the human mind. Art, therefore, though not in itself a form of life, is dependent upon life for its existence in exactly the same way as any industry or craft, and hence, in exactly the same way, it is reducible to the test of a theory which issues from the essence of life itself. On this we must observe that while Art is certainly produced by the cultivated imagination, it requires, like other products, more than a single factor; and it is in the ignoring of this second factor that the fallacy which vitiates the argument is concealed. The nature of this factor we not at present attempt to define, beyond pointing out that it cannot be the various phenomena of life and the external world, which form the subject-matter of Art; for, clearly, if it were so, Art would consist solely in imitation, and that creative element would be entirely and inevitably absent which men of understanding have in all ages instinctively and unanimously acclaimed. Despite the fallacy, however, this argument in fact, if not in form, became current; and the theory of development which was serving as a cement in science, and as a solvent in theology, was crystallised into a kind of touchstone in the laboratory of criticism.

The history of Art, then, was made parallel to the history of life, and its various manifestations regarded as so many stages in its progress to a definite goal. This goal was determined, arbitrarily enough, to be, not the perfect expression of ideal beauty, but the exact representation of life. The object of Art was not beauty, but truth. But it was forgotten that truth is in reality its own evidence, and truth was judged by its conformity with visible and tangible things, with the sensible facts of life, whereas the existence in man of the creative element of imagination is sufficient witness to the fact that absolute truth, which is beauty, so far from being exhaustively revealed by the phenomenal world, is only most feebly and partially represented thereby. The cause of the misconception was, no doubt, a confusion between the content of Art and its technical excellence of expression—a mistaking of the form for the meaning, or a false identification of the one with the other. In the art of painting, for example, an improvement more or less uniform may be traced in the technical ability with which ideas were expressed in form and colour. Each generation inherited the experience of its predecessors in the matter of craftsmanship, and thus the theory of development may be in that department usefully enough applied. But in the region of inspiration there is no such parallel. Artists sought and found their subjects not necessarily in the work of their immediate predecessors, but wherever their spirits led them in the infinite fields of existence. The history of painting is full of revivals of the past and anticipations of the future, and is in no way the record of a purpose increasing in the precision of its revelation throughout the ages. Were it true that there is such a purpose, as alleged, to represent life with exactness, the art would find its perfection in the invention of a process of colour-photography. That is the mischievous absurdity to which the proposition may be reduced. In the art of letters there was the less excuse for the introduction of this unhappy criterion; for here there are not, as in painting, dependent crafts the development of which may confuse the issue; and yet the cult of realism has won far more votaries here than elsewhere. To such an extent is this the case, that the popular taste, following more eminent, if not more enlightened, minds, condemns or approves an imaginative work on no other grounds than the degree in which it reflects the phenomena of daily life. The reader opens a novel to look for something which he can recognise, and with which he is familiar, forgetting that his object might be more effectually obtained by a walk down the street.

The misfortune of modern fiction is not the lack of talent or of style. Talent is abundant; style is cultivated with an unparalleled assiduity. The fault lies in the manner in which the gifts are exercised, and the ideals which call them into play. Realism reduces letters to a needless appanage to life, in whichever of the two great schools it is sought, whether it is the realism which depicts individual life, or that which defines types. The latter, indeed, is the more deadly, as it tends to narrow experience and to reduce the study of character to a series of fatal generalisations. The former demands more talent and more pains, but its logical issue is in disingenuous biography in a setting of the commonplace. In all this the true aim of Art is forgotten, and its real utility ignored. That aim and that utility consist in extending human experience, and in triumphing over the limitations of life. The genuine mission of Art in all its forms is to raise men for a season above space and time and the weariness of sensible things, and to reveal to them a world of moral beauty, the source of all that is lovely in life, whence they may return replenished with food imperishable, and enriched with treasure beyond counting or price.

PUNCH AND "RUDY"

We suppose that books of reminiscences will always have a charm for persons who read for amusement. Occasionally, too, such books may have value for the historian, and even for the critic. We are not disposed to be over-enthusiastic about reminiscences generally. Written by the indiscreet they are capable of harm; written by the discreet they have a tendency to travel into the region of twaddle. Unless your author with a memory is blessed with other special gifts, he usually makes a mess of the business of record. And not only does he require special gifts, but it would seem also necessary that he should have led a special life, a life, as it were, subconsciously devoted to the work of preparation for reminiscence. It is said that every man has a novel in him if he could but write it, and it seems more than probable that every man or woman who has lived a certain sort of life believes that the publication sooner or later of a volume of reminiscences is one's duty not only to society, but to that very much more important entity, one's self. In "Memories of Half a Century," a volume which has lately been published by Messrs. Smith, Elder, Mr. Rudolph C. Lehmann, J.P., M.P.—a member of the staff of Punch—gives us what he is pleased to call "a record of friendships." We believe that there are plenty of Justices of the Peace, not to say Members of Parliament, whose lives have been quite as interesting as that of Mr. Lehmann, whether from the point of view of friendships or otherwise. And it seems to us more than probable that it is the fact of his connection with Punch which enables Mr. Lehmann to excuse himself to himself for inviting the public to peruse his book. Right at the beginning our author confesses that these memories are not "exclusively, or even mainly," his own. It is from some MS. left by his father, and letters written to or by his father and mother, that he draws his material. And with due respect to Mr. Lehmann's father and mother, to say nothing of their distinguished friends, we are afraid that the materials are not of a very solid or serious nature. It seems that Mr. Lehmann, senr., was acquainted with Dickens. He knew him so well, in fact, that he intended to put together the usual reminiscences, but the appended rough notes were the only result.

"With Dickens at Crystal Palace performance of Sullivan's 'Tempest.' Walked with Dickens from Crystal Palace to Chorley's, 13 Eaton Place."

"Dickens fond of Americans. But when I returned from America in the spring of '63, and expressed my firm belief in the ultimate triumph of the North, he treated my opinion as a harmless hallucination."

"Sunday walks with Dickens in 1862 (February to June), when he was at Hyde Park Gate. Walked back with him from 'Star and Garter,' Richmond, April 2, after dinner to celebrate John Forster's birthday."

"With Dickens in Paris, November, 1862. Course of restaurants."

While Mr. Lehmann tacitly apologises for the trivialities hereby set before us, these notes about Dickens are typical of what he has to give us. They amount to nothing, and they can interest nobody save the most meticulous, scrap-keep-haunting compiler of unnecessary biographies. It is of no importance in the world that Mr. Lehmann, senr., should have walked with Dickens to the Crystal Palace to Chorley's, 13, Eaton Place, and one is not uplifted to learn that to have been with Dickens in Paris in November, 1862, meant nothing more to Mr. Lehmann, senr., than a "course of restaurants." Of course, Mr. Rudolph Lehmann is not to be blamed for the possession of filial views as to the excellence of his parents, and we are disposed to forgive him for explaining that his mother's "playing of the piano was a revelation of the divine capacities of that difficult and much-abused instrument." Most of us remember our mothers' piano playing with feelings which would break the heart of, say, M. Paderewski. But to write them down in Mr. Lehmann's strain is simply foolishness. The fact that Mr. Lehmann was known as "Rudy" in his bright infancy is another item of information which scarcely concerns the polite world. It seems to us very doubtful, also, whether a really cautious compiler of memories would have committed himself to the following passage:

My own memory of my grandfather, Robert Chambers, is, with the exception of one interview, somewhat vague and indistinct. He died when I was fifteen years old; and during the latter part of his life we, who were living in England, had not been able to see him frequently. That one interview, however, stands out in my mind with a startling distinctness. It must have taken place in 1864, when, as a boy of eight, I had just begun learning Latin with a tutor. This great intelligence had been communicated to my grandfather, and I can remember my feelings of mingled pride and apprehension when the towering and dignified figure took me by the hand and began to question me: "So, my little man, you're into Latin?" "Yes, grandpa." "That's good; that's good. Now then, can you go through mensa, a table?" "Please, grandpa, we call it musa, a muse, in our book. I can do that for you." And I did, without in the least understanding why my grandfather gave a Homeric shout of laughter. The consequent gift of a shilling, was, however, thoroughly intelligible, and served to impress the little incident indelibly on my mind.

If Mr. Lehmann's tutor had taught him a little English as well as a little Latin, we should probably have been spared some of the loose English in the foregoing artless tale, and if Mr. Lehmann had read his Latin authors properly, and to advantage, we might have been spared the story as a whole. It is natural that persons who contribute to Punch should be great simpletons at the age of eight, and that they should still consider the shillings bestowed upon them by admiring grandpas worthy to be enshrined in ten-and-sixpenny books. Most boys have had shillings from their grandpas, but, somehow, Mr. Swinburne does not write odes about his shilling, and Mr. Meredith is quite dumb on the subject, even in prose. On the other hand, neither of these gentlemen contribute to Punch, and neither of them has written nor proposes to write reminiscences of his little-boyhood; which, on the whole, perhaps, is just as well. Even when Mr. Lehmann leaves himself out of the pretty domestic picture, and proceeds to the printing of letters written to his mother, or to his father, or to himself by eminent hands, he scarcely succeeds in convincing us that his "memories" are important. For example, how has James Payn, as one figures him, helped, or hindered, or in any way modified to the view by reason of the fact that he sent Mr. Rudolph Lehmann—then, apparently, in his teens—the following letter:

My dear Boy,—This poem is very nice—I mean really nice—but not so good as "The Dolomites." The last line is a metaphor drawn from the subject which is contrary to the canons. Still, it is good. Why do you want to attempt the Cornhill? I happen to know that Chambers' Journal is in want of good verse. If you do not want to send a few specimens to your Uncle Robert I will send them for you. There! Love to Fred.—Yours ever, JAMES PAYN.

There are people writing for Punch who would parody a letter of this kind over a whole page, and make a great sport of the business. Clearly, there is nothing in it that was worth printing. It is just the common, kind letter of the ordinary, kind man to the ordinary simple boy, and of no literary value whatever. "Mr. James Payn's compliments to Mr. Rudy Lehmann, and will he please come round to lunch?" would be just as useful. Our author assures us that the letter, as quoted, shows James Payn "in his character of amiable and encouraging critic." That, we take it, is justification. But in view of the fact that Payn was always an amiable and encouraging critic, where in the name of goodness is the point? We shall not assert that Mr. Lehmann's memories are wholly and entirely concerned with trivialities. But pretty well every page of them contains matter which might very well have been left out. For example, this of Thackeray, on page 197:

We had many intimate friends in common, but it was never my good fortune to be on very intimate terms with Thackeray himself. He was to have dined with me on the day after he was taken ill, and his daughter, Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, has told me that when she left him on the evening before he died, the last words she ever heard him speak were, "Tell Lehmann."

One might almost infer from such a statement that Thackeray died with the blessed surname, "Lehmann," on his lips. Possibly he did; but what of it, anyway? If the story has importance at all, it is important to the Lehmann family, and not to Thackeray, and consequently not to the public. Then we have Robert Browning writing to Mr. Lehmann's mother that nothing would give him "so much pleasure as forgetting sad old Christmas Days in her house" had he not been otherwise engaged. And so on, and so forth.

There can be no question that Mr. Lehmann and his parents have moved in considerable literary circles, and that they have enjoyed the friendship of literary and artistic people of eminence. But with these facts we think Mr. Lehmann might have been content. His endeavour to prove and establish them appears to us to be superfluous and ill-advised. Mr. Lehmann lacks those powers of selection which are most essential where a work of this nature is concerned. Any document with the name of Lehmann about it is to him a treasure, and, perhaps, very properly so. But whether the public should be called in to share his admiration is another question. To our mind, "The Memories of Half a Century" is a piece of book-making in the absence of which we should have been little the poorer.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

FROM an advertisement in the columns of Punch, we take the following:

In response to suggestions made to us by Editors of London daily papers and magazines, suitable applicants (limited to ten) will be coached for well-paid positions on the Press at a moderate premium.

We may conclude, therefore, that the editors of London daily papers and magazines are at length in a tight corner. It would be interesting to know specifically who these editors may be, and what well-paid positions on the Press happen just now to be going a-begging. The gentlemen who are to perform the much-needed educative work are Mr. Arthur Lawrence, Sir F. C. Burnand, Mr. Laurence Clarke, and Mr. Mostyn T. Pigott. We believe that all of them are busy journalists, and we should have imagined that if "well-paid positions" be toward, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Clarke, and Mr. Pigott at any rate would have condescended to undertake the duties themselves. Sir Francis Burnand, probably, might not care to become definitely attached to any particular journal, no matter how handsome an emolument were offered him. He has laboured in the vineyard with credit for many years, and we can well understand that he now prefers the rôle of mentor to that of pupil. As for the others, to say the least, it is benevolent of them that they should come forward to assist "editors of London daily papers and magazines" at a moment of bitter need. Their qualification is obvious, and aspirants who wish to be coached "at a moderate premium" will no doubt keep well in mind the fact that Mr. Arthur Lawrence was one of the moving spirits in Messrs. Samuda's delightful Limerick competitions, while Mr. Pigott, M.A., B.C.L., acted as one of the judges in those competitions. So that what they do not know about journalism can scarcely be considered knowledge. We have no desire to throw cold water on a scheme which is so plainly intended for the benefit and advantage of harassed "editors of London daily papers and magazines." But we should advise intending "coachees" to make sure that, at the end of their pupilage, the well-paid positions will be inevitably forthcoming.

It appears that Mr. W. H. Lucy has been retelling in the Cornhill Magazine an anecdote which he originally published twenty years ago. This anecdote bears reference to a statement of the late Mr. Gladstone that a Member of Parliament who was so nearly dead that he "had only just a little breath left in him," was dragged into the lobby of the House of Commons to vote on a motion which was carried only by a majority of one. Mr. Lucy asserts that the Member of Parliament in question was a Conservative member of Parliament, and that it was the Tory whips who were responsible for his unseemly appearance before the tellers. At the time when the story was first promulgated a Mr. Beavan, of Leamington, wrote to Mr. Gladstone enquiring whether the incident referred to was not the same as that narrated by Greville (in his Journal of the Reign of Victoria, vol. II., p. 11, under date June 6th, 1841), and whether the Member of Parliament in question was not Lord Douglas Gordon-Hallyburton, the then Liberal M.P. for Forfarshire, who died the same year. To Mr. Beavan's enquiries Mr. Gladstone replied: "Mr. Greville is right, only my reporter (who is unknown to me) is in error. I can never forget the scene." Mr. Lucy was advised of what Mr. Gladstone said, but he still continues to tell the story in its original and inaccurate form. And as we have seen, he repeats it in a recent number of the Cornhill. For this lapse Mr. Beavan brings Mr. Lucy to book in the Standard of Thursday, and prints the whole correspondence. It seems to us that the situation is a little awkward for Mr. Lucy. On the other hand, he may have a good defence, in which case it would be well for him to produce it. Surely if Mr. Gladstone could afford to admit that his "reporter" was wrong, Mr. Lucy can afford to follow suit. In any case he must cease from ascribing his version of the story to Mr. Gladstone.

One of the Socialist papers has discovered a sonneteer who indulges in six times fourteen lines at one fell swoop, as it were. Being a Socialist he naturally dubs his verses "Dream Sonnets." Here is the upper portion—we will not say the octave—of the first of them:—

And is it meet, beloved brother mine,
That on my head thy brazen heel be prest,
With thy sharp weapon thrust against my breast,
Or haply my stiletto laid to thine?
Brother, behold, I kiss thee for a sign
That jungle-dictates do I not obey,
But, coward if you will, desert the fray
Till thy coarse tinder catch the spark divine.

We conclude that the Socialists imagine that it would be correct to write "thy hand is on your heart." The "intellectuals" of the movement may be possessed of a nice taste in "neck-wear" but they appear to know precious little about sonnets.

Mr. George Meredith is anxious that literary London should be made aware of the fact that he did not cease to visit Rossetti's house because Rossetti was in the habit of eating "thick ham and fried eggs." We are indeed coming to something. Nobody in his senses ever supposed that Mr. Meredith would cut a fellow poet from the list of his weekly calls for any such stupid reason. And as for Rossetti's "thick ham and fried eggs"—if he liked his ham thick and his eggs fried—what in the name of goodness have the literary reviews to do with it? We consider that Mr. Meredith's note on the subject does credit to his heart, if not exactly to his head—which head happens to be the head of one of the very few men who stand for what is noble in English letters to-day. We are reminded of a story of a certain American lady, who on hearing that an eminent poet was in the habit of dining at a tavern not many miles from Fleet Street, begged the waiter to point the gentleman out to her. The waiter said, "Certainly, mum, there he is in the corner." "Thank you so much," said the lady, "and—er—by the way, what's he eating?" "Well, in point of fact, madam," replied the waiter, "he's 'aving a pork chop." "Goodness gracious!" exclaimed the fair American, "I thought he lived in the clouds." "That may be, mum," remarked the waiter, "but he dines here." For our own part we shall assert that the poet who does not like his ham thick—that is to say, if it be fried ham—is a foolish person; for thin fried ham may be reckoned one of the abominations. In the words of the old song:

Why should the poet not
Eat his ham thick? God wot,
Why should the poet not?

REVIEWS

MORE POETRY

The Cry on the Mountain, and Other Poems. By JAMES A. MACKRETH. (Nutt, 1s. net.)

MR. MACKRETH writes smooth and, indeed, rather glib verse. For example:

I stood in the nave alone;
And the rich and amber light,
Like paths to a sky unknown,
Led up to an unseen height.
And the wonderful rose was blown
To a glory wooing the sight
Far up in the chancel lone.
Commingling, noon and night
Made vastness and mystery known;
And I knelt as before God's throne
Where mortal had shaped in stone
His dream of the infinite.

All of which, somehow, strikes one as being in the nature of bouts rimés rather than of poetry. However, it is due to our poet that we should say that his booklet contains a good deal more passable stuff than one is wont to discover in the average sheaf of new verse.

Hugo of Avendon. By E. L. M. (Kegan, Paul, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a drama "in four acts." It contains passages which may have merit as rhetoric, but there is little, if any, poetry. And at times the diction becomes absolutely ludicrous.

On rushing in,
We found him swooning, stretched along the floor.
Raising him up, we called his senses back.

It is astonishing that a writer possessed of so poor a sense for poetical locution should desire to write blank verse at all.

Nature Poems. By W. H. DAVIS. (Fifield, 1s. net.)

MR. DAVIS is not without his particular gift. His verses have a tendency to over-simplicity, and at times they drop into downright bathos. But he is full of conceits, and, as a rule, they are fresh and original. We append a short lyric, which is indicative both of Mr. Davis's merits and his defects:

THE RAIN.

I hear leaves drinking rain;
I hear rich leaves on top
Giving the poor beneath
Drop after drop;
'Tis a sweet noise to hear
These green leaves drinking near.

And when the Sun comes out,
After this rain shall stop,
A wondrous light will fill
Each dark, round drop;
I hope the Sun shines bright;
'Twill be a lovely sight.

The first of these stanzas has obvious merit; the first four lines of the second one are not ill done; but one finds it difficult to be delighted by the final couplet.

Psyche, and Other Poems. By JOHN GARTH. (Allenson, 4s. 6d. net.)

ON his title-page the author prints "Psyche Odes Light Lyrics and Miscellaneous Poems." The collocation is a little odd. And in the preface Mr. Garth remarks: "In venturing to place these poems before the public eye, I may be permitted to explain that the four divisions of this book have not been made in loose and haphazard fashion, but are specifically representative of a certain conception and ideal of poetry. The Psyche clearly stands by itself, as possessing a sustained epic character. . . . The Ode also stands apart, owing to a certain elevation and elaboration of thought, feeling, and diction." So that, one way and another, the reviewer feels himself a trifle superfluous where Mr. Garth is concerned. From Psyche and the Ode we might quote prettily, but the "Light Lyrics" are an equal joy. Here is the beginning of a "Song to Aurora":

A song to Aurora! She calls for a strain!
The bringer of joy and the soother of pain,
The goddess that conquers the shadows of night,
That conquers the shadows and puts them to flight.

On the whole, we are inclined to wish that Aurora would call for a cab, and leave "strains" severely alone—that is to say, if they are to be purveyed by Mr. Garth.

Poems. By EVELYN MOORE. (George Routledge, 1s. net.)

MISS MOORE writes with a quiet thoughtfulness which will please some readers of verse. But she is disposed to express metrically thoughts which are really not entitled to the metrical dignity. At her best, however, she is not to be despised:

I know that I should breathe
The openness of hope; on everything
Would rest the cordial tinge of my content.
Each day would be a net at morn forth spread,
At eve drawn in again, from the blue sea
Of distance, where I seek what yet may be
Gold of glad hope, or precious ornament.

This is the conclusion of a poem called "The Fortune Seeker." One does not commonly encounter such writing in small verse books.

Pan-Worship, and Other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. (Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net.)

MISS FARJEON is a bold enough poet to write lilting verses under the title, "In the Oculist's Ante-room." Browning, or, perhaps, Matthew Arnold, might have succeeded where Miss Farjeon has failed, which is neither here nor there. But people who are not very strong on their poetic, or even intellectual, opinions, really should not rush into oculists' ante-rooms. There is something very human about the present poetess, however, for she winds up her sally with the following lines:

He has spoken. The man with his cold voice has spoken.
The seal of suspense lies here shattered and broken,
And I know . . . And I know
What the coming years hold which an hour since were dumb to me—
God! how precious the jewel of your light has become to me
Where's my hat? Let me go.

"Pan-Worship" contains much better poetry than the foregoing. And after reading such pieces as "Colour-Tones," and some of the lyrics which Miss Farjeon prints in a section marked "From an Old Garden," we have hopes of her.

Powder and Patches. By VERA CANUTE. (Elkin Mathews, 1s. net.)

We reproduce Miss Vera Canute's opinion of the moon:

Is she an Eastern maid, or in disgrace
That she doth veil her shy, unpainted face?
Sometimes, in modest mood, this pallid nun
Sits in the cloistered clouds, unloved, alone.
Then, as a bride, she'll rise but to invite
The sweet, sweet kiss and wooings of young night.

Next, as a corpse, bound up in tidy shrouds,
She waits interment by the dawn's pale clouds.
Then, as a mother, when the wind unbars
Her storm-locked House, and out there spring babe stars.

Which is not altogether bad, even if it be a trifle thin. Miss Canute has evidently read Herrick:

UPON A CHILD.

Nay, lady, now no longer weep;
By the larks' songs she's sung asleep,
And every daisy bud's astir
In readiness to cover her.

And Herrick happens to be, perhaps, the only English poet who will not bear imitation. But, at the same time, we are not at all disposed to frown on Miss Canute's talent. We should wish her to employ it with a trifle more seriousness and application.

Dramatic Odes and Rhapsodies. By F. P. B. OSMASTON. (Kegan, Paul, 5s.)

MR. OSMASTON is full of sound and fury, and he writes blank verse with a continuity which reminds us of the conjuror who pulls yards of coloured tape from his mouth. Here is a just sample of Mr. Osmaston:

Or, suiting thought to somewhat homelier guise:
When my wife tends her pudding, she takes heed,
As every housewife should, to mete the flour
And measure plums and milk—all that well goes
To build it handsomely, nor less with care
Doth nurse her oven at the proper heat,
Lest oven prove false traitor after all,
And hand her blackened cinders for the cake
To my astonished palate; and in this Illimitable bakehouse of the world
Shall we presume the several elements,
Traced momentarily upon a myriad spheres,
Are suffered now to fly about at will,
With just a random chance that finally
They may coningle, fuse within the flame,
Relieved the while of all their fulsome weight,
In such a way to shape before the Lord
His perfect shewbread?

For all that, there is a good deal in Mr. Osmaston's volume which will bear perusal, and on occasion he comes very near compassing his ambition, which, apparently, is to hit the sun. Mr. Osmaston is pretty sure to give us more volumes, and if he would only prune himself and consider himself, they might be acceptable volumes.

The Burden Bearer. By FRANCIS HOWARD WILLIAMS. (Jacobs.)

MR. WILLIAMS describes his poem as "An Epic of Lincoln"—Abraham Lincoln, that is to say. Really, the work is a sort of rhymed biography:

Time's wheel turns slowly, but at last the day
Set for the marriage came, and Jesse Head,
Exhorter, preacher, and the friend of both,
With ceremony due made these two one
In eyes of God and man. And Nancy faced
The stern realities of coming trials
With faith which knew no faltering.

This reminds us of Tennyson's famous line of parody:

A Mr. Wilkinson, a clergyman.

"The Burden Bearer" may find appreciation in the United States, but we fear that its reception in this country will not be enthusiastic.

DEINON TO THELY

THE Princess of Cinthyanum pushed her dessert-plate, opining that life was too short for eating prickly-pears.

"I think they're the most delicious fruit in the world. I'm sure they're what the angels eat in heaven. But do consider the form they take here—little tiny parcels of what's purely ambrosia, each packed separately in the crevices of a huge core made of sharp steel knife-blades. No doubt there's a moral lesson in it. I suppose it's meant to teach us that nothing really nice is to be had without no end of pains. Every time I see prickly pear, I feel perfectly piggish. I'd suck them, if the cores didn't gash my palate into slices. Do you know what I want? I want a clean slave, with very dainty fingers and a little silver scoop, who should sit by me all through dinner, and pick me out a plateful of prickly-pear pulp, so that I might eat it for dessert with a table-spoon. But there—we never get what we want."

"No," said Nicholas Crabbe.

"Why do you say 'No' like that? Are you nourishing a secret yearning too?"

"I am," he answered. "You began to tell me a lovely tale about the way in which what you call the Arbiters - of-temporal-as-well-as-spiritual-Elegancies hurt you personally. It was a truly ripping tale; but there was nothing about Arbiters in it, as far as you went. Then, that horrible brown marchioness with fat stockings came to call, and interrupted you; and you promised to tell me the rest after dinner. It is after dinner now."

"Let's have coffee first. Three lumps or four? Can't you understand that I don't talk about those dreadful Arbiters, just simply because I talk of nothing else. They aren't in my stories: they're the story itself."

"How?"

"Why, because they're at the back of them all. Look here: you know that I am friendly with the Order of Divine Love. I knew its founder. A saint, he was; and thought quite properly about the king too. Well then: the Arbiters don't think properly about the king; and so they're the enemies of the Divine Lovers, just as the Dominicans used to be of the Franciscans, on account of some trumpery politics."

Nicholas shook his head with a gesture despairing of unravelling these intricacies.

"I know," he said, "that the Order of Divine Love is under a cloud just now: because of some thirty-nine propositions, which Leo the Thirteenth commodiously anathematised a little while ago."

The princess put her hands in her apron pockets, and set out to be categorical.

"I'll have you to know," she asserted, "that those propositions were not theological, but philosophical."

"What difference does that make?"

"The difference that they're profoundly unimportant. Everyone knows how absurdly philosophers philosophise on such subjects as (for example) the unanswerable question as to the number of angels who can dance on the point of a needle. No one dreams of cursing pious old maids of the masculine gender, who waste their time in arguing that the moon either is, or is not, made of green cheese, and that, as it certainly is not, therefore it is. These diverting pastimes are comparatively harmless. The thirty-nine damned propositions are, as I thought all the world well knew, simply a subterfuge. The real reason why the Order of Divine Love is in Rome's black book is something quite different. Leo the Thirteenth is all very well: but what I'm talking about happened under Pius the Ninth. I've known three paparchs personally—Gregory, Pius, and Leo—and every one of them has been the tool, or mouthpiece, or catspaw, of some monkey in the background. When Domeniddio gave us Pio Nono, I remember thinking that we'd gotten a Man with a mind of his own. He'd been about a bit, you know. But He turned out as They all do, only much worse. Oh yes; well-meaning, of course, and all that kind of thing; but never able to make a plan and stick to it; and always under someone's thumb. First, it was one; then the other; after that, the next; and never the same for a year together. Well, and so in the revolutionary days, He came under the influence of Father Antonino Rosmarini, who founded my dear Order of Divine Love. That was the best thing which could possibly happen to His Holiness. Rosmarini, you must know, was a rather fantastic broad-churchman, a real idealist, for (as you say) the Ideal is the Real, seen as it is. He contrived to persuade Pio Nono to become poor, and without possessions, and so to be the lord and sovereign of all things. Isn't that pretty? In fact, Rosmarini was employed to compile the Bull which was to proclaim this new arrangement. Pio Nono was so much in love with his notions, that He denounced him cardinal in petto. How do I know? Why, because Rosmarini had his state-chariot built, with his armorials blazoned on the panels; and we stored it in our coach-house in Rome till he could use it. But the Arbiters didn't like this poverty-business at all. Their philosophy, you know, prefers being poor with great possessions. So they scampered in, and began to argue against Rosmarini with all their might. A pack of diorthotic pedants, I call them, with a mania for setting people right. The Paparch wavered: being one of those amiable ineptitudes who feel pained when their children scuffle. And then, Rosmarini very intemperately died, leaving behind him the draft of the Apostolic Bull, and his newly-pledged Order of Divine Love, and his state-chariot in our stable. The Arbiters, of course, came into power as paparchal advisers: because no one else had a policy cut and dried at the moment. They promptly used the draft of Rosmarini's Bull for pipe-lights and other purposes. They bade the Divine Lovers to stand in the corner, till such time when their founder's writings could be examined and corrected. And I'll tell you what became of the chariot another time. The Arbiters took twenty years or so, as you see, over the second job. Rosmarini's apostolic views, concerning the trivial question of Temporal Power, were considered to infect his spiritual sons. But the Order of Divine Love hasn't been damned on that count; because the world would have laughed all over its newspapers. Instead, the Arbiters (like the sage serpents they are) waited till Pio Nono had evolted to the superiors, and till they'd made their own position secure as Leo's directors; and then, these thirty-nine harmless intensely uninteresting and altogether negligible propositions were picked out of Rosmarini's philosophy, and ceremonially cursed, as you say. Don't pay the slightest attention to it. The sheep of Christ's flock are always being neglected, while the shepherds exchange anathemas. That's one of the many comical ways in which Christians love one another. It's not one of the things which matter. So make your mind easy. Of course, I'm glad to see that my friends, the Divine Lovers, have incontinently submitted, and thrown the thirty-nine propositions overboard. And now they've quietly retired into private life, like the sensible saints they are, until the tyranny of those oligarchic Arbiters shall be overpast. My dear Crabbe, you know it's frightful waste of time to kick against the pricks."

"Well?" said Nicholas, undesirous of sermons or personalities.

"That's all," the princess starkly announced.

"All about the Divine Lovers, perhaps; but you were going to tell me how the Arbiters hurt you personally."

"God, bless this man! Haven't I been telling you about it all the time?"

"Only by faint indirections. I suppose you mean that the Arbiters were behind Pius the Ninth when He banished you—"

"I do. And then think of the way they made Him treat me when my darling Bosio was married. Oh, my dear Crabbe, you don't know half—"

"But I'm sitting here, dying—simply dying, princess—to (ha!) well, to know all."

"You're not smoking! Well, I do call that a compliment. Have you got your cigarettes? Do smoke one here. Are you sure my gossip doesn't bore you? Where did I leave off when the Ascapettatoli came?"

"You went to spend your exile in England."

"So I did. And took a house in Granville Place. Yes. And then my poor dear Bosio must needs get married. You see what Valeria is now? You'd never have thought she'd turn out so splendidly, if you'd seen her then. She was a gaunt, long-legged white-skinned hoyden of fifteen on her wedding-day, without a single good feature to her name, except her hair. Madonnina, what hair it was! It was the palest, brightest yellow I ever saw; and she really and truly could cover herself with it from head to foot, just like Diva Agnese. We think a lot of those sparkling flaxen girls in Italy; because they're so rare, you know. It was an excellent match in every way. The County of Santa Cotogna is a very good title. Though it is only our second, it's older than all our duchies and princedoms. In fact, till only the other day, it was a sovereign tyranny, with a knighthood of the Golden Quince, and rights of pit, gibbet, and the question, all complete. So I can promise you that my poor Bosio was extremely respectable. Valeria, of course, was a Poplicola in her own right; and I don't need to tell you what that means. It was an immense relief to me to hear that they fancied each other. My darling Bosio was a great anxiety to me. One never quite knew but what some day he might give one for a daughter—but that doesn't signify. Well; they arranged to be married at Turin. Of course, I wanted to be present. But, to get to Turin, in those days, from England, meant going through a bit of what were then the Paparchal States. And I happened to be a bandit, liable to arrest on sight. Monsignor Ermogene, the dear, arranged that difficulty for me; and the Holy Father was persuaded not to be a beast, and prevent a mother from seeing her son married. What harm could an old woman like me do, by just driving across His Holiness's territories and back; for that was all the indulgence permitted. So I went to Turin, and saw them safely married. Lord, how pretty they were! Then, it appeared that Valeria was determined to spend her honeymoon at a castle of hers at Deira, right down in the south by Reggio. She was a most wilful young woman, even then. Nothing would put her off it. The Poplicolæ, of course, came from Ardea originally; but I forget which paparch took that place away from them and gave it to us. It doesn't matter; because it happened quite four hundred years ago. But, you see, Deira, consequently, is the oldest place they have left. She had a little sentiment about it. There she'd go; and nowhere else. But what was the use of her going alone? Who ever heard of such a thing as a girl leaving her husband at the altar-steps for the sake of a sentiment about a tower? Dear me! I suppose I've left something out—"

"Why couldn't her husband go with her?"

"Yes, that's it. You see, my poor dear Bosio was a bandit as well as his wretched mother. Don't dare to think that it runs in the family. Nothing of the kind. I'm proud to say that I'm the only deliberate criminal of the Attendoli-Cesari in this century. My darling Bosio wasn't a bit to blame. It was forced on him. He did so many noble deeds all through the war that the king gave him the medal For Valour on the battlefield, and the Romans elected him senator. He couldn't help being elected, could he? But that's why Pio Nono put the ban upon him—at the instance of the Arbiters, I needn't say. Well; there we were, planted at Turin; Valeria swearing that she would go to Deira, which meant quite a long journey through the Paparchal States; me, a bandit; and Bosio, in the same plight. He was quite willing to risk arrest, and capital sentence, and all the other unpleasantnesses which those rascals had ready for him. Can't I imagine how they'd have glutted themselves with the head of a Roman patrician! They didn't often get a chance of making an example of a man of my Bosio's consequence. He said that he could get through secretly. I really believe he thought an adventure like that would be rather a lark. Men are so queer. But I and Valeria both shrieked at him, till he promised not to be rash. Beside, suppose he had put on a false nose, or something of that kind; and suppose he had managed to evade the Arbiters and their informers, who simply infested the whole peninsula; what good would that have been? Deira is in what was then the kingdom of Naples; and the King of Naples was Pio Nono's ally. It wasn't a question of flitting by night through an enemy's country. It was simply going straight into the depths of it, and thinking oneself safe there. What that girl really wanted was a plenary indulgence for her husband to spend his honeymoon in Pio's friend's kingdom, and a safe-conduct there and back. Neither more, nor less. To my mind, she might as well have wanted the morning-star. However, I myself had to go on to Rome, to pay my respects and to thank my sovereign for His clemency in letting me come to my son's marriage; and I said I'd see if anything could be done. Off I went. The Holy Father was receiving ambassadors; but I claimed my privilege as Roman patrician, and saw them all shunted into an antechamber, while I sailed straight into The Presence. Pio let me go down on my old knees—didn't say a single word, and never even offered me a stool. Why, He wouldn't even concede my patrician's right to His hand—just stuck out His foot, as though I were Mrs. Anybody. Horrid of Him, wasn't it? I was younger then than I am now; but not by any means what you'd call a young woman. Bless me, how hard that floor was! And there was His Holiness sitting stiff and as black as night. People used to rave about His good looks. As for me, I don't think I ever saw a more repulsive face. Nothing is so ugly as a good weak man trying to look hard and bad. All the same, I didn't forget what I'd come for. I behaved very humbly—the hypocrite that I was!—recited my little piece, you know—told Him how grieved I was to have offended Him, how grateful I was for His kindness, and would He be so good as to make a mother happy by letting her son have a pleasant honeymoon. What do you think His answer was? Nothing at all. He got off His throne without a word, and waddled away, leaving me rooted where I was. My dear Crabbe, you know, I've the greatest possible respect for the Holy Father, and all that kind of thing, but you must admit that no gentleman ever would have behaved like that to a lady. Well, I managed to pick up my old bones, and toddled back to Turin. 'My dears,' says I, 'it's no good. The Holy Father's a bit of a bouncer. He won't even speak to me.' And I told them how elaborately I'd been humiliated. Bosio was furious. As for Valeria—well, you know her well enough to understand how she went on. 'You stay here and console your mother,' says she to Bosio, 'and I'll go and have a try. I'm by way of being a Roman patrician myself,' says she; 'and I'd like to see any man, paparch or pork-butcher, who'll dare to deny me a thing I've set my heart upon.' Pretty bold for a girl of fifteen just out of her convent, wasn't it? So off she swam. When she entered the Presence, Pio Nono seems to have been in a better humour. He found her simpatica, and ordered a stool for her at once. Dear me, what a difference those few days of marriage had made to her—especially her neck. You know, quite the loveliest thing in the world is a slim girl who has been happily married for a week or two. I expect she looked something amazing in her black lace, and her heavenly hair piled up and crowned with the Poplicola cat's-eyes. Have you seen that crown? It's the most wonderful thing. Fourteen enormous balls as big as five-shilling pieces—green, you know, and with the mysterious lambent light always moving round to look at you. I always say that it makes her head look as though it were full of huge eyes. She shall show it to you some day. Well; there they sat, all happy and comfortable, He on His throne, and she on her stool paying Him all kinds of pretty compliments, and cooing like the dove she never was. And presently she began to wheedle Him. 'Ah, Santissimo,' says she, 'but what an unhappy girl I am!' 'And why, pray?' says the Holy Father. 'What else can I be, when You're so unkind?' says she. Pío Nono stared. He didn't understand that at all. 'There's my poor husband in Turin, dying to pay his respects to You, and You want to cut off his head,' says she. 'Ah,' says He, 'but what a naughty girl, to go and marry into such a family—a most dangerous family, the General Arbitrator says, and with such a mother-in-law, too!' Rude of Him, wasn't it? 'Ah, well, Holy Father,' says Valeria, 'I didn't marry my mother-in-law; but she really is Your best friend, if You'll believe me,' says she; 'and how can I spend my honeymoon at Deira, unless You'll be a dear and let my husband take me there?' says she. 'Certainly not,' snaps the Paparch, short and sharp. Valeria bursts out crying at once. That made Him uncomfortable. 'Oh, what will people think of me,' says she. 'Fancy a young married woman gadding about like this without her husband! It's not respectable,' says she, leaning her cheek against His knee. 'There, there,' says He, to console her; 'but, you know, you should have thought about that before you married the man,' says He. 'Ah well, Holy Father, it's done now and can't be undone,' says she. And, without letting Pío Nono see what she was doing, she began to fumble under her veil for the pins which held her crown on. 'That's true,' says He, puzzling in a quandary. 'Then we must make the best of it,' says she. 'Yes,' says He, 'you'd better go back and try to make the best of it,' says He. 'I'm not going back without what I came for,' says Valeria. 'And that is?' 'Your Holiness's safe-conduct and plenary indulgence for my darling husband.' 'No,' says Pío. 'Yes,' says Valeria, shouting. And then, my dear Crabbe, all in a moment, she flung herself on her knees, tore off her crown and slipped her arm through it; all her lovely hair fell down in floods, and covered her and the throne-steps and everything. And then she caught His Hand in both of hers, and swore that she'd never let go till He gave her what she wanted. It's solemn fact. Did He? Of course He did, after a bit—walked over to a table, with her hanging on His hand, and wrote the whole thing out then and there. And what's more, she declares that He actually helped her to twist up her hair and put her crown on again, in case the curia should have cause for admiratio. She says she never laughed so much in her life. And now I think that's all. She came back to Turin, and I saw them both off for Deira. Then I went back to my exile in England, where I stayed till Vittoremmanuele, who may have been a beast, but who certainly was a gentleman, was master of Rome."

"Thanks," said Nicholas. "But, princess, didn't you ever make it up with Pius the Ninth?"

"Never. They wouldn't let Him make it up with me."

"And that's why you dislike them?"

"It is."

"I think I understand," said Nicholas Crabbe.

FR. ROLFE.

THE GERMAN FORERUNNERS OF J. S. BACH

LOOKING back into the history of music as an art, it may strike many people as strange, that comparatively so few German composers before Johann Sebastian Bach have come to be widely known. It is true that at a time when the musicians of England, Holland, Italy, and France had already produced masterpieces, the characteristics of the Teutonic school were but scantly developed. It was only when the stimulating influence of the foreign masters began to be felt in Germany, about 1550, that the line of great composers arose, who continued steadily, until the genius of J. S. Bach put such a magnificent crown on the first period of German music. As was perhaps inevitable, his greatness has eclipsed the individual merits of many of his predecessors, some of whom are only now being appreciated as they so richly deserve.

The first attempt to introduce a foreign element into German music appears to have been made by Leo Hasler, a native of Nuremberg, born in 1564. He seems to have been of a singularly enterprising character, and was the first German composer to be educated in the Italian School. Hasler was for some time a pupil of Andrea Gabrieli's, whose teaching pervades his canzonets and madrigals, whilst his larger choral works resemble rather those of Giovanni Gabrieli, his fellow pupil, and nephew of Andrea.

Hasler's influence in Germany was great, and after his stay in Italy we find him in the service of Kaiser Rudolph II. in Prague, the Elector of Saxony, Prince Octavius Fugger in Augsburg, and finally in Nuremberg. He died in 1612 at Frankfurt, a/M. Many of his compositions have been preserved, the "Cantiones Sacre" appearing in the second volume of the "Denkmäler deutscher Tonkunst."

Hasler's fame was undoubtedly overshadowed by that of Heinrich Schütz, a composer of the most remarkable individual genius, and one of Johann Sebastian Bach's most prominent musical forerunners. Born in 1585, Schütz early displayed his aptitude for music, but at the wish of his parents resolved to adopt a university career; and for that purpose spent some time in Marburg. When, however, the Landgrave Moritz of Saxony offered him a yearly stipend of 200 florins, on condition that he should cultivate his musical talents in Italy, Schütz at once accepted the offer, and set out for Venice, where he became the pupil of the celebrated Giovanni Gabrieli.

The Venetian School had now reached the climax of its glory, and Schütz found himself plunged into the reforms which were then being accomplished in music throughout Italy. Both the Gabrieli's were at that time unequalled in their use of double and treble choruses, whilst especially Giovanni's instrumental works were epoch-making in the direction of sonatas for several instruments. The Venetians, moreover, did not exclusively cultivate chamber and sacred music, but also took a lively interest in Monteverde's reforms of the dramatic style, and although he only came to Venice after Schütz's departure, it is highly probable that his works were well known there some years before. After G. Gabrieli's death in 1612, Schütz returned to his native country, and in 1615 was appointed Kapellmeister to the Court in Dresden, where he at once set about introducing Gabrieli's reforms. Much of his work in the direction of opera has unfortunately been lost, including a drama Dafne, the first German work of its kind, and of which only the text has survived. In the line of sacred music a great deal still remains, among other things, four complete sets of Passion music, and the "Seven Last Words from the Cross," all of the highest interest.

From the earliest times, indeed, composers had been attracted to the Gospel stories as very appropriate themes for music, and after the Reformation, these settings became one of the most popular services of the Protestant church, appealing as they did to some of the deepest sentiments of the Teutonic nature. During the early years of "Passion musics," the text was exclusively drawn from the words of the Bible, and B. Gesse, about 1575, was probably the first composer to begin and conclude his work with a chorus, whose words were not taken from the sacred text.

Schütz at once adopted this new idea, and added, among other numbers, a beautiful six-part chorus of the Apostles into one of his settings. The contemplative and personal element thus became more pronounced, and some years later J. Sebastiani introduced chorales into his works, thus further paving the way for the "Matthäus Passion," in which this form of art reached its highest point. Although Schütz continued nominally to occupy his post in Dresden till his death in 1672, much of his time was spent away from Saxony. He returned twice to Italy in order to keep in personal touch with the movements in progress there, and also visited Copenhagen, where he established an orchestra, of which he acted as conductor for a short time. Besides the settings of the Passion above referred to, many other of Schütz's works have happily been preserved and edited by Breitkopf and Härtel. They include a number of Psalms, motetts, madrigals, and chamber music, all of profound beauty and sincerity.

Schütz had a very ardent follower in the Saxon composer Hammerschmidt, whose own great talent, however, saved him from ever becoming a mere imitator of the older master. Hammerschmidt was born in 1602 and died in 1675, after having been for many years organist in Freiberg i/S., and during the latter part of his life, also in Zittau. In the development in Germany of the style of organ and instrumental composition, he is certainly one of the most important musicians of his century, and both the Passion musics of Back, and the oratorios of Händel undoubtedly owe much to Hammerschmidt's "Dialogues." There are still many of his works in existence, among which are to be found some lovely sacred and secular songs, as well as suites of dances, motetts, symphonies for two voices with continuo, or instrumental accompaniment, and chamber music. These, with much other music of the seventeenth century, assuredly deserve more than the almost total oblivion to which they have been consigned. A further impetus was given to the rise of instrumental music in particular by Johann Jakob Froberger, a pupil of Frescobaldi's in Rome, and one of the most genial composers of the early seventeenth century. He was for a long time organist in Vienna, which town still possesses a number of his manuscripts, and died at the Castle of Héricourt, belonging to the Duchess Sibylla of Württemberg.

Froberger wrote with all the ease and finish of the Italian school, and joined to these Southern qualities deep German feeling, which lends to his toccatas, fantasias, capriccios, partitas, etc., a very peculiar charm of their own. A number of his works have appeared in one of the volumes of the "Denkder Tonkunst" in Oesterreich.

Another great composer, who helped largely to encourage music in the North of Europe, was Jan Pieter Sweelinck, a native of Holland, whose name is perhaps more generally known than that of many of his contemporaries. Born in 1562, he studied for many years with the famous theoretician, Zarlino, in Italy, and afterwards succeeded his father as organist in Amsterdam, from where his fame quickly spread. He remained in Amsterdam till his death in 1621. Sweelinck was equally successful as a performer on the organ and composer, but he must especially be forever remembered as the founder of the modern Fugue. He was the first composer to take one theme and treat it in the Fugal style, adding secondary themes in the course of the development. His organ and piano pieces, as well as his Psalms and other vocal works, many extremely beautiful, have been published by Breitkopf and Härtel. Sweelinck was not only a great composer himself, but also the master of some of the most prominent organists of the seventeenth century, and his traditions were handed down through a brilliant line of his pupils and followers.

Foremost amongst these must be mentioned the family of Prätorius, especially Michael Prätorius, one of the best musicians of his day. He was born in 1571 and died in 1621, after having been for some time secretary and Hofkapellmeister to the Duke of Brunswick. Besides suites, motetts, Psalms, and madrigals, his "Musæ Sionæ" is a colossal collection of some 1,244 vocal pieces, of varying lengths and contents. Added to his renown as a composer Michael Prätorius was also the author of the important theoretical work "Sytagma Musicum," which is one of the chief authorities on the instruments and music of that time.

Rather younger than Michael Prätorius was Samuel Scheidt, one of the three contemporary masters whose monosyllabic names each begins with an "S," Schütz and Schein being the others. Scheidt was born in Halle, and after studying with Sweelinck in Amsterdam became organist of the Moritzkirche, and conductor in his native town, where he died in 1654. That Scheidt was a prolific composer may be seen from the number of his works, which include a quantity of songs and chamber music. His most important composition, the "Tabulatura Nova," alone contains a Mass, Psalms, toccatas, fantasias, passamezzi, and "chorale variations," which appear in the "Denkmäler deutscher Tonkunst." Scheidt's chief characteristic is that he was the first composer to take a chorale and set it as a separate organ piece, elaborating the original melody. The chorale formed a very important part of the service of the reformed church, and it gradually became the rule for the organist to improvise a Präludium and Postludium on the hymn sung by the congregation, this being the origin of the "Choralvorspiele" of J. S. Bach.

Johann Herrman Schein, the third of the "S's," was a Saxon and was born in 1586, and died in 1630. He does not seem ever to have been a pupil of Sweelinck, but to have studied in Dresden and Leipzig, before becoming Hofkapellmeister in Weimar, and finally Kantor of the Thomaskirche in Leipzig. He wrote many vocal and instrumental pieces, his best work, the "Gesangbuch Augsbург Konfession," for four to six voices, being preserved in Wernigerode and Leipzig.

Heinrich Scheidemann was one of those who studied directly under Sweelinck, having journeyed to Holland from his home in North Germany; but, besides various songs, only eighteen organ and piano pieces in manuscript seem to have survived to this day. Scheidemann came of a musical family, his father having been organist of the Michaeliskirche in Hamburg (unfortunately burnt a couple of years ago), and he himself filled a like post at the Katharinenkirche in the same city. Hamburg was indeed fast developing into one of the chief centres of North German music, and many famous names can be traced in its registers of organists and Kantors.

First among these were Johann Adam Reinken and Matthias Weckmann, two masters of the highest order, who did much to form the music of their time. Johann Adam Reinken was a pupil of Scheidemann's and was born in 1623. On finishing his studies he was first of all organist of a church in Deventer, but in 1658 he went to Hamburg as his master's subordinate at the Katharinenkirche, of which he became the regular organist after Scheidemann's death. Reinken remained in Hamburg till he died in 1722, and was one of the chief representatives of the North German school of organ-playing, a school in which much stress was laid on the virtuoso side of the instrument. Reinken's reputation as an organist was indeed so widespread that people came from all parts to hear him. Among these was J. S. Bach, who, during his stay in Lüneburg, made several journeys to Hamburg, in order to learn from the great organists of that town.

Bach's admiration for Reinken's works is proved by the fact that several of them are to be found in the "Andreas Bach Buch," which also contains pieces by Tunder, Böhm, and many others. There are also a number of Reinken's organ and piano works in existence, besides the so-called Hortus Musicus for two violins and bass. Matthias Weckmann was a lifelong friend of Reinken's, and was born in Thuringia in 1621. He went early to Dresden, and was for some time the pupil of Heinrich Schütz, who, however, insisted on his also studying with Scheidemann and Jakob Prätorius. He thus acquired the best traditions of both the Dutch and Italian schools. Weckmann first became Court organist in Dresden, during which time he visited Copenhagen, and in 1655 moved to Hamburg, having been elected organist of the Jakobikirche. It was in Hamburg that his fame grew so rapidly, and he was the soul of the world-renowned Collegium Musicum, to which many great composers of all nations thought it an honour to belong, but which almost disappeared after his death. Mattheson, in his Ehrenpforte, devotes a long article to Weckmann, who, indeed, did much to prepare Hamburg for the reception of the opera, of which Mattheson was such a warm advocate. Weckmann had honours showered upon him by the Elector of Saxony, but did not live to enjoy them for long, as he died in 1674. A few of his works are preserved in the "Andreas Bach Buch"; but the credit for bringing the whole scope of his great genius to light belongs to a musician of our own day. Herr Richard Buchmayer, after years of research, has finally discovered most valuable compositions of Weckmann's and other masters, thereby enriching considerably the musical literature of that time. Weckmann was equally great in both his organ and piano compositions, his piano works, indeed, surpassing any of his predecessors in their musical importance and in the demands they make on the performer.

Not far off, in the town of Lübeck, Weckmann and Reinken had an extremely distinguished colleague in the person of Dietrich Buxtehude, also one of the most famous organ-players of his day. He was born in 1637 in Helsingör, and, without doubt, studied with his father, also an organist, before going to Lübeck, where he became the pupil of Franz Tunder. He afterwards married Tunder's daughter, and succeeded his father-in-law as organist of the Marienkirche, a post he held till his death in 1674. It was as organist of the Marienkirche that Buxtehude organised the Abendmusiken, an institution which did much to spread the fame of their originator. The Abendmusiken were concerts which took place after the afternoon service on the five Sundays before Christmas, and were devoted chiefly to organ compositions. Many of the best composers of the time were represented, besides a number of Buxtehude's own happiest inspirations having been written for these occasions. He was especially great in free improvisations, and was looked on with profound veneration by the younger generation. Thus it was that, as a youth, J. S. Bach set out on foot from Arnstadt on purpose to hear the Lübeck master's organ-playing for himself. It is said even that Bach had hopes of becoming Buxtehude's successor and son-in-law, but this position remained vacant for some years, presumably owing to the sharp tongue of Sibylla Margarete Buxtehude, whose hand was one of the conditions attached to the post of organist. However all this may be, it is certain that Bach returned home without attempting to secure the coveted position at the Marienkirche. A charming account of this episode in the great composer's life is given by Karl Söhle in "Sebastian Bach in Arnstadt." Up to the present time all efforts to discover any copies of the Abendmusiken compositions have proved fruitless, but Buxtehude's other works are very numerous and interesting, and include twenty-six cantatas, organ pieces, etc., many being still in the Library of Upsala.

Many people will remember the interest aroused a couple of years ago at the Birmingham Festival by the revival of a beautiful Cantata of Christian Ritter's. This master had unfortunately fallen into almost total oblivion, although when he was conductor in Dresden Mattheson ranks him among the fourteen most celebrated Kapellmeisters of the day, together with Kuhnau, Telemann, Keiser, and Händel. Besides some charming piano pieces in the "Andreas Bach Buch," there are a quantity of sacred compositions of Ritter's in Upsala, many as yet undeciphered from the original Tabulatura.

Another composer, the details of whose life have nearly all been lost, but whose piano and organ works have left a standing memorial to his name, was Johann Kaspar Ferdinand Fischer. It is certain that Fischer was for several years Kapellmeister to the Margrave of Baden, and that he had the reputation of being one of the best piano-players of his day. His style of piano-writing bears distinct traces of French influence in its grace, and many of his compositions are as fit for public performance now as when they were written. The most important of these are the "Musikalisches Blumenbüschlein" and the "Musikalischer Parnass," both containing partitas and arias, with variations for piano, the "Ariadne" and "Blumenstrauss" being collections of organ pieces. Fischer also wrote various vocal numbers, and all his works enjoyed a widespread circulation during his lifetime. A contemporary of Fischer's in Southern Germany was Johann Pachelbel, who was probably an intimate friend of the Bach family. Pachelbel was born in Nuremberg in 1653, and, after passing some years in Vienna, was organist successively in Eisenach, Erfurt, Stuttgart, Gotha and Nuremberg. It was during his stay in Thuringia that he found himself in the midst of the Bachs, who for generations had filled many of the prominent musical offices of that part of the country. During Pachelbel's time Johann Michael and Johann Christoph Bach were the most famous members of their family. They were the uncles of Johann Sebastian, and, without doubt, Johann Christoph Bach was the most illustrious ancestor of his great nephew. Nowadays he is known chiefly by his "Sarabande" and variations for piano. Johann Michael was the author of a number of vocal works, and is also interesting as having been the father of Maria Barbara, Johann Sebastian Bach's first wife. Pachelbel's piano and instrumental music is on the whole an advance on that of Johann Christoph Bach's, being written with greater fluency and ease. He did much to forward the style of piano and chamber works, as can be seen in his numerous partitas for two violins and accompaniment, some of his solo organ and piano numbers being in very close affinity to J. S. Bach. The name which brings us into closest connection with Bach is, however, certainly that of Georg Böhm, one of the greatest composers of the whole seventeenth century. Böhm was also a native of Thuringia, and was born in 1661. He seems to have gone, as a young man, to the North of Germany, for there are traces of his having spent several years in Hamburg before finally settling down as organist in Lübeck, where he died in 1734. In Hamburg he not only had the examples of such masters as Reinken, Weckmann, and Buxtehude before him, but also saw the beginnings of the opera in that city. The opera was then a rarer form of art in the North of Europe, and Hamburg was one of its earliest strongholds. There, indeed, it soon became popular, under the influence of such men as Keiser and Küsser, the friend of Lully, but it is curious to read nowadays the record of bitter antagonism between the supporters and opponents of the opera as it is shown us in some of Mattheson's treatises. Although Böhm must have witnessed the success of Keiser's "Basilius" he seems to have preferred the side of absolute music, for shortly afterwards he moved to Lüneburg, there to follow the direction which appealed most strongly to his individual genius. The experience which he had gained could not, however, fail to be otherwise than beneficial to his later work.

It was in 1700 that Johann Sebastian Bach obtained a scholarship at the Michaelisschule in Lüneburg and that this connection with Böhm began. This connection was in every way profitable to the young musician, on whom the influence of the older artist had the best possible effect, and must assuredly have been a source of joy to Böhm. The works of his which have been preserved all show on what a solid foundation Bach's admiration for his master was grounded. Böhm's great worth has been duly appreciated by Phillip Spitta in his admirable "Life of J. S. Bach," who writes as follows about the Präludium, Fugue and Postludium, contained in the "Andreas Bach Buch": "This beautiful work would alone suffice to place its author amongst the foremost talents of his day. In the first place, the whole is conceived in a totally different form to what had hitherto been known, yet perfectly justified by its musical importance and necessity. A Prelude in 3/2 time, with rising and falling broken chords, and after a short Adagio, a highly-developed Fugue, leading finally to a free Postludium, with harp-like effects, also at last calmed into a concluding Adagio." Spitta goes on to remark especially that the best German qualities are in much of Böhm's work, joined to an ease and lightness which at that time were thought to be almost exclusively French characteristics. There are still many instrumental compositions of Böhm's, as well as a number of Cantatas, waiting to be given the place due to them in any programmes purposing to give examples of the best music, whether of the seventeenth or any other century.

In a short sketch many great names must of necessity be altogether omitted, and others only unworthily touched on, and so with Georg Böhm these lines must end. It has often been a common mistake to suppose that the age of years means a lack of the power of expression in musical compositions, but a study of some of the above-mentioned works will suffice to prove that genius and sincerity remain for ever young, whether written down yesterday or three hundred years ago.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE HOWLS OF HOWELLS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am a constant reader of THE ACADEMY. I value highly your able, fearless, and impartial criticism on literary matters.

I would be glad to have you give your opinion through THE ACADEMY on the following astounding statement from Mr. W. D. Howells, published on page 310 of Harpers' Magazine for July, 1908.

Speaking of the world's great authors, Mr. Howells says: "We could not think of more than ten or a dozen first-rate authors, and if we had begun to complete a list of the best authors we should have had to leave out most of their works. Nearly all of the classics would have gone by the board. What havoc we should have made with the British poets. The Elizabethan dramatists would mostly have fallen under the ban of our negation, to a play, if not to a man. Chaucer, but for a few poems, is impossible; Spencer's poetry is generally duller than the President's message before Roosevelt's time; Milton is a trial of the spirit in three-fourths of his verse; Wordsworth is only not so bad as Byron, who thought him so much worse. Shakespeare himself, when he is reverently supposed not to be Shakespeare, is reading for martyrs; Dante's science and politics outweigh his poetry a thousandfold, and so on through the whole catalogue."

If Mr. Howells cannot discover the genius of the world's greatest authors, does not the fault lie within himself? Is he qualified to give a correct, authoritative opinion upon the world's best writers? How does he rank as a literary artist and critic?

ARTHUR W. ATKINSON.

10 Lawton Avenue, Lynn, Mass, U.S.A.

SUFFRAGITIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Just as, instead of abolishing the House of Lords (which were arrant foolishness), we ought to reform the House of Commons; so that, instead of enfranchising the women (which were stark madness), let us thoroughly re-cast the existing electoral scheme. The Pankhurst gang's cuckoo-cry runs: "Taxation without representation is tyranny. Pure justice demands that propertied women should have some voice as to how the money they disburse is expended"; and only a bigot can deny that they ask more than men have asked before them. Now I cheerfully admit I am bigot enough to do my level best to keep women away from the hustings. But the present situation is illogical, untenable. We must cut the Gordian knot by rendering women incapable of holding any real property whatever. Suffragitis would at once become pleasantly uncommon.

I should regulate the suffrage thus:

- (1.) No woman to be allowed a parliamentary vote in any circumstances.
- (2.) Male voters must be twenty-five years old, and must be married.
- (3.) Every man who rears a family of four to the age of sixteen to be given a second vote.
- (4.) Bachelors at the age of forty may claim one vote.
- (5.) A husband divorced by his wife, or a man who marries a divorcee, would be incapable of exercising the franchise.

The above become law would, I am convinced, raise the state of matrimony once more to its lost honourable position. A married woman would command the respect of her sisters, and a married man have that dominant voice in the councils of the State which is his indubitable right. Women would certainly have no actual voting power; but by marriage alone could a man exercise his, unless prepared to accept a thinking part until reaching his fortieth anniversary.

A. R. MASON.

Cricklewood, N.W.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I learn there is great jubilation amongst the Suffragettes, and gratitude to Miss Caroline Stephens for her exquisitely coherent article in the Nineteenth Century, advocating a "Consultative Chamber of Women." As the Suffragettes say, Miss Stephens' services to the Suffrage cause are immense. Surely she will now be made Commander-in-Chief, for she has shown greater genius in advancing the cause of "Suffragitis" than even the great Mrs. Drummond.

But, sir, we intelligent women who are against "Woman's Suffrage," who, in spite of the amateur and naive leaderettes of the Daily News, have as much intellect as the other side, are ruefully asking ourselves why we should be associated with the fatuous remarks of Miss Caroline Stephens, remarks which you very properly make fun of. The genesis of this remarkable "Matriarchal Chamber," I believe, is due to the distinguished novelist who has for some time successfully carried on the interesting novel of culture, with its orthodoxly unorthodox hero, initiated by her equally eminent sister, the late Miss Edna Lyall, and with the assistance of her able lieutenant, the Secretary of the Woman's Free Trade Union, who has lately appeared as the champion of the "Consultative Chamber Anti-Suffrage," it has no doubt been satisfactorily arranged as to which lady will play the part of High Priestess in this singular "Chamber."

But, sir, permit me to say on behalf of scores of women of intelligence who, like myself and Mrs. Simon, are opposed to the Suffrage (which, by the bye, ought to be called by its right name, "Bachelor Woman Suffrage," for it is stated authoritatively that married women are to be debarred from the vote), that we think this absurd "Chamber of Women" too silly even to discuss.

It is surely a little hard upon women of sense that they should have to bear the onus of such folly. Of course, the very suggestion gives away our whole position, our single reason for existing, and justifies the demands of the Suffragettes. Our position is that we help to make the laws as effectually and directly as do men, and have, from the beginning of time, with the sense of responsibility that any woman who has a heart and a conscience feels, knowing how great her influence and example are in the Home and in society, the twin great arenas for moral and social action.

FRANCES H. LOW.

London, S.E.

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The most amazing genius that ever appeared in the art world was an Englishman who has been neglected in a way that is a deep disgrace to the nation. The pedigree of nearly every other great genius can be traced, and his indebtedness to his predecessors can be discerned; but this man stands alone, without a recognisable predecessor, and without a follower. Despite faults and shortcomings, he possessed in a superlative degree just those qualities which are now most needed for a revival of Art. He boldly left the beaten track, and grappled with subjects till then regarded as impossible. With a Dantesque or Miltonic imagination, he realised the most stupendous events in sacred history, and bodied them forth with a dramatic energy quite unprecedented. His thunderous epics, strangely enough, appealed to the multitude and to men of genius, rather than to his brother painters; but painters, however much they may dislike the storm and stress of his subjects, will not question the claims I urge for him. Christopher North declared that he "had the grandest imagination of them all." Bulwer Lytton said of his startling works that they "ravished the senses of the multitude, and revealed a greatness and a grandeur which were never dreamed of by men until they first flashed with electric splendour upon the unsuspecting public."

It is needless to say I refer to John Martin, whose popularity rose to phenomenal heights early in last century. He received prizes and honours, was made a member of the Belgian Academy, and received the Order of Leopold, and a special medal from Louis Philippe. But the surprise and enthusiasm could not last; he allowed his imagination to feed on itself, and neglect began during his life, and has since deepened, to our national disgrace. He was the pioneer who led the way in that creative idealism which was carried to such glorious heights by Turner, and in which we stand alone. Martin overstepped the modesty of nature, and lacked the "truth" smaller men can give; but in some phases of artistic power he was unrivalled. He was a master of composition, and could order stupendous masses of material into an organic whole; and whether he was working on a twelve-foot canvas or a four-inch wood-block, he gave those "immeasurable spaces, innumerable multitudes, and gorgeous prodigies of architecture and landscape," with breadth and unity of effect.

The neglect of this amazing man of genius is equally amazing; not one of his works has been shown at the Academy Winter Exhibitions, and while all our smaller men are boomed, the name of this Titanic painter is never heard, and his last three works have been wandering around the world without a permanent home. At last an attempt is being made to atone for this disgraceful neglect; the three "Judgment Pictures" are being shown by the United Arts Club at the Grafton Galleries, and a movement is on foot to have them purchased by subscription for presentation to the Newcastle Art Gallery. May it be entirely successful. Of these pictures, "The Great Day of His Wrath" is one of the most perfect of his works, but the others show signs of failing power. In "The Last Judgment," in aiming at the sublime, he toppled over the perilous line; still, it is an amazing work, which only such a giant could have conceived or executed, and these works should find a national home.

E. WAKE COOK.

20, Fairlawn Park, Chiswick, W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

Lord Haiburton. A memoir of his public service, by J. B. Atlay. With a portrait. Smith, Elder, 8s. 6d. net.

FICTION

A Bid for Loyalty. James Blyth. Ward, Lock, 6s.
Love and a Woman. Charlotte Mansfield. Laurie, 6s.
The Adventures of Louis Blake. Louis Becke. Laurie, 6s.
The Long Arm. E. Phillips Oppenheim. Ward, Lock, 6s.
Lucius Scarfield. J. A. Revermort. Constable, 6s.
The Drawn Line. Evelyn Miller. Ouseley, 1s.
Sarah Valliant's Problem. H. Blair. Ouseley, 1s.
The Ways of Men. Herbert Flowerdew. Unwin, 6s.
The Baronet's Wife. Florence Warden. Unwin, 6s.
The Sword and the Cowl. Edgar Swan. Digby Long, 6s.
Paul Richards, Detective. Duncan Dallas. Ouseley, 1s.

HISTORY

Pompeji in Leben und Kunst. Von August Mau. Verlag von Wilhelm Engelmann, £1.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Characters of Paradise Lost. M. A. Woods. Ouseley, 1s.
Penrose's Pictorial Annual. A review of Graphic Arts, Vol. XIV., 1908-9. The Process Year Book, edited by William Gamble. Penrose, 5s. net.
Shakespeare and the Art of English Poesy. William Lawes Rushton. Young, 2s. 6d. net.

POETRY

Toward the Uplands. Later poems by Lloyd Mifflin. Frowde, 5s. net.

THEOLOGY

The Acts of the Apostles. By Adolf Harnack. Translated by the Rev. J. Wilkinson, M.A. Williams and Norgate, 6s.
Man's Great Charter. An exposition of the first chapter of Genesis. Frederick Coggin. Nisbet, 3s. 6d. net.
A Commentary on the Holy Bible, by various writers. Edited by Rev. J. Dummelow. Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.

For Those Who Want Something Fresh.

THE LOG OF A SAILORMAN

6s.

By W. BROOKE

Spectator.—"It is quite obvious that Mr. Brooke writes of that which he knows. His descriptions are true, realistic pictures of life at sea."

Athenaeum.—"Capital reading and full of good yarns, such as we expect from a man who has spent a score of years at sea."

Daily Chronicle.—"This moving and undoubtedly true account of the wanderings of a nation's nomad. . . . And it is all here—touching and finding quick response in one's heart as only human doings, privations and successes can touch us. Here we see the brutality of Then, the greater humanness of Now—the humour, and humour happily without tragedy—the downright heroism—the grandeur. . . . By heaven! it must have been something worth seeing."

Standard.—"It is a first-rate yarn."

At this season of the year new novels flow from the publishers in a ceaseless stream, and the reader finds it difficult to make his choice among them. At such a time there is always a danger of missing a book that really is worth reading; and we would therefore recommend you to lose no time in ordering from your library or bookseller.

"FEET OF WOOL"

By MARY DEWETT

The book is neither "startling" nor "sensational" nor "daring," like so many that are forcibly thrust upon your notice at this time. It is a wholesome, well-written story of English family life, which gains its effects by legitimate means, and never fails to interest. The plot follows naturally from the well-drawn characters of the different actors, and never flags for an instant from the day when Jaqueline comes to visit her wealthy relative to the final scene, which shows us that, in spite of human schemes and treacheries, the gods have all the time been "creeping on with feet of wool."

6s.

THE CENTURY PRESS,
 69 SURREY STREET, STRAND, W.C.

6s.

Books for Sale

ABOUT YORKSHIRE. By THOMAS and KATHERINE MACQUOID; new edition, with 67 illustrations by J. R. Macquoid; post 8vo, cloth; new; pub. by Chatto, 1894, at 7/6; offered 2/9, post free, by WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE. Plates, 20 vols., cloth; new; 50s. (cost £7). Another copy in half-morocco, 70s. (cost £10).—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

A. LIONEL ISAACS,
59 PICCADILLY, W.

RARE BOOKS, AUTOGRAPHS, & MSS.

Speciality:—French Illustrated Books of the Eighteenth Century and Modern French EDITIONS DE LUXE.

*Gentlemen wishing to dispose of any of these will oblige by kindly reporting same to me.

Catalogue of Rare Books and MSS. now ready.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS. intelligently copied, 10d. a thousand words. Neat, accurate work. Yost typewriter. Address Y., 49 Primrose Mansions, Battersea Park, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

GIVEN AWAY QUEEN ALEXANDRA'S HALF-CROWN CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOK

2/6 parcel for 1/3	RAPHAEL TUCK'S XMAS CARDS.	2/6 parcel for 1/3
40 for 1/- all by Tuck.	HALF PRICE including Envelopes and sent Post-Free. Containing 25 Charming Xmas Cards, all TUCK'S folding and inset designs. CLUSTER DE LUXE, Post Free with Envelopes, 2 stamps extra. Send early for these.	20 for 6d. as a sample
Fine Fun for the Fireside, six stamps.
100 for 1s. 6d.
Tuck's Xmas Cards. Big Bargain Bundle. 10 for 4d. Xmas Postcards, very pretty, 20 for 6d. Perfumery Par Excellence, 3 Sixpence Post Paid.
BIG BOX OF TEN TOYS FOR A SHILLING.
T. B. L. KING'S PREMISES, Savoy Corner, Strand, London.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

Now Ready, completing the record of the Book Year, the January BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR.—Small Talk on some Large Literary Matters, with Illustrations to Brighten the Way.

WHAT BOYS READ.—A Talk with the Editor of "The Boys' Own Paper."

"SKIED!"—Conquest of the Air a Literary Necessity.

"PUNCH" POETRY.—And a Quarrel between Tennyson and Lytton.

MISSES WINKWORTH.—And their Gossip about Some Great Victorians.

A LONDON LETTER.—Do "Grown-Ups" read Books Written for Young Folk?

THE GENERAL READER.—Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

LIGHT AND LEADING.—New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.—Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH.—A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS.—Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT

Eight years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the chairman. The object in view is clearly stated in the following extract from a letter signed by the Bishop:—

"At present the Institution has an income of only eighteen pounds a year, and this is insufficient for its due maintenance. The front of the Museum has recently been restored, but the two rooms now used for exhibits are overcrowded, and we feel that the whole of the house should be devoted to the public, who would then be admitted to the 'John Gilpin' room and other rooms now occupied by the Curator. For this purpose it will be necessary to form a small endowment, and it has been calculated that the sum of £2,200 is required. We sincerely trust that the public will respond generously to this appeal."

HANDLEY DUNELM, Chairman of the Committee.
The Secretary is MR. THOMAS WRIGHT, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

Concerning Debating Circles

All who are interested in the formation of Debating and Reading Circles in Clubs and Social Institutes, in Town and Country, should send a penny stamp for a Sixteen-Page Booklet on

How to Form a Debating Circle

PUBLIC OPINION

31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

Each week PUBLIC OPINION gives a series of subjects for debate. It not only gives subjects, but puts the questions to be answered, and furnishes a multitude of facts and opinions with which speeches can be made on all sides. No other paper gives so much valuable information on all the great topics of the day. It presents the cream of all the best thought in the best papers and magazines and books.

Every week lengthy and informing summaries of two of the most important books are given, so that in the course of a year the reader is put in possession, by direct quotation, of over one hundred books. In fact, the information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of many pounds.

By a paper like this interests you, write for a Free Specimen Copy to the

Manager of PUBLIC OPINION
31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

It is published at Twopence Weekly. Post free in the United Kingdom 10s. 10d. yearly, or 13s. yearly abroad.

Numerous complaints having reached this Office
as to difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY, we publish below a first list of the names and addresses of Newsagents and Booksellers at whose establishments THE ACADEMY is always on sale. Further lists will be published from time to time.

Messrs. Samuels and Taylor, 7 New Broad Street, E.C.	Mr. W. Morflew, 19 Edgware Road, W.	Messrs. F. Calder Turner, 1 Bathurst Street, Hyde Park Gardens, W., Also 8 Craven Road, Paddington, W.
Messrs. Davies and Co., 23 Finch Lane, Cornhill, E.C.	Messrs. Scripp's Library, 13 South Molton Street, W.	Mr. M. E. Wilson, 8 Clarendon Road, Holland Park, W.
Mr. E. Born, 80 Copthall Avenue, E.C.	Mr. H. Offord, 15 Avery Row, Brook Street, W.	Murley Brothers, 112 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Mr. James Barker, 2 Castle Court, Birchin Lane, E.C.	The Manager, Foreign Bookstall, Café Royal, 68 Regent Street, W.	Mrs. E. Jarvis, 186 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Messrs. Leathwait and Simmons, 5 Birchin Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bolton's Library, 81 Knightsbridge, W.	Mr. M. Pittman, 41 Notting Hill Gate, W.
Mr. George Blair, 16 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Mr. E. George, 13 Swallow Street, Regent Street, W.	C. H. Cooke, 11 Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Messrs. Pottle and Sons, 14 and 15 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Messrs. Knowles and Co., Crown Court, Pall Mall, W.	Mr. S. C. Carter, 1 Porchester Gardens, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Mr. T. Jenner, 40A King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.	Messrs. Jones, Yarell and Poulter, 8 Bury Street, St. James Street, W.	Messrs. Stancesby and Co., 179 Sloane Street, Belgravia, S.W.
Messrs. Wm. Dawson and Sons, Ltd., 121 Cannon Street, E.C.	Messrs. May and Williams, 160 Piccadilly, London, W.	Messrs. M. Hildreth and Co., 10 and 12 Fulham Road, S.W.
Messrs. E. T. Bottom and Co., 51A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 97 Queen Street, E.C., and Also at 165A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 32 Chancery Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bingham and Co., 97 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, W.	Mr. Henry Roberts, 2 Lower Grosvenor Place, S.W.
Mr. George Blair, 11 King Street, Cheapside, E.C.	Mr. F. Batson, 82 Grosvenor Street, W.	Messrs. Scooter and Law, Belgrave Mansions, Grosvenor Gardens, S.W.
St. Bride's Publishing Co., 96 Fleet Street, E.C.	The News Stores, (next) Hyde Park Hotel, Albert Gate, W.	Mr. J. Shrubh, 165 Ebury Street, Pimlico, S.W.
Messrs. Jones, Yarell and Co., 37 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.	Messrs. T. Rastall and Son, 81 Ebury Street, London, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith, Bookshop, Sloane Square, S.W.
Mr. Harrison, Devereux Court, Temple, W.C.	Mr. T. Wyatt, 198 Ebury Street, Pimlico, W.	Messrs. Wright and Son, 43 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.
Messrs. Parnell and Co., 63 Southampton Row, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.	Mr. W. Weaver, 157 Great Portland Street, W.	Messrs. Jenson Bros., 129 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookstall, Hotel Russell, Russell Square, W.C.	Messrs. Toler Bros., Ltd., 10 Coptic Street, Bloomsbury.	Mr. A. F. Vedy, 265 and 420 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. C. G. Horton, 38 Marchmont Street, Russell Square, W.C.	Mr. William Green, 138 Great Portland Street, W.	Mr. George R. Riches, 510 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. E. C. Willis, 1 Green Street, Leicester Square, W.C.	Mr. Noble, 28 Upper Marylebone Street, W.	Mr. R. Snare, 21 Lower Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Mr. J. Browne, 5 New Street, Covent Garden, W.C.	Messrs. Keith, Prowse and Co., Bookstall, Langham Hotel, W.	Messrs. Blake and Co., 62 Putney High Street, S.W.
Mr. H. Hunt, 12 Bury Street, Bloomsbury, W. C.	Mr. I. Carpenter, 17 Lancaster Street, Lancaster Gate, W.	The Idler's Own Newsagency, 169 Upper Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Mr. W. G. Palmer, 5 West Kensington Terrace, W.	Mr. M. A. Ridge, 43 Craven Road, Hyde Park, W.	Mr. R. Andrews, 120 Upper Richmond Road, East Putney, S.W.
Messrs. Yates' Library, 79 Wigmore Street, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookshop, 19 Craven Road, Paddington, W.	Mr. Wm. John Arnold, Approach Book Stores, London Bridge, S.E.
Mr. H. Perkins, 3 Seymour Place, Portman Square, W.	Messrs. Crockett and Co., 22 Leinster Terrace, W.

Persons who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested kindly to communicate with

*The Manager of THE ACADEMY,
 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C.*

EVERETT & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS

THE LIFE OF COL. FRED BURNABY

By THOMAS WRIGHT, Author of "The Life of Sir Richard Burton," etc.

One Vol. Demy 8vo, with 60 Plates, 12s. net.

"All the stirring incidents in Burnaby's meteoric career are related with force and fidelity, and the many anecdotes of his deeds of prowess make delightful reading."—Sunday Times.

"A Cœur de Lion in physique, strength, bravery, and magnanimity. . . . The author has told the story of his life right well."—Daily Graphic.

"Admirable amongst biographies."—Army and Navy Gazette.

LONDON IN THE SIXTIES

By "One of the Old Brigade"

With Illustrations by HAROLD PIFFARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A Book of interesting Recollections and many anecdotes of London as it was nearly two generations ago. The greater part of them are sporting and dramatic, but for the social historian there is much that is interesting in connection with old streets, inns, and clubs.

MY LIFE AND DANCING

By MAUD ALLAN

Illustrated from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

(SECOND EDITION NOW READY.)

"Gives some delightful stories of her youth in California, her student days, her début in Berlin, and of her triumphs at the Palace."—Outlook.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

ENGLISH BIRD LIFE

By H. KNIGHT HORSFIELD

With 100 Photographs from Nature specially taken for this Book. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"An admirable book."—Country Life.

"The text combines in an unusual degree familiar description with scientific knowledge. . . . The book is one that will be eagerly welcomed."—Glasgow Herald.

"A wholly delightful book, as conspicuous for its close and sympathetic observation as for its graceful and scholarly style."—The Bulwark.

"Splendidly illustrated."—Scotsman.

"Among the many excellent books on ornithology which have been recently produced a conspicuous place must be given to this delightful volume."—Outlook.

SPORT INDEED

By THOMAS MARTINDALE

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt extra, 6s. net. Illustrated from Photographs.

CONTENTS:—A Caribou Hunt; Calling the Moose; The Fun of Hunting; A Day in the Big Woods; A Close Call; etc., etc.

THE SCOTTISH TERRIER

By O. J. DAVIES

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Illustrated from Photographs.

"Mr. Davies is a master of his subject, and to all who are interested in terriers his book should appeal."—Badminton Magazine.

HORSES

THEIR POINTS AND MANAGEMENT IN HEALTH AND DISEASE.

By F. T. BARTON M.R.Q.V.S.

Demy 4to, 15s. net. Fully illustrated from Photographs.

"A handsome volume, and as a present to a beginner in horse-lore likely to prove acceptable. The illustrations are excellent."—The Field.

THE PRACTICE OF EQUINE MEDICINE

By FRANK T. BARTON, M.R.Q.V.S.

Author of "The Veterinary Manual," etc., etc.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON

Author of "The Call of the Wild," "Love of Life," etc.

"There is no sign in 'The Iron Heel' of any falling-off from the strong virile style to which Mr. London has accustomed us. . . . It is a remarkable book."—Daily Mail.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM

Author of "Ezra the Mormon," etc., etc.

"In these days of anemic fiction a novel inspired with such passionate indignation is something of a rarity, and, alike for its matter and its manner, deserves the attention which it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

"A justifiable attack on those who think to honour God by dishonouring His methods."—Daily Telegraph.

"The novel is ably written. It should find favour with all except the peculiar sect to whom it is frankly and fearlessly antagonistic."—Scotsman.

A ROYAL HOAX

By FRED WHISHAW

Author of "The Great Green God," etc.

"A good story, chock-full of adventure."—Times.

"We will leave Mr. Whishaw to tell in his crisp and humorous fashion the tale of the imbrolios and complications which ensue. They are so dramatic that the novel would undoubtedly make an admirable and very modern play."—Yorkshire Post.

ROSALIND AT REDGATE

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Author of "The House of a Thousand Candles," etc.

"Mr. Nicholson has invented a new style of romance. . . . The reader is kept stimulated and enthralled to the end."—Morning Post.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM

Author of "The King's Scarlet," etc., etc.

London: EVERETT & CO., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

PUBLICATIONS OF
THE OPEN COURT
 PUBLISHING CO.

CHRISTIANITY OF TO-DAY SERIES.

NOW READY.

GOD. An Enquiry into the Nature of Man's Highest Ideal, and a Solution of the Problem from the Standpoint of Science. By PAUL CARUS. 239 pp., cloth, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

JESUS AND MODERN RELIGION. By EDWIN A. RUMBALL. 160 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

WHAT WE KNOW ABOUT JESUS. By CHARLES F. DOLE, D.D. 89 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

PARALIPOMENA. Remains of Gospels and Sayings of Christ. By BERNHARD PICK, Ph.D., D.D. 158 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND MINISTRY OF JESUS. According to the Historical Method. Being a Course of Lectures by RUDOLPH OTTO. Translated from the Third Unaltered Edition by W. J. WHITBY, D.D. Circa 85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

SCRAPBOOK OF ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS. By WM. F. WHITE, State Normal School, New Paltz, N.Y. Cloth, 248 pp., 3s. net.

A few of the seventy sections of this attractive book have the following suggestive titles:—Familiar Tricks, Algebraic Fallacies, Geometric Puzzles, Linkages, A Few Surprising Facts, Labyrinths, The Nature of Mathematical Reasoning, Alice in the Wonderland of Mathematics. The book is supplied with Bibliographic Notes, Bibliographic Index, and a copious General Index.

MAGIC SQUARES AND CUBES. By W. S. ANDREWS. With Chapters by PAUL CARUS, L. S. FRIERSON, and C. A. BROWNE, jun., and Introduction by PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 206 pp., cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

THE SCOPE AND CONTENT OF THE SCIENCE OF ANTHROPOLOGY. By JUUL DIESERUD, A.M. 200 pp., cloth, gilt top, 8s. 6d. net.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S MARTYRDOM, "A Satire." By PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 67 pp., boards with cloth back, 4s. 6d. net.

BEL, THE CHRIST OF ANCIENT TIMES. By Dr. HUGO RADAU. 60 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

AVESTA ESCHATOLOGY. Compared with the Books of Daniel and Revelation. By Dr. LAWRENCE H. MILLS. 8vo, viii-85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. DAVID P. ABBOTT, widely known as the Author of "Behind the Scenes with the Mediums," feels that a star of first magnitude has arisen on the magical horizon, and accordingly has written a pamphlet describing in glowing colours

THE MARVELLOUS CREATIONS OF JOSEFFY. 25 pp., 15 Illustrations, 9d. net.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE HISTORY OF A STRANGE CASE: a Study in Occultism. 50 pp., paper, 9d. net.

Please write for Illustrated Catalogue.

THE
PEOPLE OF THE POLAR NORTH.

A Record by KNUD RASMUSSEN.

Being a presentment of the life, character, customs, legends, and religious belief of the Polar Eskimos, collected during a stay with them, together with some actual experiences narrated by members of the almost extinct race of the East Greenlanders, and a collection of East Greenlandic legends and fables, and also containing sketches of life among the Christianised West Greenlanders of the present day.

Compiled from the Danish Originals and Edited by G. HERRING.

With 150 Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by COUNT HARALD MOLTKE. Royal 8vo, £1 1s. net.

THE STORY OF A LIFETIME. By Lady PRIESTLEY. With numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

ANNE SEYMOUR DAMER. By PERCY NOBLE. With 35 Illustrations and a Frontispiece in Coloured Photogravure, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE CARDINAL DEMOCRAT. Being the Life and Work of the late Cardinal Manning. By I. A. TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA. By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD. Edition de Luxe, printed on specially made hand-made paper, watermarked "Light of Asia," and Illustrated with Pictures of Indian Scenes from Photographs by MABEL EARDLEY WILMOT. Demy 8vo, handsomely bound in Roman vellum, 15s. net.

THE PRIVATE PALACES OF LONDON. By E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR, Author of "The Squares of London." With over 40 Illustrations, crown 4to, £1 1s. net.

DUBLIN CASTLE AND THE IRISH PEOPLE. By BARRY O'BRIEN. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF THE KINGS OF EGYPT. By Dr. WALLIS BUDGE. In 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s. net.

FATHER TYRRELL'S MODERNISM: An Expository Criticism of "Through Scylla and Charybdis," in an Open Letter to Mr. Athelstan Riley. By HARLUYT EGRTON. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH. With a Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. net.

This edition has been revised, and contains an Appendix on the sale of "The Vicar of Wakefield."

THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD. By CHARLOTTE M. MASON. Vol. I. THE HOLY INFANCY. F'cap 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net. Vol. II. HIS DOMINION. F'cap 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ÆNEID OF VIRGIL. BOOKS VII-XII. Translated into blank verse by HENRY SMITH WRIGHT, B.A. Vol. II. completing the Æneid. F'cap 8vo, net, 5s.

FATHER PAUL. By JAMES CASSIDY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It has a certain charm as potent as it is hard to analyse. It would probably bear even the test of reading a second time."—Birmingham Post.

A PROLOGUE, AND OTHER POEMS.

By WILLIAM GERARD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Mr. Gerard shows real poetic talent. His poetry is really thoughtful, and while not difficult to read, compels the reader's attention."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Please write for our Illustrated Autumn List.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & CO., Dryden House, 43 Gerrard St., London, W.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1915

JANUARY 16, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible bitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man to sleep with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizened "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly hags and matrons fair!
His votaresses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Croones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice.

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-flaying. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

CREIGHTON MEMORIAL LECTURE-SHIP. Founded in memory of the late Dr. Mandell Creighton, Bishop of London.

The CREIGHTON MEMORIAL LECTURE for the year 1908-9 will be delivered at King's College, Strand, W.C., on Tuesday, January 19th, 1909, at 5 p.m., by Dr. G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D., LL.D., M.A., Dean of St. Dunstons, Cambridge.

Subject—

"THE ARRIVAL OF NAPOLEON III."
Admission free.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Hamm's worth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols. 16s. 6d. for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d. Rhoad's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s. for 10s. 6d.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON)

DEPARTMENT FOR TRAINING TEACHERS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Theory, Practice, and History of Education—J. W. ADAMSON, B.A., Professor of Education (Head of the Department).

Ethics—Rev. A. CALDECOTT, D.Litt. D.D., Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy.

Psychology—C. S. MYERS, M.A., M.D., Professor. W. BROWN, M.A., Lecturer.

The Course, which includes Practical Work in Secondary Schools, extends over one academical year, beginning in October or January. It is suitable for those who are preparing to take the Teachers' Diploma, University of London, or the Certificate of the Teachers' Training Syndicate, University of Cambridge.

The Fee is £20 for the year if paid in advance, or Eight Guineas per Term (Three Terms in the Year).—Application should be made to Prof. ADAMSON, King's College, Strand, W.C.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Tuesday next, January 19, at Three o'clock, Professor KARL PEARSON, M.A., F.R.S., first of Two Lectures on "ALBINISM IN MAN." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 21, at Three o'clock, Professor J. O. ARNOLD, D.Met., first of Two Lectures on "MYSTERIES OF METALS." Half-a-Guinea.

Saturday, January 23, at Three o'clock, Professor Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER, C.V.O., D.C.L., LL.D., R.A., first of Two Lectures on (1) "THE CRITICAL FACULTY," (2) "SIGHT AND SEEING." Half-a-Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S WINTER EXHIBITION of PORTRAITS and LANDSCAPES by Early British Masters is NOW OPEN.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea Diamond Star Fountain Pen, 1909 Model for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it particularly everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular. It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/- is offered as an advertisement for 5/8 each.

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Managers, Messrs. FOUNTAIN & CO. Ltd., 71 High Holborn, London, W.C. And acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

NEW AND INTERESTING BOOKS

BY THE
REV. J. STUART HOLDEN

REDEEMING VISION

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.
"Marked by genuine spirituality, clearness of expression, definiteness of personal application, together with not a little apt poetic illustration."—Churchman.

SUPPOSITION AND CERTAINTY

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. net (by post 2s. 3d.). Leather, limp lambskin, gilt, 3s. net (by post 3s. 3d.).

BY THE
REV. C. L. MARSON

THE PSALMS AT WORK

Being the English Church Psalter, with notes on the use of the Psalms. Revised and Enlarged Edition. Post 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net. With wide margins for notes.

"How Mr. Marson managed to accumulate such a rich store of illustrations of the use of the Psalter is not explained, but he has succeeded beyond the hope which one author might fairly be expected to excite."—Guardian.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST—its True Definition

PREFACE BY THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

Contributors: Rev. HUBERT BROOKE, M.A.; Rev. D. M. MCINTYRE; Rev. Preb. WEBB-PEPLOE, M.A.; Rev. W. FULLER GOUGH; Rev. JOHN WILSON; Prof. JAMES ORR, D.D.; Rev. Canon BARNES-LAWRENCE; Rev. D. D. DINSDALE T. YOUNG; Rev. HARRINGTON C. LEE, M.A. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

SUGGESTIONS FOR BIBLE STUDY

By Rev. F. R. MONTGOMERY HITCHCOCK. PREFACE BY THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF OSSORY, CHARLES F. D'ARCY, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. net.

Three New Missionary Books.

A VISIT TO CHINA'S MISSIONS

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A. Fully Illustrated from Photographs specially obtained en route.

"In itself the narrative is delightful, and the excellent pictures from Mr. Webster's snapshots invest these bright pages with an added charm."—Record.

COVERLEIGH RECTORY

By MARY D'AGUILAR.

"A delightfully fresh missionary story. . . . The needs of missionaries on the field are vividly portrayed."—Methodist Times.

BROKEN SNARES

By EVELYN S. KARNEY (C.E.Z.M.S.).

PREFACE BY THE LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM. "Good as the style is, the matter is even better, and those who wish to see the work-a-day life of a missionary and to appreciate the difficulties that assail him will find this little volume an 'eye-opener.'"—Church Gazette.

WORKS BY THE
REV. CANON WALPOLE

PERSONALITY AND POWER or, The Secret of Real Influence

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
"A thoughtful and beautiful book. . . . These addresses are mature and sympathetic and fitted to be most helpful."—Church Family Newspaper.

VITAL RELIGION

or, The Personal Knowledge of Christ

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
"Dr. Walpole has given us a work of real spiritual value, and we heartily commend it to all thoughtful readers."—Guardian.

NEW WORK BY THE VEN. ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE

THE HOPE THAT IS IN ME

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.
The Sermons contained in this Volume were directly suggested by questions from those who had a right to ask the Preacher "a reason concerning the hope that is in him."

Uniform with

SERMONS PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

SIXTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.
"Thoughtfully and carefully chosen sermons, deserving of careful study."—Church Family Newspaper.

"They are vigorous, and frequent poetical quotations impart a flavour of literary effort."—Times.

NEW (?) THEOLOGY

Thoughts on the Universality and Continuity of the Doctrine of the Immanence of God

SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

"The sermons are able and interesting, and open up new and suggestive lines of thought."—Scotsman.

CHEAP EDITION. NEW STYLE FOR THE POCKET.

Foolscap 8vo. Clear type. Cloth gilt, gilt top, silk Register, 2s. net (post free, 2s. 5d.).

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST

By THOMAS KEMPIS. Faithfully Rendered into English Rhythm after the manner in which it was written. Preface by the late CANON LIDDON.

BEHOLD I SHOW YOU A MYSTERY

By "LEX," B.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. 54 Illustrations by the Author.

This remarkable book deals with the mysteries of Revealed Truth in a profoundly interesting, fascinating, and convincing manner; startling sometimes as to its conclusions; but these conclusions are based on premises that cannot be controverted.

BY THE RIGHT HON.
AUGUSTINE BIRRELL

MEN, WOMEN, AND BOOKS

Foolscap 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. Cheap Edition, new style cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.
"A very entertaining and handy little book for leisurely reading."—Times.
For complete list of works, please write to the Publisher.

THE COMPLETE BENEDICT

By LAW-LACEY. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

Marriage is a subject which is never exhausted and always interesting to everyone. The "Complete Benedict" is a book to be thoroughly enjoyed to keep by one, and to help to make married life worth living.

FAMOUS LOVE MATCHES

By C. J. HAMILTON. An unusually interesting work. An Ideal Gift Book. Illustrated by several authentic Portraits. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

CANADIAN LIFE AS I FOUND IT

By HOMESTEADER. Four Years' Homesteading in the North-West Territories. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 1s. 6d. net.

A ROYALIST RAID and other Poems

By WALTER CLIFFORD MELLOR. Foolscap 8vo, Japanese Parchment, 2s. net.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

A BEAUTIFUL STAR

Notes on the Star of Bethlehem. Foolscap 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. net.

New Books for the Lenten Season

CONFIRMATION LECTURES

By the Rev. Canon A. E. BARNES-LAWRENCE, M.A.

A Series of Notes on the Church Catechism. New and Revised Edition. Cloth, 1s. net (post free 1s. 2d.).

FOR USE BY THE CANDIDATES.

A Syllabus of Confirmation Lectures: Brief and Simply Arranged. Crown 8vo, 16 pp., 1d., or 6s. 8d. per 100 net.

"Mr. Barnes-Lawrence is clear in his arrangement and in his statement of doctrine. We know of no more convenient volume of its kind."—Record.

WITH CHRIST TO GETHSEMANE

By HELEN THORP. A book for use during the Forty Days of Lent. Preface by the LORD BISHOP OF ROCHESTER. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. net (by post 2s. 4d.).

RESURRECTION LIFE

By the Rev. Canon N. JONES, M.A. A Prayer Book Study for Eastertide. Introductory Note by the Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net (post free 2s. 3d.).

LIGHT FOR LESSER DAYS

By Rev. Canon TUCKER. With Meditations on the Black-Letter Saints of the Prayer Book. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (by post 6s. 4d.).

Thoughts on BIBLE TEACHING

By CONSTANCE NANKIVELL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net (by post 1s. 2d.). A book which will definitely help both parents and teachers in studying and teaching the Bible and Church Catechism.

Write for our Descriptive Catalogue of New Gift Books and General Literature, sent free by post on application.

LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 675	Noyes about Morris . . . 684
The Magic Orchard . . . 677	Love and a Woman . . . 686
Mr. Shaw's Obituary . . . 677	Shorter Reviews . . . 686
Archer and Hankin . . . 678	The Material Delight of
Whiteley's at the	Books 688
Comedy 680	Docket 689
January 681	Correspondence . . . 689
The Way of the World 682	Books Received . . . 691

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER has been giving his views on "Philistinism" and the nude in art. He is of opinion that "The noblest work of art is the representation of the human figure, and flesh-painting represents the highest work of the painter. When one produces a masterpiece in this direction it is nobody's business to inquire as to the identity of his model or as to what her moral character may have been." With all of which we can readily agree, but when Sir Hubert von Herkomer goes on to particular instances he gets on to dangerous ground. He says: "Some years ago I painted a life-size nude figure of a female, with a landscape background, and I attached to it the poet's line, 'All beautiful in naked purity.' I sent it to the Royal Academy and was told by a member of the Hanging Committee that, in the face of English prejudice, they dare not hang it in the room it deserved. As a fact, it practically emptied the room in which it was hung." It does not appear to have occurred to Sir Hubert von Herkomer that possibly the startling effect produced by his picture was not due solely to "Philistinism." For our part, we can only say that if the life-size female nude figure was painted in the same style as the life-size male clothed figures which he is in the habit of exhibiting at the Royal Academy, we are not surprised at the consternation it seems to have evoked. Perhaps the member of the Hanging Committee who said that they could not put the picture in the room it deserved was pulling Sir Hubert's leg. Might he not have been thinking of the cellar as the most suitable room? However, be that as it may, we are glad to hear that "in the end a German Philistine bought the picture and built it into the niche of his dining-room, where it evokes many expressions of appreciation," so that, on the whole, everything seems to have worked out for the best in the long run.

We are inclined to think that the Puritanism which is supposed to afflict the English in matters of art is greatly exaggerated. Objections to the nude in painting are, of course, made from time to time by silly people, but no particular notice is taken of them, and if it were not for the idiotic habit indulged by the lesser newspapers of giving violent prominence to any kind of nonsense which may be talked or written by any of the numerous half-witted cranks and agitators who infest, and always have infested, these islands, we should probably not hear even so much as we do on the subject. Anyone who is infected with the notion that prudery, generally speaking, is a specially English attribute should visit a French seaside place and compare its rigid regulations with our own free and easy seaside habits in the matter of sea-bathing.

We have received the following letter from Professor Skeat:

SIR,—May I be allowed to explain that the article on "Simplified Spelling" to which you refer in the last number of THE ACADEMY, at page 651, was not partly written (as you suppose) by "Professor Skeat," but by Walter W. Skeat, author of "Malay Magic" and "The Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula"?

When you speak of "the poets and writers of prose" who use English language "for the purposes of beauty," it would be interesting to know whether, amongst these, you include such writers as Shakespeare, Spenser, and Milton. One object which the "Simplified Spelling Society" has before it is to induce people to ask themselves why it is that they spell as they do, and whether it is true that Shakespeare's works were originally printed with the spelling which we employ now? The very fact that spelling is now judged of by the eye instead of by the ear as formerly, is a severe practical satire upon our present methods. Whilst you would object to the use of "jogd," instead of "jogged," you may perhaps admit that "blest" is no more barbarous than "blessed."

A very great deal might be gained by the substitution of "giv" for "give," and by the tardy admission that there is no reason why v should not be admitted as a final letter like any other consonant. It would enable us to distinguish between "a live dog" and the verb "to liv." What matters much more is that if such a reform were carried out, there would be one anomaly the less for children to master. The ultimate result of many such reforms would be the saving of years of labour to millions of children, and the saving of large sums of money, for we might employ much shorter forms than those which we now use.

The objection which most people have to all such reform really goes back to the fact that they have forgotten their own early difficulties, and have no sympathy with or pity for the affliction to be endured by those who have yet to learn.

We really do claim, as collaborators, such poets as Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton. All who will study their spelling will come to know much more about the subject than they do at present. It is precisely this want of knowledge which has wrought such invincible prejudice against the consideration of the question. WALTER W. SKEAT, Litt.D.

It would be interesting to know what Professor Skeat means by the first part of his letter. Are we to understand that the article on "Simplified Spelling" was not written by him, but by another person of the same name? In any case, Professor Skeat appears to accept responsibility for the article, and as we are not good at conundrums we shall not endeavour to solve this one. When we spoke of "the poets and writers of prose who use the English language for purposes of beauty" we were referring, of course, to living writers; one can't very well consult the opinion of dead writers. Our reference to Mr. Swinburne surely made our meaning obvious. When Professor Skeat invites us to ask ourselves "whether it is true that Shakespeare's works were originally printed with the spelling which we employ now" he seems to us to go dangerously near to impertinence. Professor Skeat must know that we are just as well aware as he is that the spelling in Shakespeare's time differed from the spelling of our day. But that is neither here nor there, and the assumption of Professor Skeat that only very learned persons like himself are aware of what is a matter of common knowledge is an amusing instance of the arrogance of the "Professor" as opposed to the poet and the man of letters. What we said last week, and what we say again now, is that any proposals to change the spelling of the English language would require the sanction of those who use that language for the purpose of beauty in verse and prose—i.e., poets and writers of prose. To put the case quite frankly, we contend that a man who has written even half a dozen beautiful sonnets knows a great deal more about the English language than all the "profest students of English language" and all the dry-as-dust experts in etymology put together in a bracket squared. As to the difference between "blest" and "jogd," if Professor Skeat can't see it we are sorry for him. Does it not occur to him that "st" is a common collocation of letters and does not offend the eye for that reason? It occurs in such words as west, nest, rest, and a thousand others. Where is the word in the English language that ends in "gd"? We notice that in the article on "Simplified Spelling" the word importance is spelt "importans." That may be the way Mr. Archer and Professor Skeat pronounce the word, but it is the wrong way for all that. It may seem to Professor Skeat that his arguments in favour of simplified spelling are unanswerably convincing—in fact, he seems to have arrived at a state of mind in which he assumes that the mere fact that Professor Skeat says so settles the question once for all. The fact that his arguments are not considered convincing by those who have a knowledge of the English language which he can never hope to possess, should at any rate "giv him paus."

The great Mr. Horatio Bottomley's beautiful scheme for obtaining financial assistance from the public for the purposes of his defence does not seem to have survived the comments we made on it last week. At any rate, we can find no mention of it in the current issue of his noble journal. Ever since we took the liberty of refusing to insert in our advertisement columns the prospectus of the John Bull company the rage against us of Mr. Bottomley and his gallant lieutenant, the rejected of Constantinople, has gone on increasing in a truly alarming manner. This week we are pained to find that Mr. Bottomley has come to the conclusion that the editor of this paper is no gentleman. This is a crushing blow, especially coming from such a source, and he is feeling duly chastened. Curiously enough, the same indictment has been brought against him before now on at least two occasions: once by a taxi-cabman disturbed at his tea and compelled unwillingly to face the cold blasts of a winter's evening; and at another time by a bibulous butler, whose undue fondness for a cheerful glass had provoked rebuke. The evidence against him is accumulating in a disquieting fashion. Meanwhile, we note that Jim Crow does not deny the soft impeachment which we brought against him last week—namely and to wit, that when he stated in his paper that he had "received" for review copies of Oscar Wilde's collected works he was not writing with that strict accuracy which we are accustomed to expect from the friends of Mr. Bottomley. However, the matter is a small one, and as Mr. Bottomley has apparently withdrawn the wonderful financial scheme whereby the "burden" of his costs at the Guildhall should both fall on his own shoulders and yet be wiped up by public subscription, we may dismiss him for the time being. We note, in this connection, that Messrs. Odhams, who are also associated in business with Mr. Bottomley, will publish shortly a work in belles lettres, entitled "Bottomley's Book," and that this work "will include photo of author, with character-sketch by Herbert Vivian." We hope Mr. Vivian will give Mr. Bottomley a better character than he found himself able to bestow on the late Mr. Walter Pater. As for Mr. Vivian's opinion of the late Oscar Wilde we refer our readers to our correspondence column.

We are glad to be able to congratulate the Editor of the new weekly journal, The Englishman, on the distinct improvement which is noticeable in the quality of his matter. The article on Woman's Suffrage in the issue of January 13th is well written and well argued, if somewhat long-winded. But some gentleman, who writes under the heading "Editorial Notes," is badly in need of an editor. We quote:

Far from the madding crowd, as some madman once remarked. Talking of madding, how truly are my beloved countrymen herewith revealed. In my modest youth such a book (sic) might often be seen on many a modest table. It made me blush even then, however,—for my countrymen. Had it been properly written in good English—as thus, maddening—no man would have regarded it, I ween. But "madding" not being English at all, naturally achieved a "well-deserved success," as the reviewers have it. For at least in England we never, never will be slaves—at any rate to the degrading rules of grammar or King's English.

The writer of this extraordinary farrago of nonsense is evidently not aware that the words "Far from the madding crowd," used by Mr. Thomas Hardy as the title of one of his finest novels, are quoted from Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard." Is there a schoolboy in England who does not know the line:

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife?

Anyone who is capable of saying that Mr. Hardy's great novel would not have been "regarded" if the title "had been properly written in good English" ought to be at once restrained from opportunities for making further "howlers." The word "madding" is, needless to say, quite excellent English, as the gentleman who wrote the silly paragraph we have quoted might have found out by consulting any standard English dictionary, or, more simply, by taking it on trust from the poet Gray.

One of the objects of the Humanitarian League is the abolition of capital punishment. We imagine that it is idle to suppose that the particular kind of crank who patronises the League will be guided by the object-lesson provided by France. The result of the suspension of the death penalty in that country has been an appalling increase in crimes of the most brutal character. Knowing that his precious life was secure, thanks to the energy of the sentimentalist, the gentle apache in Paris and other towns has been demonstrating in a most joyous fashion. Such a little joke as robbing a man's house and then playfully tying him to his bed and setting it on fire and leaving him to burn to death has been perpetrated under the benign eye of the beautiful "humanitarian," without in the smallest degree affecting his convictions as to the atrocity of executing murderers. The return of the guillotine, which has now taken place in France, was effected in response to what amounted to a national appeal for protection against every kind of inhuman assassin and ruffian.

It really seems as if at last we are to be allowed a little rest from the nuisance of the Suffragists—at any rate, they cease to take up their usual quantity of space in the daily papers, whose editors seem at last to be dimly realising that the mere fact that a vulgar and uneducated woman chooses to call herself a Suffragist does not necessarily imply that the public is anxious to read her views set out at length, and her "demands" formulated in its news-organs about four times a week for two or three years. We are glad to read in one of the papers that a party of Suffragists, including various Pankhursts, Pethicks, and other bright specimens of manly womankind, have gone to Geneva, where they are staying at an hotel and indulging in "winter sports" in bob-sleighs decorated with flags bearing the device "Votes for Women." We are sorry for the people of Geneva, and especially for the unfortunate persons who happen to be staying in the same hotel, but it is very gratifying to those who have remained in England. We sincerely hope that these charming ladies will continue to abide in Geneva and drive bob-sleighs decorated with flags. For all practical purposes they will be doing just as much good to their "cause" as if they continued their idiotic antics in London, and they will be giving gratification to a vast host of people at home. In the words of the old song: "They will enjoy themselves and so shall we."

The Athenæum will really have to look to itself. Only the other week we had occasion to call attention to the absolute foolishness of a "poem" which Mr. Rendall saw fit to offer his readers. Never before in its history, perhaps, has the Athenæum been convicted of publishing verses which were devoid of some sort of literary grace and spiritual meaning. On Saturday last our contemporary published a review of Mr. Wilfrid Meynell's selection from the poems of Francis Thompson. And this is the kind of criticism the review contained:

This volume will serve to bring before a wider circle of readers some of the most individual poetic work of the last century, though, indeed, we hope that "The Hound of Heaven" is known to most lovers of verse. Thompson, however, will not be popular in the sense that Tennyson and Keats and, longo intervallo, Kipling are popular. His obscurity, his love of unusual words, his Latinisms, his mysticism, all mark him out as appealing mainly to a special type of mind. This sense is heightened by the themes he chooses, and the lack of narrative and dramatic elements in his work. The ode is his chosen vehicle; and odes are not popular. Perhaps the affinities of his work are beyond the ordinary reader. One must know something of Crashaw in the Caroline period, of Blake in the Georgian, of Coventry Patmore in the Victorian, fully to appreciate his value—although his work is all his own, anything but a pastiche of remembered phrases and cadences. Still, there is no doubt that Thompson will have a place of his own in the English Pantheon of poets. What that place will be it is too soon as yet to say, and we shall not attempt to prophesy.

One does not expect a high literary organ to engage in the discussion of poetry from the point of view of popularity. To say (at any rate in the Athenæum) that odes are not popular is sheer and inexcusable stupidity. One might expect that sort of "criticism" from the Daily Mirror. Then the Athenæum quotes at length the most familiar passages from "The Hound of Heaven," with the comment: "Surely nothing could be truer or more broadly human than this." Surely nothing could be less illuminating or more wooden than such a remark. In view of the prevailing lack of taste we can forgive an editor for making a mistake about poetry, but when we find him permitting his contributors to foist off such dullness about a poet like Francis Thompson we can only wonder what has happened to his editorial wits. A strenuous use of the blue pencil would do the Athenæum a great deal of good just now.

THE MAGIC ORCHARD

From the French of HENRI DE REGNIER.

"Je vis de ma fenêtre ouverte sur le Rêve."

My casement to the Dream is open set,
And in the magic square of that lone place
A marvellous orchard, lush and dewy-wet,
Streams in the auroral air, in that faint space
When the night fails, and morning is not yet.
The wind that stirs the interlacing branches,
And smooths the glaucous grasses on the lawn,
Has from the trees, in delicate avalanches,
The treasure of their liberal blossom torn,
That glows, or palely blushes, or that blanches.

From the French of CHARLES-AUGUSTIN SAINTE-BEUVE.

Last night I watched in my dark bed, and there
My silent spirit grew from more to more;
Till, with a sudden foot spurning Heaven's floor
The lightning like a courser with bright hair
Flashed past, and thunder rattled in the air,
Drawn like a car behind. Then earth was stirred,
And beasts of earth in sacred terror heard
That sound, and hid them deep within their lair.
But I was fired by the heaven's flame,
My spirit woke, and every shock of fire
Tore from my heavy brow the clouds in sunder;
A part of the great concert I became,
A greater than the elements; and higher
Rose God's still voice within me than the thunder.

M. JOURDAIN.

MR. SHAW'S OBITUARY

It seems that we have a great man in our midst, and that his name is George Bernard Shaw. According to a journalist—we will not name him for the moment—"Mr. Bernard Shaw has thrilled and filled crowds of thinking and thoughtless people with his destructive and constructive theories, and is now, at a ripe age, sitting on a recognised and unassailable critical throne." This obviously is a delightful picture, though the recognised and unassailable critical throne may be a figment of the imagination. It should be observed, too, that, in mercy for all parties, we have omitted to quote our journalist quite accurately; for, in point of fact, he does not say that Mr. Bernard Shaw has thrilled and filled crowds, etc., but that "a man like" Mr. Bernard Shaw has thrilled and filled crowds. Of course, Mr. Chesterton—it is really Mr. Chesterton—means Mr. Bernard Shaw and none other, and we must always strive to discover what Mr. Chesterton means, and not content ourselves merely with what he says. "A man like Mr. Bernard Shaw" is probably not to be found in the wide, wide world, not to mention "Queechy," and on the whole we are disposed to thank our lucky stars for it. A man like Mr. Bernard Shaw sitting on a recognised and unassailable critical throne would mean pretty much the same thing for common sense and reasonable living as a man like our old friend the Maori sitting on the ruins of London Bridge would mean for the metropolis. But Mr. Chesterton is not content with the recognised and unassailable throne of criticism. He goes on to tell us some of the truth.

For example, he assures us that if Mr. Shaw "appears for an instant in a daily paper, he always appears as a juvenile and impertinent guttersnipe, saying smart things that no one can understand." We concur most heartily; what is more we agree, and whisper, "Exactly so." And then, of course, Mr. Chesterton pulls us up very short indeed. "Some day," he continues "[Mr. Shaw] will die, and we shall have a cataract of newspaper columns telling an astonished public for the first time that he was a great sociologist, an original philosopher, and one of the pillars of the nineteenth century. In other words, 'Mr. Bernard Shaw will suddenly become a classic when he has ceased to be an influence.' Mr. Chesterton it is who says so, consequently let no dog bark. At the same time, we can tell Mr. Chesterton and Mr. Shaw exactly what will happen when Mr. Shaw dies, a catastrophe which we hope is still far distant. There will be notices in the daily and weekly prints; there will be the usual and very proper expressions of regret, but there will be no cataracts, and there will certainly be no foolishness as to sociology, philosophy, or pillar-furnishing for the nineteenth century. We could write Mr. Shaw's obituary notice with a degree of niceness and finish which would probably be very astonishing to Mr. Chesterton, and very consoling to Mr. Shaw. If ever there was a creature of an hour, a whimsical, naughty, and rather pushing and impertinent creature of an hour, that creature is Mr. George Bernard Shaw. He is one of those men who, without being great or distinguished or wise, or, for that matter, over-brainy, has taken the measure of a small and impressionable section of the world, and made himself appear to be master of it, whereas in reality he is not its master at all, but merely its grinning and subservient slave. The hackneyed phrase about the triton and the minnows exactly suits Mr. Shaw's case. We will suppose that he believes himself to be a person of great literary parts. It is obvious that a person possessed of such a faith would, in the ordinary course of human affairs, be aware that he was not the first human being who had possessed such parts. Shakespeare, for example, had the advantage of being born before Mr. Shaw. The ordinary literary man who remembers Shakespeare assesses his own parts accordingly. Not so Mr. Shaw. For him, Shakespeare and the rest of them have no public existence. If you say Shakespeare to him publicly, he has the wag's retort for ever on his lips. "Shakespeare is dead, my good fellow; Shaw is alive. Shaw is better than Shakespeare." The good-natured guffaw, and are inclined to the opinion that there must be some soul of genius in a chap who has the cheek to talk like that. Having learnt to read, of course, Mr. Shaw knows in his private heart that Shakespeare could have put all Shaw into the little finger of his left-hand glove without feeling him. But publicly, so long as the hapenny papers exist, Shaw is expected to be waggish in the matter of Shakespeare, and waggish he must be. On questions of "sociology" and "philosophy" the same method must be Mr. Shaw's method. "Marriage," says Mr. Shaw publicly, "is all my eye and Peggy Martin." There have been sociologists before Mr. Shaw who took another view, but these poor devils are dead, and Shaw is alive, and what he does not know about marriage is not worth talking about. As to philosophy, all the philosophers are dead, save and except Shaw—and perhaps Chesterton. Chesterton says that Shaw is a philosopher; Shaw has always had a sort of idea that he might be—and there you are. Then there is politics. The Observer newspaper suddenly concluded, at the suggestion of a handful of obscure persons who call themselves the Fabian Society, that Mr. Shaw might conceivably be a statesman, and the Observer sent round a gentleman with a sweet smile and a fountain pen to enquire and demand of Mr. Shaw, "Are you a statesman?" Shaw dare not say that he wasn't, and consequently he said firmly and without flinching, "I am." And, of course, it must be so. It is not for us to doubt Mr. Shaw, particularly when he happens to be backed up by Mr. Chesterton. Unfortunately the statesmanship of Mr. Shaw has been studiously buried alive by the London Press. "The London Press," says Shaw, "have consistently ignored my political speeches, although [mark you] they readily printed any reference to Shakespeare, which, uttered as serious criticism, became transformed somehow into gross and ill-mannered stupidity." Here we get it both ways. The London Press has at length taken notice of Mr. Shaw the politician, and Mr. Shaw the politician opens his private heart as to his public utterances with respect to Shakespeare. And in the true spirit of the agile Mr. Shaw would have us believe that he does not complain against the London Press for not recognising his high gifts of statesmanship, but that he does complain of the readiness with which the London Press printed his stupid and ill-mannered references to Shakespeare. In point of fact, so far from complaining as to the suppression of his political views, Mr. Shaw considers that such suppression has rendered "the greatest possible service to the Fabian Society." We can well believe it, but we do not believe it in the same way that Mr. Shaw believes it, for he says, "Thanks to this suppression, our operations are never discovered by the enemy until we have carried them on for twenty years, by which time opposition to us is hopeless." Here, of course, you have more waggery with a good spicing of bunkum. The general mass of reasonable mankind has not heard of Mr. Shaw and is not likely to hear of him, even when he is dead. He is neither a man of letters in the large sense nor a philosopher, and his sociology amounts to his own particular brand of cheap Socialism. He has written a play or two, and he has made a few silly speeches. Because he happens to have more wits than the average Socialist, the Socialists and their hangers-on, not forgetting Mr. Chesterton, consider him a huge man, and eye him with pretty much the same eye that a fly might have for a football. If the hapenny papers and the Fabian Society were to disappear tomorrow Mr. Shaw and all his works would go with them. When he dies there will be an end of him, and as he is a fairly vigorous person, and may happily live for quite a number of years, we should not be at all surprised if he outlived the gimcrack reputation which he has managed to make for himself. Mr. Chesterton compares him with Darwin. For our own part we should liken him to a sort of literary and sociological Mrs. Pankhurst.

ARCHER AND HANKIN

It appears that Mr. William Archer is the dramatic critic of the Nation. And it appears that he has lately had something unpleasant to say of a play by Mr. Hankin. We have not seen Mr. Hankin's play, and we do not propose to see it, but out of a correspondence which has arisen on the subject between Mr. Archer and a person who signs himself "Old Playgoer" we may extract matter. It is not unfair to Mr. Archer that he should be described as a somewhat heavy critic. Among the journalists of his time he figures as a person of reputation in his line, whom no professional person reads. If our recollection serves us, he has written many articles in the World, all of them about the drama; and he has written also on the same affair in the Tribune, now happily defunct, and, as we have seen, he is still engaged on the Nation, which may live for ever. For ourselves, we have tried to peruse his criticisms, but with the best will in the world we have never been able to get along with them.

Mr. Archer is a serious man; he conceives the drama as an institution of importance, and he looks on the theatre as a sort of temple of Art and Grace and Beauty, which, on the whole, is rather old-fashioned of him. Once on a time he stood for Ibsen, and it may be that he now stands for Maeterlinck or for Mr. George Bernard Shaw. But nobody is a penny the better, and certainly nobody is a penny the worse. We consider that this is a pity, because the serious man is a very serious business to himself, and if the world will not take him seriously so much the worse for the world. The fact is that throughout his brilliant career Mr. Archer would appear to have made the blind worm's mistake. With the modern drama and the modern theatre a serious person should really have nothing to do; inasmuch as neither one nor the other can be said to merit serious thought. Herein we have Mr. Archer's stumbling-block. He can never be gay. He goes to the first night of a farce in pretty much the same spirit as an undertaker might go to measure the corpse of a pauper. He knows what ought to be, and what possibly might be, but isn't, and he can be neither happy nor savage about it. So that he prosed and prosed and prosed, and states the old truths and the old dullness, and he is always right and always beaten. The world is not too much with him, but too much for him. We believe that he is a competent critic, and we believe that he can distinguish sound dramaturgic work from the other kind; but there, it seems to us, is the limit of Mr. Archer. Consequently, it gives us the greatest possible pleasure to find him for once in a way coming out of his excellent shell and waving his horns somewhat—like a disturbed snail, or, if we may use the simile without offence, like a fairly angry and sarcastic bull. There can be no doubt in the world that Mr. Archer's treatment of Mr. Hankin's play would be the correct, sound, wise and proper treatment, and that in any case it would represent Mr. Archer's conscientious views, and his true and honest opinions. As we have said, we did not see the play, but we are given to understand that it was a play of the new, old sort, and full of nonsense about a woman and a baby and the stupidity of marriage; and while we have not read Mr. Archer's criticism, we can read it with our mind's eye, as it were, and we can well understand that it would not be altogether gratifying to Mr. Hankin. Naturally, Mr. Hankin, like the next man, is not without his unknown friends and admirers, and one of these, the aforesaid "Old Playgoer" to wit, has written to the Nation for the purpose of calling Mr. Archer "a doddering reactionary." It was wicked of "Old Playgoer" to do this, but probably he could not help it, and it was wicked of the editor of the Nation to print the letter. For ourselves, however, we are much obliged to "Old Playgoer," not because he is the kind of writer one may applaud, but because he has managed to rouse Mr. Archer. Here are some of Mr. Archer's own words on the subject:

Yes, yes, I am growing old; there is no doubt about it. If by nothing else, I can measure the lapse of time since I was young at criticism by the change—for the better: oh, yes, certainly for the better—in editorial ethics. In my young days, an editor would suffer no one to question the infallibility of his critic. If an exasperated author wrote to the paper (except, perhaps, on the plainest matter of fact) his letter was either quietly wastepaper-basketed, or forwarded to the critic, that he might store it up and "have his knife in" the audacious dramatist at the next opportunity. Quite seriously, this was a barbarous state of things; and again and again, in those far-off days, I urged its reformation. There is no reason why critics should affect to be infallible; and there is every reason why an injured, or merely irritated, author should be suffered to have his say—if his friends cannot keep writing materials out of his reach. So far, I applaud the humane impartiality of the modern editor. But I do not quite see what dictate of humanity or maxim of policy compels an editor to inform the world, on the authority of an anonymous "Old Playgoer," that his critic is a doddering reactionary, blind to the abounding merits of "our latest drama." When I noted in the contents of last week's Nation a letter on "Mr. Archer's Criticism" by an "Old Playgoer," "Aha!" thought I, "here is some generous champion come forward to defend me from the merciless onslaught of Mr. St. John Hankin. Now for some balm to my wounded spirit!" But when I turned to the page—oh, dire disappointment! oh, cruel deception!—the "Old Playgoer" merely rubbed brine into my sores. He thought, indeed, that Mr. Hankin had gone a little too far in calling me a rat: rather because "our latest drama" is by no means a sinking ship, than on account of any fundamental inaptness in the simile. But otherwise he vowed that I richly deserved every stroke of my castigation. To the Young Playwright's whip, in fact, the "Old Playgoer" did his best to add scorpions.

Apart from all considerations of argument, who in the name of goodness would have imagined that Mr. William Archer could write in this sprightly and juvenile fashion? It will be a revelation to his friends, and it will most certainly give his enemies pause—that is to say, of course, if he happens to have any. It is desirable, however, for us to note that at the foot of Mr. Archer's letter, Mr. Massingham remarks: "We have not allowed anybody to call Mr. Archer 'a doddering reactionary.'" This, again, is rather a pity, because it spoils the sport. On the other hand, it is better so. As to the general question of an editor permitting angry authors or their friends to attack his accredited critic, we are sorry we cannot agree with Mr. Archer. If people wish to attack the critic, say, of the Times newspaper, they should not be permitted to do it in the Times; and we certainly consider that Mr. Archer was not quite so serious as he should have been when he urged such a piece of reformation as that involved. The infallibility of any newspaper's critic must be taken for granted by its editor, and authors who write with the intention of proving that the critic does not know his business should be advised to take their animadversions elsewhere. Otherwise, the average journal would soon resolve itself into a mere Donnybrook or bear garden. There is all the difference in the world between a letter of complaint or defence as to criticism and a letter in which the critic is attacked on the grounds of incompetency, stupidity, or bias. Mr. Archer cannot have said much that could not be justified or that was not proper to be said in the matter of Mr. Hankin's play. Critics like Mr. Archer seldom, or never, make mistakes as to certain broad questions. If they do make mistakes, the author concerned has a clear right of correction and a clear reason for complaint; but he has no right and no reason to charge the critic with incompetence, or to indite him generally as a false and bad critic. The letter from which we have quoted is a lengthy letter, and it consists for the most part of a defence, or, at any rate, an explanation of Mr. Archer's attitude towards the modern drama. We do not consider it seemly that the critic of any respectable review should be compelled by the actions of his editor so to defend himself. Mr. Massingham must know perfectly well that Mr. Archer is a safe critic, if not a merry one; and we consider that his note as to not having permitted anybody to call Mr. Archer "a doddering reactionary" is altogether an inadequate note, and that it is discreditable to the Nation thus to throw its critic overboard. Mr. Archer's defence of himself is complete, and it turns the tables on the enemy in a manner which they are little likely to relish. We are glad to see that our old friend has in him a Roland for every Oliver, and we trust that if Mr. Massingham finds himself unequal to take up the cudgels for Mr. Archer, he will at least have the decency to let the last word be Archer's word, and to mark under it, "This correspondence must now cease." An Englishman's house is his castle, and an English critic's paper should be his strong defence and sure rock in time of trouble. Justice is the finest thing in the world, but we question very much whether it can ever be just to permit your own critic to be reproved over the mouth with a brick in his own column. An editor's proper way with a critic is first of all to have confidence in him, and to stand or fall by that confidence as long as he may, and when he ceases to have confidence in him and finds himself unable to support or defend him, it is better that he should discharge him than that he should allow him to be held up to the sport and contumely of the world at large. Mr. Hankin's part in the matter does not appear to have been at all terrible, and as for "Old Playgoer," we can only hope that Mr. Massingham has his name and address and believes him to be a more trustworthy judge of the drama than Mr. Archer. We may note further that in another journal, which shall be nameless, we observe an editorial disposition to permit fancy bouts between contributors. We do not know whether Mr. Archer would now advocate this kind of thing, but in any case it is certain that such proceedings inevitably result in bad blood and worse journalism. Birds in their little nests should agree, and even if they must fight it is not creditable for the parent or master bird to egg them on. "Quarrel with the children in the next house and never among yourselves," is an old principle of the nursery. And when all is said, ninety-nine journalists out of a hundred would appear to be fairly quarrelsome children.

WHITELEY'S AT THE COMEDY

It seems but yesterday that the cheap newspapers were bragging on behalf of Mr. Somerset Maugham that he had a play "running" at practically every theatre in London. We do not know that there is any particular harm in sheer fecundity or in the capacity to toss into the public maw repeated doses of something which the public maw appears to relish. That such gifts should be held up before one as plain proof of an author's intellectual merit, however, is, of course, preposterous. At the time of Mr. Maugham's control of the London stage—that is to say, when he was at the height of his boom—we did not trouble ourselves to visit his multifarious exhibitions. So that we are in no position to speak of the excellence of his general achievements. But in consequence of the fact that his sundry tremendous works would appear, after the usual "extraordinary successes," to remain no longer in the metropolitan dramatic bill of fare, we have been round to see Penelope, which, if we are to believe the daily press, is a very fine example of Mr. Maugham's "art," and which we shall presume represents him in a mature, ripe and finished vein. We sat through the whole of the three acts, though the play really ends in act two, and we came away with the conclusion that Penelope is prettily named; that Mr. Maugham is most fortunate in having Miss Marie Tempest for his leading lady, and that, on the whole, Penelope is exactly the kind of play which one might expect to be supplied by Whiteley's. Messrs. Whiteley, we believe, will forgive us if we say that they are "universal providers," and that if you put them to it they could bring to your door, as it were, anything in this world that you may require, from a pocket handkerchief to a middling-sized elephant. They conduct their business on very smart lines; they know their public; they do not profess to concern themselves over closely with strict art or, still less, with affairs of the intellect, and their desire is to please and satisfy all comers. Mr. Maugham—and we say it to his credit—is imbued with the Whiteley spirit. In Penelope he has put up a smart business-like play, concerned with the simple domestic passions of love and jealousy; he gives us a number of figures of the sort which are known to be thought "real" in Westbourne Grove, and the wit, humour and pathos of him are nicely calculated to meet the very proper emotional requirements of Sloane Square and South Kensington. Penelope herself is intended to captivate the middle-class woman. She is a trim, pert, and rather passionate matron of five years' standing. There is no nonsense about her, and she loves her husband, who happens to be a rising young physician, not to say a good deal of a bounder. In this excellent little lady, as represented by Miss Marie Tempest, and in this slack and graceless, rising young physician, the femininity of South Kensington will see the sexes painted as they should be painted—the woman a confiding and affectionate bundle of pretty clothes and pretty ways, possessed, however, of a good deal of the nous of the courtesan; and the man a blundering, but nevertheless artful and untruthful jackass. For the rest, there is a gentleman who boasts continually of his acquaintance with duchesses; there is Penelope's father, whom we are requested to accept for a mathematician, and who is really a dodderer; and there is Penelope's mother, whom we may dismiss as the usual flustered, middle-aged female. These people are of no real concern to the play, and Mr. Maugham has really roughed them in because the people in the stalls would not have been satisfied without them. Practically the only person who matters, after Penelope and her husband, is the wicked married lady who tangles up the husband of Penelope. With these three characters Mr. Maugham might have made out of Penelope a passable, light, one-act piece, suitable for performance as a curtain-raiser. For very obvious reasons, however, he has preferred to squeeze the play into three acts. And as he does not possess the intellectual equipment, which is necessary to excusable or brilliant padding, Penelope is an artistic disappointment. Perhaps the best that can be said of it is that it is trite comedy served up in a manner which savours of the farce. There is nothing new about it, nothing witty, and nothing moving. At times and in places the author displays a certain admirable intention, but one feels that on the whole he botches his own chances. It is Miss Marie Tempest who saves the situations all the time. In point of fact, while she appears to be one and the same Penelope from first to last, she is really compelled to be quite half a dozen different women through Mr. Maugham's failure in the matters of coherence and clarity of conception. And as for minor blemishes, they may be said to abound. For example, it is a little foolish of Mr. Maugham to make Penelope sigh for "something with boiling oil in it" when she is imagining tortures for her rival. Sir William Gilbert is the registered proprietor of this poor witticism, and one is astonished to find it raising giggles in the new century. But the boiling oil touch, and another which bears reference to a rooster's "run for his money," are the only verbal points with which Mr. Maugham manages to secure palpable hits. And the rooster joke is unfair, because it is a joke for the ribald. Then again, Mr. Maugham brings into his doctor's consulting-room two patients who are introduced for the mere, sheer and obvious purpose of passing the time. It is not even pretended, as in the case of Penelope's father, mother and uncle, that they have anything to do with the story. Consequently they are unnecessary, superfluous, and, strictly speaking, they have no business in the play. We have already said that the third act is also superfluous, and particularly so, as it is full of anti-climax. The good qualities of Penelope are that it is brisk and pretty to look at, and that a great many of the situations are amusing. The play also has the advantage of reasonable propriety of tone, and it is not preachy on the one hand or contemptuous of the conventions on the other. For the male section of an audience there may be considerable suggestions of twaddle about it. For young women, however, it is probably all wrong, because no woman in her senses will agree that the best way to cure a husband of an infatuation for somebody not herself is to "give him his head." Neither is it good for young women that wifely tenderness should be proclaimed from the house-tops to be much the same thing as strawberry ice; which statement, of course, will be appreciated by persons who have no sense of humour. The fact is that Penelope as a whole is a poor play because there is no human blood in it. It is make-believe, and cheap, and in the main hackneyed make-believe, for which reason possibly it will bring "good business" to the box-offices. For Mr. Maugham we have one other word. Let him fore-swear universal providing. He has a sense for the stage, and he has a sense of the comic. It may be that, in spite of his apparent facility, he is really a toiler. If this be not so we should advise him to toil, and if it be so we should still advise him to toil after larger and ampler things. We do not think that Mr. Maugham could ever write a play which would be worth reading in the literary sense, but we imagine that he could do better than Penelope, not only in the literary sense, but also in the dramatic sense, if he were to take the necessary trouble.

JANUARY

THERE is little use in asserting, as do some worthy people, that the passing of the Old Year and the first few moments of the New Year bring no change—that their celebration is merely an arbitrary arrangement of man's devising, and that, in short, "nothing happens." Time, greedily clutching at the final sheet of our annual record, and doling out a fair white page for our consideration, cannot help a muttered word of caution that we be less hasty in our writing, more stringent on the subject of blots and smears; and for the life of us we cannot avoid a little thrill of dismay or pleasure, as the case may be, when we realise the position. For here, we think comfortably, we have a fresh chance; our good ship has found once more the bearings of those Fortunate Islands whose shores we have so often sighted mistily, far away on the horizon; we captains will make sure this time that chart and compass are correct, that the sextant and chronometer work harmoniously together, and that the engines are sound and speedy. What hurricanes may come, what shoals or rocks or stubborn currents may threaten, what siren voices may charm us from our true course, we heed but little. And if sun and stars are veiled, we will steer, we say, by dead-reckoning; but, alas! dependence upon that method of navigation often brings us to grief; on that point our past log-books will not bear too close or prolonged examination.

We are, as a rule, inclined to be optimists during the first month of the year, in spite of the wintry hours and sullen skies which it so frequently brings:

Each year bears something from us as it flies,
We only blow it farther with our sighs, sings Walter Savage Landor; and our chief regrets are reserved for the months when the year is on the wane. The harshness of January is beneficent, without doubt; man's power of appreciation is trained by contrasts, and we look forward to the lessening keenness of the winds, the first fine green flush of the woods, the spreading flame of buttercups through the level meadows, with a heartier welcoming thrill for the meagre joys of the present. Country folk in more lands than one do not care to find genial weather too early in the year: "Mieux vaut voir un chien enragé qu'un soleil chaud en Janvier," runs a French proverb; and we have rendered the same idea into a jingling couplet which varies for different counties:

If the grass grows in Janiweer,
It grows the worse for't all the year.

But January is often under-rated. It has its pleasant side, in spite of the season. The "in-between time," we might term it, when the first scanty efflorescence of the coming month—the venturesome primrose, peering forth in a dell of sunshine out of the wind, the sheltered wood-violet, the kingly daffodil, the pale bells of the snowdrop—has not yet begun; the period of suspense, of expectation, of joys enfolded and beauties withheld. On many of the trees the sticky leaf-buds show plainly, only waiting for the encouragement of warmer sunshine to uncurl their dainty spirals to the light. It is the month when the word signalled from the clouds seems to be indistinct, yet of a cheerful burden; the month of patience, of hope, of faith—"the evidence of things not seen." Daybreak and sunset may be wild and grey, or may illumine and encrimson coldly the wastes of snow, blur with dusky colour the sombre vistas of the city streets, but there prevails a sense of something beyond, something that is worthy of the waiting; we are conscious that the flower of the year is opening, not closing, and a certain heartiness of thought is ours thereby. "Every dull mood of nature has its compensations to shame us out of peevishness." "After a still winter night," writes Thoreau from his lonely hut, "I awoke with the impression that some question had been put to me which I had been endeavouring in vain to answer in my sleep, as what—how—when—where? But there was dawning Nature, in whom all creatures live, looking in at my broad windows with serene and satisfied face, and no question on her lips. I awoke to an answered question, to Nature and daylight. The snow lying deep on the earth, dotted with young pines, and the very slope of the hill on which my house is placed, seemed to say 'Forward!' Nature puts no question, and answers none which we mortals ask. She has long ago taken her resolution. . . . Heaven is under our feet as well as over our heads." Still, it is well to look upwards, for the lark is often the only creature visibly undiscouraged by the impassive canopy of cloud which our English January so frequently refuses to furl. Mounting, as though in search of the sapphire vault beyond, he sings:

He rises, scarcely seen against the gloom,
Spills his full heart in crystal drops of song
That mingle falling to a slender stream
Of fairy music; then, all silently,
Descends forlorn athwart the darkening sky.

A brave, bonnie little bird is he—the clearer and the dearer for the silence amid which he sings.

And herein lies the beauty of the January landscape for those who see with the spiritual eye as well as with outward vision—the song of joyous waiting, set to music by the lark's high notes, is written there. The heather on the cliffs is dry, rattling in the salt sea breeze; the twisted hawthorn is "carved clean to the way of the wind"; the river is livid and moaning, as though chained by regretful dreams; but the frailty and the barrenness is not that of November; it is suggestive; it is on the side of increase, not of decay. We may become pessimists toward the end of the year, with a surly shrug for the memories of what we meant to do; but ungrateful and perverse is that man, shouldering his discontented way through the shrill blasts, who does not now open his heart to that inspiring word "Faith!" For in the Summer he will have realised no splendid anticipations—he will be bankrupt of the bounty of the gods.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

We print the following for what it is worth:

LUCY'D HISTORY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The subjoined correspondence between Mr. H. W. Lucy and myself refers to that travesty of historical fact which he has contributed to the current Cornhill, and to which I drew attention in the Standard of the 7th inst.

I may explain that on the 1st inst., Mr. Lucy, in the course of an article in the Liverpool Daily Post, entitled, "Romance of the House of Commons," made the grotesquely erroneous assertion that Disraeli "entered it (the House) as an impetuous Radical." On the 6th I contributed to that paper a correction of this blunder (so characteristic of its author), and referred to, without specifying, that triumph of misrepresentation which I exposed in the Standard on the following day.

As you will see, I accepted Mr. Lucy's challenge at once: I am still awaiting his reply. His prolonged silence suggests that he recognises discretion to be the better part of valour, and that as THE ACADEMY of last Saturday plainly puts it, "the situation is a little awkward for" him. Surely there is only one course for Mr. Lucy to adopt. Better late than never. Had he been endowed with a keener sense of the responsibilities of a "public writer," and of the rudimentary ethics of literary veracity, he would have adopted that course twenty years ago, when it was brought to his notice that he had attributed to Mr. Gladstone a statement which Mr. Gladstone did not make, and which reflected discredit on the Conservative Whips of 1841, one of whom was, in 1889, already dead, and the other a nonagenarian who passed away in the following year.

Mr. Lucy is the master of an attractive style, but I trust that his many readers will henceforth temper their admiration of his narrative powers (in which I cordially concur) with a healthy scepticism as to the facts of what may appropriately be styled, in this connection, "Lucy'd History."

Constitutional Club, London.

ALFRED B. BEAVEN.

Jan. 14th, 1909.

Whitethorn, Hythe, Kent.

8th January, 1909.

SIR,—I have received a copy of the Liverpool Daily Post containing a letter from you in which you say: "Mr. Lucy has in the Cornhill reproduced an oft- (by him) repeated story on the authority of Mr. Gladstone, although Mr. Gladstone has repudiated it, and his repudiation had been communicated to Mr. Lucy years ago to my knowledge."

This is a serious charge to bring against a public writer. I must ask you to particularise the story you allude to, and to cite the authority for the alleged repudiation.

Yours faithfully,

HENRY W. LUCY.

Greyfriars, Leamington,
January 9th, 1909.

DEAR SIR,—The enclosed correspondence, which was published in the Standard of Thursday last, will, I hope, be sufficient reply to your challenge to me to substantiate what you rightly characterise as "a serious charge to bring against a public writer."

I need only add that I forwarded to you a copy of Mr. Gladstone's postcard (marked II. in the enclosed cutting), together with either a verbatim copy or an abstract of the letter to which it was a reply; that you acknowledged its receipt, and that in the course of further correspondence you admitted that your version of Mr. Gladstone's anecdote was in error in the very material point to which I drew attention. Nevertheless, so far from complying with my reasonable request to take the earliest opportunity of correcting your error through the same channels by which you had secured its wide dissemination, you have reproduced it on several occasions since 1889, the last being in the current Cornhill.

I may remark in passing that my letter in the Liverpool Daily Post, to which I am indebted for the honour of your communication, deals with another illustration of the tendency of your facile, but very inaccurate, pen to libel the memory of the dead.

Yours very faithfully,

ALFRED B. BEAVEN.

We do not quite see what possible defence Mr. Lucy can set up; and it appears to us his proper course would be frankly to admit his error and to promise amendment. Silence is all very well in its way, but it ceases to be golden, and, indeed, puts on much of the appearance of brass, when matters of this nature are concerned. Of course, it may be that Mr. Lucy is out of town or otherwise prevented from replying to Mr. Beaven's letter. If this be so we must reserve judgment.

Last week's issue of the Nation contained a poem by Mr. William H. Davies, whose recently-published booklet, "Nature Poems," has already been noticed in these columns. We take the liberty of reprinting some of the verses:

Though I do love to feel the Rain,
And be by winds well blown,
The mystery of mortal life
Doth press me down.

And, in this mood, come now what will,
Shine Rainbow, Cuckoo call—
There is no thing in Heaven or Earth
Can lift my soul.

* * *

I sit between two fair Rose-trees;
Red roses on my right
And, on my left side, roses are
A lovely white.

The little birds are full of joy,
Lambs bleating all the day;
The colt runs after the old mare,
And children play.

And still there comes this dark, dark hour—
Which is not born of care;
Into my heart it creeps before
I am aware.

The Nation is fortunate. Mr. Davies may be reckoned a "natural born" poet. Though he may lack the erudition of the schools and consequent powers of self-criticism there can be no question as to his authentic parts. At times he comes very near Blake himself.

The irrepressible Lady Grove has been reviewing a book for the Daily Chronicle. The title of the book is "The Making of a Successful Husband." The Chronicle, however, prints Lady Grove's review in the next column to its priceless political leaders under the head of "The Making of a Husband. By Lady Grove." We are inclined to think that, on the whole, Lady Grove would have amused us much more considerably if her "article" were indeed an article, as it purports typographically to be, and not a mere review, as it really is. However, we must put up with small mercies. "It is not extraneous advice," says Lady Grove, "however admirable, that will ensure wedded bliss, but the characters of the contracting parties as they develop," which, on the whole, is a somewhat cryptic utterance. We should have imagined that from Lady Grove's point of view the handiest way to "make" a husband would be to steal his vote, or at any rate to neutralise it by getting a vote for yourself. Development of character would ensue of necessity. Our own opinion is that husbands are born, not made—and so are wives. Why a woman who wants the vote so badly as Lady Grove would appear to want it should be considered an expert on husband-making, even by the Daily Chronicle, will pass the average comprehension.

The fact is that Lady Grove should not be allowed to discuss the state of matrimony at all. Here is a good sample of her tender, critical method in dealing with matters of the heart:

Much consolatory counsel is given as to the advisability of perfect confidence between husband and wife, and to emphasise this point the father relates a touching tale of a young friend of his who had kept his worries a secret from his wife, whose discerning eyes had nevertheless perceived that something was amiss. At last, however, he faced the music like a little man. What do you suppose that woman did when he told her? Did she have a fit? No, sir. She threw her arms around his neck, and cried, "Oh, Johnny, is that all?" He confided later to his friend the fact that his failure had been the greatest success of his life, for it had enabled him to become for the first time really acquainted with his wife. Well, that is possible. But it would be rash to say that the result of this more intimate knowledge would invariably be to enhance the value of either husband or wife in each other's eyes.

Of course, your true Suffragist would have told Johnny very sternly and sharply that he was a fool and a rogue combined, and that he had not in the least enhanced his value in her eyes. The enhancing or depreciating of values between married couples may be a philosophical duty from Lady Grove's point of view, but it can be proved out of the book to be an idiotic pursuit and a sure enemy of married happiness, for precisely which reason your Suffragist would advocate it. Among decent married persons questions of value do not arise. If a man's actions or emotions, or a woman's actions or emotions, are to be trimmed with a view to possible enhancements or otherwise of "value in each other's eyes" we might as well shut up shop. "Charity thinketh no evil," and "it suffereth long and is kind." "Votes for women" is another affair.

It seems that Mr. Lloyd George has been giving a dinner party at Cannes, and the "voracious" fashionable reporter has been informed that the guests were Lady McLaren and three Mr. McLarens. His paragraph was set forward with all the pomps and dignities as if the fact that Lady McLaren and her sons had picked a bit of dinner with Mr. Lloyd George was a matter of the highest international importance. Of course, the Lady McLaren in question is the Lady McLaren who believes that chivalry is dead, and that your civil man of the period limits his gallantry to the opening of doors for pretty women. We conclude that Mr. Lloyd George opened the door for Lady McLaren after the banquet, and was not reproved for his chivalry in the matter. When Mr. Asquith dines with Mrs. Catharine Nation there will doubtless be more paragraphs. What will some of us not do for England?

According to one of the Radical literary gossips "Mr. Frank Harris has almost ready for publication a book called 'The Man, William Shakespeare, and His most Tragic Life Story.'" Our gossip omits to mention the name of the publisher who is to issue the book. In point of fact, Mr. Harris has had this work ready for publication for a considerable time past, and we happen ourselves to have read it. Making allowances for certain blemishes which Mr. Harris will by this time no doubt have removed, there can be no question that "The Man, Shakespeare," is about as excellent a piece of writing on the subject as has yet been penned. If the book ever does get published Mr. Sidney Lee and Professor Raleigh will have to look to their laurels. The difference between Mr. Harris and these gentlemen is that Mr. Harris is all for Shakespeare, poet and human man, while Mr. Lee is for Mr. Lee, "historian," and Professor Raleigh is all for Professor Raleigh, "brilliant critic." We have had our differences with Mr. Harris on the matter of his novel, a work of which, in the main, we disapprove; and, furthermore, we should not exactly look to him for sure criticism of poetry. But that he understands about Shakespeare cannot be doubted, and it is astonishing that "The Man, Shakespeare," should have remained unpublished for so many years. And, talking of Shakespeare, we are reminded of a couple of anecdotes which may or may not be new. A certain critic came across a strolling actor who was sunning himself in the costume of Hamlet outside a fit-up theatre. The critic said: "You're an actor, I perceive." The man replied that, in a sort of way, he was. "Tell me," said the critic, "what is your real opinion of Shakespeare?" "Well," replied the actor with a far-away look, "to tell you the truth, I don't know much about him, but you may bet your hat he was lousily treated." The other story is of a butcher, whose hobby was literature. Somebody enquired of him whether he believed that Bacon wrote Shakespeare. To which the butcher replied: "It is not for me to say, sir, but I consider that if Bacon didn't write Shakespeare he missed the finest chance he ever had in his life." Which is the plain unvarnished truth.

The Outlook continues sedulously to make its appearance without poetry. We are flattered to find that the editor recognises the wisdom of our advice on the subject. It is nothing to his discredit that he cannot obtain good verse, but it would be greatly to his discredit if, after our warning, he should continue to deal in the meretricious. The Saturday Review is also poemless, and so, thank heaven, is the Athenæum, the which journal, after the "tousy tyke" on "The Wasp," and Mr. Bernard Capes on "Will o' the Wisp," might really be excused if it never printed poetry again. It is wonderful what a little wise suggestion can accomplish in this naughty world. At the same time, we cannot in the least rejoice at the poemless condition of our three noble contemporaries; for whether the political economists like it or not, it is a fact that when a nation is not making poetry it may anticipate trouble. The day before yesterday we saw in the Daily Mail a column article by Mr. Laurence Binyon. We rubbed our eyes, but there it was, a whole column of flat prose about the British Museum, with the legend, "By Laurence Binyon" printed gloriously upon the top of it. Price, no doubt, three guineas. We believe that in the time occupied by Mr. Binyon in the composition of this article he could have forced himself to produce some sort of a poem which might have helped Mr. Hodge, of the Saturday, or Mr. Rendall, of the Athenæum, or Mr.—shall we say Binks?—of the Outlook. But there might not have been three guineas tied to the proof. Of course, it goes without saying that Mr. Binyon and all other poets, considered in their capacities as citizens, have a perfect right to churn out prose for the Daily Mail and leave the literary papers without so much as a jingle, if they can find it in their hearts to do so. But the muses must weep to see it, and even we, who are not by any means the muses, are filled with pain at the sight of it. A Bishop writing in Comic Cuts would be an offence to everybody who has a thought for the Church. Poets perpetrating "articles of interest" in hapenny papers appear to us to be just as unbecomful. At the same time, we may be wrong.

As we go to press we receive the appended letter from the Editor of the Spectator:

DEAR SIR,—I am informed that THE ACADEMY of January 9th, p. 652, contained the following statement:—

Mr. Bottomley is either a rich man or he is not. If he is rich he should pay his own way. If he is not, what becomes of the prospectus of John Bull, for particulars of which please see the Saturday Review and the Spectator of a few weeks ago?

If you had taken the trouble to verify this statement as regards the Spectator, you would have found that it was not true. The Spectator did not contain the prospectus of John Bull or any advertisement of that paper. Such advertisement was offered to the Spectator but was refused. I beg that you will print this letter in your paper.

I am, Sir, Yours faithfully,
J. ST. LOE STRACHEY,
Editor and Proprietor.

The Editor of THE ACADEMY.

We regret extremely that we should have misrepresented the Spectator, and we offer Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey and his paper our sincere apologies for the inadvertence. In point of fact, when the advertisement was offered to us we enquired if it was being accepted by the other weekly reviews, and we were informed that it was. However, that is no argument in face of the facts, and we are most sorry that we took for granted an assurance respecting which we should have enquired more closely. We asked the Saturday Review over the telephone if they were taking the advertisement, and they replied that they were. Our omission to take the same precaution in the case of the Spectator was unfortunate, and we do not attempt to excuse ourselves for it.

In another column we print a letter with reference to the discrepancies between the facsimile of Rossetti's fair copy of "The Ballad of Jan Van Hunks" and the typographical version of it, both of which appear in the English Review. It is evident, as our correspondent points out, that somebody has been at pains to edit Rossetti. Whether the editor is Mr. Watts-Dunton or Mr. Hueffer we have no means of knowing, though we should imagine that the probabilities are in favour of Mr. Watts-Dunton. And the position of affairs, as pointed out by our correspondent, will serve to emphasise our view that, broadly speaking, the publication of inedited poems by eminent hands is a risky and ill-advised business. If Rossetti had considered "The Ballad of Jan Van Hunks" worthy of a poet of his reputation it seems to us that he would have published it himself and obtained for it such reward as might be forthcoming. The only real excuses for publication twenty-six years after his death are:

1. That it will help the sales of the English Review.

2. That it has brought grist to the mill of Mr. Watts-Dunton.

The sacrifice of Rossetti for such purposes may not be a very serious affair, but we do not think the poet himself would have relished it. And as for the corrections, if we know anything about Dante Gabriel Rossetti at all, they would have driven him into something of a fury. It is all very well for a dying poet to hand small manuscripts to his friends for keepsakes, but when those friends take it upon themselves to edit and publish them as serious examples of a poet's art they travel into a region where friendship becomes a doubtful quantity. Perhaps Mr. Watts-Dunton will favour the town with the explanation which seems to be due from him.

REVIEWS

NOYES ABOUT MORRIS

William Morris. By ALFRED NOYES. (Macmillan, English Men of Letters Series. 2s. 6d.)

We suppose that the commissioning of a poet to write the life of a poet is a natural and proper literary affair; and that in practice it works out pretty much on the principle of set a thief to catch a thief. The which adage, of course, we quote without making the smallest reflection on Mr. Noyes or the late William Morris. At the same time, it seems to us that it is not always a poet of Mr. Noyes's sort who should be requisitioned for the duties of critical biographer of a poet of Morris's sort. We have hopes of Mr. Noyes as poet, pure and simple; because, taking him all round, he has been bold to fly and not too careful of his shins. We should have considered that after "Drake" he would have betaken himself to some expansive waste of tableland and done his best to soar once again, this time, perhaps, without the assistance of Patriotism and the stage carpenters. But alas for the vanity of critical hopes. Mr. Noyes has been "approached"—no doubt with the best and most liberal intentions—by Messrs. Macmillan, and he leaves his flying machine on Horeb, or upon a peak at Shepherd's Bush, or wherever he keeps it, and comes patiently and meritoriously down to plain book-writing about William Morris. It is obvious that the writing of even a short life of Morris must have occupied a good deal of Mr. Noyes's time and thoughts for, at any rate, quite a fortnight. It is obvious also that, while we are really not concerned in the matter, even a fortnight snatched holus bolus out of the fervid leisure of a rampant, cloud-compelling poet may be a serious loss to poetry. It is not so much the frantic fortnight as the frame of mind which is bound to result. Between the writing of epics and the plodding along with biographies there is all the difference between running for the Derby and carting stones. In this precious fortnight Mr. Noyes may conceivably and unwittingly have foregone the opportunity of his life. When the heavenly muses knock at a man's door nowadays he should take particularly good care to be at home and not otherwise engaged. The heavenly muses are hard mistresses, and jealous. Persons with other business to attend to can scarcely hope for a proper continuance of their favours. Besides which the bare routine of raking up the facts about a man's life and the dull duty of perusing, often against one's will, his frequently overpraised writings is a task which may prove most harmful to a poet's tender and susceptible intellectuality. However, Mr. Noyes has seen fit to accept Messrs. Macmillan's commission, and we must take it for granted that the heavenly muses know how to take care of themselves, and that Mr. Noyes's deflection will be condoned, or perhaps considered of slight moment. Meanwhile, we must admit "William Morris" into the English Men of Letters Series for what it is worth. One reads Mr. Noyes's pages with a sort of breathlessness; for on the whole they are not so much the pages of a critic or a biographer as of a rhapsodist. Mr. Noyes would appear to have set out to make a Morris of his own rather than to give us an arrangement of the facts. And the consequence is that the biography will make pleasant reading for the persons who admire fancy writing and will, no doubt, be admired by certain of Morris's friends and hangers-on. But as a contribution to a series on the lines of the English Men of Letters Series, it appears to us to be somewhat of a mistake. If we are to believe Mr. Noyes, Morris was at once a lesser man than Tennyson, and a good deal greater. "Morris's debt to Tennyson," we are told "is an immense one; and it does not in the least detract from his greatness or even his originality that this should be so, any more than would the debt of a son to his father. But the fact remains that the man who wrote 'In Memoriam,' the 'Ballad of the Revenge,' the great 'Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington,' the 'Northern Farmer,' and 'The Princess,' had a range of which Morris was unaware altogether. Writing out of a full-hearted admiration and enthusiasm for the work of Morris, it seems at the outset more than ever necessary for us to emphasise this. No doubt Tennyson wrote some bad poetry; but let us reverse the methods of his critics and take Morris's description of the lady who, having made the acquaintance of Rossetti:

lived in a hall
Large in the eyes, and slim and tall;
And ever she sang from noon to noon,
Two red roses across the moon;

let us compare that description with the solemn swell of Tennyson's majestic 'Morte D'Arthur':

So all the day long the noise of battle roll'd
Among the mountains by the winter sea;
Until King Arthur's table, man by man,
Had fallen in Lyonesse about their Lord,
King Arthur: then, because his wound was deep,
The bold Sir Bedivere uplifted him,
And bore him to a chapel nigh the field,
A broken chancel with a broken cross,
That stood on a dark strait of barren land.
On one side lay the Ocean, and on one
Lay a great water, and the moon was full.

The august simplicity of passages like that was now and always beyond the reach of Morris, as also was the marvellous resource of the rolling organ-music of Tennyson's verse, exemplified in the sudden glorious change in the rhythmic beat where, indeed, one knows not the speech from the thought, the body from the soul of the poem, so perfectly are they wedded.

The old order changeth, yielding place to new.

And that, of course, is the whole philosophy of the matter. Morris's poetry was of a new order, and very thankful we may be for its advent, lest 'one good custom' should have corrupted the world." This is Mr. Noyes all over. Comparisons are odious at best, but who in his senses would seriously set himself to "compare" chalk and cheese. If Mr. Noyes wishes to be taken for a critic, he must really learn to be a little reasonable. Even the maddest and most pedantic of "literary" examiners would scarcely invite one to "compare" two such passages as those instanced by Mr. Noyes. If he wanted something of Tennyson to collate with the "two red roses across the moon" verses, there was Mariana, not to mention Oriana, lying to his hand. We are not concerned to defend Morris against Tennyson. Tennyson was a poet; Morris was something of a poet and perhaps more of a paper-hanger; so that Mr. Noyes is quite right in his main contention, though it is a contention which did not require to be stated. And having been at great pains to convince us that Tennyson was the better poet, Mr. Noyes finds himself, in a chapter marked "Conclusion," compelled to write as follows:

O hearken the words of his voice of compassion:
"Come cling round about me, ye faithful who sicken
Of the weary unrest and the world's passing fashion!
As the rain in mid-morning your troubles shall thicken,
But surely within you some Godhead doth quicken,
As ye cry to me heeding, and leading you home."

"What is all this but the gold and frankincense and myrrh of his three kings? In every line that Morris wrote he was helping on earth to build that distant, continuing city whose first foundation was jasper, the second sapphire, the third a chalcedony, the fourth an emerald. There was no preciousness in his choice of the Middle Ages as his 'form and style.' He turned to them as world-weary men turn to their own childhood, knowing perhaps that, except as a little child in glittering armour, he could not enter into his Kingdom of Heaven. His abiding city was not, and never could be, here. His work is suffused with the eternal light of that vision of an ultimately reconciled and ransomed world to which Shelley attained and Keats was climbing when he murmured, 'Beauty is truth, truth beauty!' the vision shadowed forth in sign and symbol by all the prophets of all the ages; the unconquerable and inviolable hope of mankind, that the desert and solitary place shall at last break into singing, and the wilderness blossom as the rose, and sorrow and sighing flee away." Here, of course, we have some of the eloquence of the late Dr. Parker. It is the kind of writing that Mr. Noyes considers beautiful, and he has keyed-up his man Morris to fit charmingly into it; but it is not criticism, and it is certainly not biography. We do not suppose for a moment that anybody who has read Morris's published writings will have two opinions about Mr. Noyes's assessment of them. Always and inevitably he is too anxious to cry "swans" when there are no swans. Hence it comes to pass that, broadly speaking, whenever he quotes he overpraises, and on occasion he is not above praising downright blemishes. For example, he quotes, with admiration for their craftsmanship, the following stanzas:

Because stout Gareth lets his spear fall low,
Gauwaine and Lancelot and Dinadan
Are helm'd and waiting; let the trumpets go!
Bend over, ladies, to see all you can!

Clench teeth, dames, yea, clasp hands, for Gareth's spear
Throws Kay from out his saddle, like a stone
From a castle-window when the foe draws near—"Iseult!" Sir Dinadan rolleth overthrown.

Mr. Noyes informs us that when we compare—he will be comparing—a line like

The ploughman homeward plods his weary way, or the way in which Gray maintains the regularity of the metrical beats throughout his "Elegy" with the way in which Morris departs from it in

Clench teeth, dames, yea, clasp hands for Gareth's spear
Throws Kay, etc.,

it is obvious that Morris "does not err from mere lack of craftsmanship." The fact that he does err, and errs very uncouthly, in the two stanzas instanced, is nothing to Mr. Noyes. We are told that Morris's verses "should be read slowly, almost syllable by syllable, with due regard to their childlike mediæval naïveté," which in itself, however, is an admission that there is something mightily wrong with them. And we are also bidden to infer that when Morris rhymes "ago" and "go," he is really having recourse to "masterly artistic devices." This, need one say, is the old, old trick of the appraiser who prides himself on seeing good in everything. A poet like William Morris gains nothing by such a method of explication. Considered for what he is worth—namely, as a contriver of rather drowsy and superfluous histories in verse, William Morris, poet, is all very well in his way. But Mr. Noyes would find it very difficult to discover to us any line or passage in Morris's poetical writings, which may be properly considered great poetry. Tacitly he admits this much himself, but he will not say so in as many words for fear of giving offence, or it may be for fear of losing faith in the poet for whom he is so anxious to claim wonders. Morris has added nothing to the spiritual currency of poetry. He is not even a poet's poet in the sense that one may rake him for symbols with any proper advantage. Though he appears to be all gold and glitter and frankincense and myrrh and roses, and, if Mr. Noyes will so have it, jasper and chalcedony, there is very little about him that is even decorative. Mr. Noyes believes that it is possible that Morris wrote the "greatest epic of the nineteenth century," which is perhaps not saying much; but who reads, or who is going to read, "Sigurd the Volsung," great epic or otherwise? The fact is that a poet whom nobody reads is, to say the least, in a difficult position, and no amount of praise on the part of other poets will get him out of it. If Mr. Noyes had confessed this much to himself, he would probably not have put quite so much paint on his lily. We note that one of the reviews of Mr. Noyes's "William Morris" says that the book reads like a romance. This is true, with the difference that it reads like an ill-considered romance. Mr. Noyes should get back to his aeroplane.

LOVE AND A WOMAN

Love and a Woman. By CHARLOTTE MANSFIELD. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

IN the first impetuous heat of criticism, after reading this book, we thought the best plan would be to call the heroine a little idiot and have done with it; but, upon consideration, we are forced to conclude that she is quite a presentable person in the way of intellect, only suffering vicariously from the disabilities of the author. The situation which forms the central motive of the story is perplexing, and is dealt with in a perplexing manner. We are asked to believe that Sir Ronald Hartley is a gentleman, honourable and of unstained character, while he loves and wins the love of Eileen, the sweet and simple heroine in whose cheeks "the perfume of the roses deepened" (sic); we are even led to infer that it is quite a fine thing for a married man to carry on such an intrigue; that the dishonour would have come had he broken with Eileen; that his wife's flirtations formed some sort of an excuse for amorous reprisals. True, he dies voluntarily at the end of the book, expires gracefully and very lingeringly from a slow, secret poison self-administered, and puts the girl, who comes disguised as a nurse for a final farewell, into the arms of the doctor; and as this medical man is her cousin, in love with her, better morals may prevail later on. But we are compelled to protest against this unskilled resuscitation of a type of novel we had thought played out; it was not worth doing.

We cannot say anything pleasant about the style in which the book is written. The would-be funny paragraph pervades it to an annoying extent:

Eileen was seated next to a young man who had waxed moustaches in lieu of a 'Varsity education, and was considered quite the buck of the boarding-house, because he had engaged from the local stables a nag of uncertain blood to carry him for an hour every morning. His father (viz., Mr. Hugh Watson's father, not the sire of the nag) was something in the North, cotton some said, cutlery others suggested, but already three women of uncertain age and matrimonial yearnings had preened themselves when in his presence.

Pages of that kind of writing become maddening. The composition is poor in the extreme; for lack of good punctuation the sentences limp pitifully:

But the beauty of the morning filled the man with hope, the presence so near of the woman he loved seemed to assure him that hope would not be in vain, but he had promised not to bother her, he would wait.

. . . the general effect was pretty, and, at any rate, seemed a room to live and love in. . . Harriet wore the new apron, accompanied by an air of excitement, and had polished her face with Sunlight soap so that it looked like a burnished brick—if there is such a thing.

In many places the wording is more suitable for a book for a small child:

Near one of the windows stood the table—the table so carefully laid and bedecked with the sweet red roses. The canaries had gone to roost in their beribboned cages, but Boy was on guard, not half so interested in his bright favour as in the smell of cooking which stole up the stairs and made Eileen quite nervous lest something should be burnt.

The attempts at epigram are not particularly exhilarating, and several of them we should feel inclined to call sheer nonsense.

We have dealt at some length with this novel because, according to the publisher's statement accompanying it, Miss Mansfield's former book is in its twelfth thousand, and we are concerned in the standard of literature such a circulation should imply. It is possible to appreciate, though not necessarily applaud, the author who gives us a strong, stern presentation of a phase of the emotions, without comment, saying as it might be "Here you are—take it or leave it, but it is life"; and we can value the writer who laboriously and earnestly endeavours to trace the crimson thread of passion through its sinuous course among the other threads of our existence; but this painting of a very common and sordid liaison in the tints of purity it is impossible to respect. We understand that Miss Mansfield has started this week for an exploration of the upper regions of the Nile. If she contemplates pursuing the career of a novelist, it would have been more advisable to stay at home and explore the possibilities of the English language.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Baronet's Wife. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

FOUR months ago we noticed a book of Miss Florence Warden's with moderate praise, and on finishing the perusal of her latest novel we feel strongly inclined to waive the critic's right and merely repeat the historic formula attributed to Abraham Lincoln: "People who like this sort of thing will find it just the sort of thing they like." For the story is a good one, with a mystery, a plausible villain, burglars, thieves, poisoners (very genteel and moving in the best society), and a love affair, quite in the style of the early seventies. But, somehow, it lacks grip; it is a tale, and nothing more. The desire to know the solution of the mystery why the baronet's bold, bad, beautiful wife acted so curiously and suspiciously—will probably carry most readers through to the end, but there is small profit to be gained for their trouble. The idea that a lady of title should be a receiver of stolen property, should secrete in her room the proceeds of burglaries at neighbouring country houses, even if she was rather afraid of the guest who persuaded her to become his accomplice, is too crude for our liking. No woman with a grain of intelligence would have allowed the matter to go so far; she would have told the husband whom she professed to love so well. The book will form a pleasant enough companion for a railway journey—for some people. For our part, if it were daytime and the sun were shining, we should prefer to look out of the carriage window.

The Capture of Paul Beck. By M. McDONNELL BODKIN, K.C. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

If we are to suffer more of Sherlock Holmes, as seems probable, it is well that some kindly and clever author should have provided us with a very human and fascinating detective romance by way of a homœopathic antidote. To those of our readers who like a story that has to be consumed at one sitting we can recommend this last adventure of Paul Beck. The plotting and counter-plotting of Beck and Miss Dora Myrl, the young lady inquisitor, are irresistible, and the two love affairs which run parallel with the other complications are depicted with a humour which is admirable and a style which shapes itself capitally to the nature of its burden. The "capture," we presume, refers to Beck himself, and not to the coup which forms the climax of the story; for the wily one falls a victim to the manifold attractions of his rival, Miss Myrl, and is transfixed by the little detective whose random arrows surprise most of us sooner or later. At the opening chapters we rather resented the old idea of a man having a "double," but we are able to forgive the use of this ancient and honourable device by reason of the deftness of its exploitation—it has rarely been employed to better effect.

A scene on the New York Stock Exchange during a time of panic is strongly portrayed, and seems worthy of quotation:

Early that day a bolt had fallen from the blue. In a quiet hour, and without a hint of warning, a ferocious attack had been delivered on Marconi's Wireless, and the Standard Oil showed boldly in the front of the battle, leading the bears. No security could hold against such an attack. The Marconi prices broke at once. Without rest or respite the shares were driven down headlong. Still the bears sold and sold. The investors caught the panic and joined in the stampede. Then of a sudden one man sprang into the breach. Like a Horatius on the bridge he held his ground while the enemy stormed in their thousands around him. . . . Almost, as it were, in a breath he snapped up from the yelling crowd half a dozen offers at once. His "Done," "Done," "Done," "Done," emphasised with pointing forefinger, came sharp and fast as revolver shots. Then there was a pause, and the Standard Oil leaders flung themselves upon him. He took all their lances on his shield, never yielding an inch, while block after block of the shares were hurled at him. The conflict was still in full swing when Armitage had rushed into the club smoking-room and gathered its progress from the cablegrams in the evening paper. The men round the tape, that unemotionally rolled out its wild news, could almost see the blows struck in this conflict of giants at the other side of the broad ocean. It was a game in which the stakes were piled up in millions, and its varying fortunes gripped the hearts of the speculators.

The vicissitudes of Mr. Beck probably do not come to an untimely end with his wedding bells—they ought, rather, to begin a fresh and most interesting stage, surely, at the marriage of two clever detectives—and as soon as Mr. Bodkin sees fit we shall be glad to welcome him again.

The Ways of Men. By HERBERT FLOWERDEW. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

FOR ingenuity of plot we suppose Wilkie Collins has rarely been surpassed—it used to be quite a brain-racking affair to read his novels and remember the necessary relationships and evolutions of his characters. Without trying us to that extent, Mr. Flowerdew has shown a skill in the construction of his romance, a pleasant, competent manner of unfolding it, and a consideration for the smoothness of his language, which reminds us somewhat of the author of "The Woman in White," and which we can only regard with admiration. He sustains the purely narrative form at a high level throughout a fairly long book, with hardly a page of description, and only so much psychological exposition as shall suffice to elucidate the actions of the chief performers: this in itself is an excellent thing to have accomplished. We do not intend to spoil a good story, for those of our readers who will see it, by skeletonising it, but we may mention that the ordinance which forbade a man to marry his deceased wife's sister forms a source of complication to at least three persons. Aaron Harbinger, the principal character (he is scarcely a hero in his behaviour), does commit this "crime"—the date of events being just before the law was altered—and the tangle is tightened by a flirtation which lands him in a predicament, financially and socially, so degraded that we can find it in us to mingle pity with our contempt. All comes right in the end; but it would be most unfair to let the secret out in a review.

The prim Canon Porteous is quite a capital bit of character-drawing; we think our readers will appreciate the following little sketch of him:

It was the Canon, of course, who made the Rectory seem like a prison to Clarice. He was one of those thoroughly good men who make their goodness a little uncomfortable for those around them. He wished to impose on his household the ascetic rules which he rigidly practised himself. As Clarice grew up and chose her own dresses, her own method of arranging her hair, and her own pursuits, she found herself for ever exciting the Canon's disapproval. He had trained his timid wife to at least an outward submission to his wishes, but Clarice was one of the modern, sensible girls who think for themselves and are difficult to suppress. When Canon Porteous rebuked her for worldliness she made a merry retort, and left to herself she would either have "managed" the good man completely, and succeeded in following her own way in everything, or have shaken the dust of Morley Rectory from her pretty feet, and sought independence elsewhere. But the deep affection for her aunt which kept her there, made her also more amenable to its rules, and for the sake of Aunt Helena's peace of mind she never wore her prettiest dresses, read modern novels by stealth, and did a great deal more plain sewing for the poor of the parish than she cared for.

The narration is clever, in the best of taste, and exhibits hardly a fault in its composition. The author permits himself the use of the word "phenomenal" in the sense of "extraordinary"; the expression "approached nearer" is tautological, and probably merely an oversight, judging from the general care and nicety of phrasing shown throughout the book; otherwise we have nothing but praise. The interest is well maintained to the final page, and we congratulate Mr. Flowerdew on having carried his task to completion in a virile and distinctive manner.

What Woman Wills. By LUCAS CLEEVE. (Long, 6s.)

LUCAS CLEEVE is an old favourite among novel readers. What is more, she is possessed of quite exceptional skill in the setting forward of a story, and she wastes no words. We do not know that the present "What Woman Wills" is in any sense a really enjoyable tale, particularly as the author has dragged in the now fashionable sacrifice of clothing in the interests of art. But, although the nude is here, Lucas Cleeve has managed to present it without suggestiveness. And as readers of fiction have long since given up blushing they may possibly be amused, instead of shocked or disgusted. The book is well written, and it ends as it should—that is to say, happily. We can specially recommend "What Woman Wills" to readers who have faith in the ultimate beauty of the American character. It appears that those persons who imagine that America is given over to dollar-hunting lack wit; for the Americans, according to Lucas Cleeve, have souls, and they believe in "art." Yet she makes her pretty, engaging, wilful, fluffly-haired heroine marry a Frenchman—or is he a French Jew?—by the name of Eph Marks.

Flower of the World. By MRS. HENRY TIPPETT. (Long, 6s.)

MRS. TIPPETT commences operations with the appended dedication:

TO
H. A. L.
WITH GRATEFUL LOVE DO I DEDICATE THIS
THE FIRST-BORN OF MY PEN.

We should be sorry to be unkind to an author who can write of a first book in this feeling manner. At the same time, we do not consider "Flower of the World" in any sense an entertaining novel. Mrs. Tippet's view of the world and its flowers is, on the whole, a rather melancholy view. And some of her pictures of women are quite distressing. We doubt if she understands the female intellect at all. Her views on most matters are correct and conventional, however, and persons who can swallow her hero and her feminine villain may read the book to the end, where they will learn that "Margaret's wedding-day broke gloriously." How one longs for a novelist who will take the bull by the horns, as it were, and marry off Margaret, or Peggy, or Joan, as the case may be, in common wet weather.

THE MATERIAL DELIGHT OF BOOKS

LET us not start upon cross purposes. Material is an adjective of various turns, but the delight we have in mind follows no special richness of trapping in the books themselves, and has but little to do with rare bindings and limited editions. Such may call it forth as well as another, but it is independent of them. Format, in short (that blessedly mysterious word!), hardly affects at all this pleasure-giving quality, for to those sensible of it the charm is rather one of friendship, and, above all, association, than of allurements that can be bought for a handful of guineas in the market-place. To a book-lover of this kidney his treasures will but grow the more precious for the signs they bear of honourable usage. For him a battered Virgil, or his well-thumbed "Elia," will have a value greater even than that of the marvellous copy of Les Cent Nouvelles, "bound for Margaret of Valois by Clovis Eve, and powdered with the gilt daisies that Queen had selected for her device." It is to this material fashion of delight that belong (if we will but recall them honestly) those earliest book-memories that come back to us from childhood. In the nursery, at least, a book is no mere lifeless instrument for the conveyance, in so many printed pages, of its author's meaning; it is itself a friendly and beloved object, ravishing as to the outside with flaunting hues, and rich pictorially within (so illustrators have their use); a thing of solidity, moreover, and sensible weight, apt on occasion for the buttressing of leaden armies. If it be urged that this last advantage is one but faintly pertinent to literature, let us descend a little in the House of Life, one stair-flight, say, and recall what volumes were those cherished by older children in the schoolroom. Many we have in mind, goodly tomes all, and dear to memory almost as much for themselves as for the enchantments they contained. Henty, gloriously fat, and trimmed as to his edges with an olive smoothness grateful to the finger; and Crusoe, a little stiff, perhaps, until the back of him was broken by adversity, and he, perforce, unbent, but ever afterwards a friend. Best of all, an aged "Tower of London," coverless, but so enriched with various and haunting pictures that even to turn the leaves was an adventure in itself. One picture especially there was, more blood-curdling than its fellows (was it Herne seen by lightning on the Terrace, or the Destruction of the Oak?), insomuch that its alarming influence was felt even in the pages on either side of it, and merely to open the book at haphazard in its neighbourhood was to experience goose-flesh. They publish Ainsworth as a "pocket classic" now, but who will tell us that the old thrill remains!

A little later still, in the same room perhaps, or in the library below, one sees other friends. Dickens it is now, and Lever; Thackeray not yet, and even afterwards loved rather despite than for its qualities as an actual book. But the others! Dombey was the first, a chance discovery, the most wonderful that ever happened. To sit long winter afternoons through, curled in one of those great thrones before the library fire, with Dombey open upon one's knees, and (if the gods were more than ordinary kind) an orange, sugar-plugged, at hand for an occasional stimulant to joy, was this Paradise enow for a boy who ought at that very moment, probably, to have been taking unpleasant exercise out of doors? Plague upon the pedants and bibliophiles (or so they call themselves!) who would preserve a First Edition from the combined effects of fire and orange-juice! What do they know of the delight of books? We can see that one to-day—and smell the musty, intoxicating aroma of its pages. There was on most of them a certain brown stain of rust or damp that permeated the whole, and broke out most strongly, in a rash like measles, upon the plates. Looking back with older eyes we may deplore this, but at the time its presence did but give, we think, an added interest. They belonged to the story, these familiar freckles, and had, we are sure, their part in our enjoyment of it. Florence, Captain Cuttle, Mr. Carker, even the entrancing Toots himself—would they be to us the same magical beings, unbronzed and spotted? We doubt it much.

There were other volumes also of this time, but of a different company, that point our moral. School-books these, held then in common ownership, and small personal regard, but since how dear! Who amongst us can meet them now unmoved, or who is there to whom the chance echo of a classic phrase (even the tedious history of Balbus and his never-ended wall) will not bring back a vision of the very page from which it first was conned—a page so blotted, torn and scribbled over as to have gained a meaning of its own, and need deciphering like ancient manuscript? Has that no value for itself, and no delight? Laughter and tears and memory are in the very feel of it.

Nor, on this matter of the sensual attraction (so to call it) of certain books, as things answerable to sight and touch, should yet another proof be overlooked. Let any who still doubt remember their own experience, coming by chance on some familiar and beloved work in a strange house, it may be, or the parlour of an inn. Even if the outward semblance be as we ourselves have always known it (and how much more if not) a subtle change it is, nevertheless, upon the whole. There are the same friendly and companionable words, the pages that we could repeat almost by heart, but over what impassable barrier do they now call to us, with thin and alien voices? The book, in short, is but an echo of itself, lacking altogether the full-throated appeal of that upon our own shelves at home.

Moreover, if this be true of one belonging to a friend, what can be said of those impersonal and soulless bodies, boasting no human ownership, the merchandise of the Circulating Library? These at best are but the courtesans of their kind, consolers of no man's private hearth, but trafficking their favours to whosoever boasts twopence with which to hire them. Does he exist who has gotten balm from Boots' or comfort out of Mudie? Even pencilled comments in the margin cannot bind the library copy with an enduring chain; the jade will but snigger at them and you on the knees of her next patron.

The whole argument then comes back to this, that in certain bound and printed pages there lurks, indefinable but real, a charm that is peculiar to themselves, linking their material presence so closely to their inward grace that each is but a portion of one whole. Happy, thrice happy, the man who has his shelves full of them. Such a one will neither a borrower nor a lender be willingly, for from this practise he gains small pleasure, and from that he shrinks as too callous a treatment of his dear ones. Well-thumbed they may be, and the better loved for it, but the thumbs must be his own. Woe to the ill-omened mark that shall betray the grasp of the stranger! Ille (whoever he was) nefasto te posuit die! and by so much is the old intimate and material delight of that especial book lessened in its master's eyes. Quick! let indiarubber be called for, and the horror, as far as possible, removed. The patient is recovering already; but never again shall it venture from the hands that love and cherish it.

A. E.

DOCKET

THE N.E.D. suggests only possible connection with dock. Apart from an unexplained doket in the Towneley Mysteries, which, possibly, is quite a different word, docket means, roughly (15-19 cent.), "abstract, summary, memorandum." Its more special meanings are "endorsement, label, ticket" (Phillips, 1706), and "warrant certifying payment of Custom dues." The form is indifferently docquet, docket, dogget, the latter being the earliest quoted (doggettes, 1483), while the verb dogget occurs as late as 1692. Minshew's definition is probably the oldest: "Docket is a breife in writing. . . . West* writeth it dogget, by whom it seemeth to be some small piece of paper, or parchment, containing the effect of a large writing." If dogget be the original form, this may be It. doghette, a derivative of doga. For doga Florio gives only "a deal board to make hogsheds with," but Torriano gives doga . . . "by met. a bende in armory, a garbe or border about a garment," and doghette, the dim. of doga, "by met. bendlets in armory." Veneroni, ed. Castelli, has "doghette, bandelettes, en armoirie, Bindelwerck in der Wappen-Kunst, ligulæ heraldicæ." The word is not in the Voc. della Crusca, or, apparently, in any of the modern It. dictionaries, but it seems a legitimate formation from doga. For the business use of a heraldic term, cf. E. label, with which docket is sometimes synonymous (N.E.D. docket, 7). Altieri gives "doga [lista, fregia], stripe"; and E. list, now synonymous with some meanings of docket, originally meant "strip, selva," etc.; cf. various meanings of Mod. G. Leiste. Cf. also schedule (G. Zettel), F. bordereau, also to some extent synonymous with docket, both diminutives meaning originally "shred, strip," and E. scroll, M.E. scrowe, from O.F. escroue, originally "shred." Assuming the original form to be dogget, the change to docket admits of various explanations. The word may have been influenced by the group of words, brocket, cocket, loket, pocket, socket (Skinner even derives it from ticket), by the verb dock,† to curtail (from which Minshew appears to derive it), or even by document, or, as the N.E.D. suggests, by the modern noun dock. But the most probable influence is that of cocket, Custom House warrant, with which it would naturally occur ("Cockets and dockets and drawbacks and other jargon," Swift, 1712), and with which it was occasionally synonymous (N.E.D. docket, 8). That, in spite of all these influences, the "g" form survived so late is strong presumptive evidence of its being the original. The first occurrence (1483) is early for an It. word, nor have I any evidence of doghette being used commercially in It. The latter objection is not fatal; cf. label and ticket, both used in E. in senses unknown in F.

ERNEST WEEKLEY.

CORRESPONDENCE

MR. WATTS-DUNTON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The English Review for the present month has made a certain stir among amateurs of English verse by the publication, for the first time, of a humorous ballad by Rossetti. To give to the world, twenty-six years after his death, a complete long poem, and one in an altogether new vein, by so great a man, is, whatever the merit of that poem may be, to make literary history, and it might be thought that any person to whom the privilege of publishing it fell would not do his work otherwise than conscientiously and satisfactorily. Surely it is a serious matter to transfer the words of a dead genius from the written to the printed page; a solemn duty to give as exact an equivalent, character for character, as printer's type allows!

Had the person who is responsible for the publication of "The Ballad of Jan Van Hunks" (presumably Mr. Watts-Dunton, who owns the manuscript, and contributes "a few words of explanation" of "its appearance in print at this time of day") stopped short at printing the forty-four stanzas of the ballad, the accuracy of the transcript might never have been suspected; but he has enabled us to judge of the way in which the work has been done by adding a "fac-simile of last verses. . . ." This photographic reproduction gives the last sixteen lines, which, as written in the poet's large, clear handwriting, run as follows:—

"A shrieking wretch hung over his back
As he sank through nether space.
Of such a rider on such a steed
What tongue the flight shall trace?

The bearer shook his burthen off
As he reached his retinue:
He's flung him into a knot of fiends,
Red, yellow, green and blue:—
'I've brought a pipe for my private use,—
Go trim it, some of you!'

They've sliced the very crown from his head,—
Worse tonsure than a monk's,—
Lopped arms and legs,—stuck a red-hot tube
In his wretchedest of trunks;
And when the Devil wants his pipe,
They bring him Jan Van Hunks."

Now for the printed version:—

"A shrieking wretch hung over his back
As he sank through nether space.
Of such a rider on such a steed
What tongue the flight shall trace?"

A Special Offer to Smokers

OUR JAMAICA CIGARS are equal in aroma and taste to those from Havana, whilst the cost is half that of the latter. A sample box, containing 25 of each of the following brands of Cigars, will be sent post free to anyone filling in the coupon below and enclosing P.O., cheque or stamps for 10/6 to us:—

Flor	80/- per 100	Bouquet Fines ...	35/- per 100
Celestiales	65/- per 100	Caribas	33/- per 100
Favoritas	65/- per 100	Conchas Especiales	30/- per 100
Ideales	45/- per 100	Exquisitos	27/6 per 100
Perfectos	45/- per 100	Excellentos	27/6 per 100
Governor	42/- per 100	J. T. C.	25/- per 100
Reina Victoria ...	38/- per 100	Operas	22/6 per 100
Londres Imperiales	37/6 per 100	Young Ladies ...	20/- per 100

IMPORTED EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES:

The "Seymour"	6/6 per 100
Lord Rothschild, Gold Tipped	9/6 per 100

TURKISH CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 1	6/6 per 100
----------------------	-------------

VIRGINIA CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 2	5/6 per 100
----------------------	-------------

RUSSIAN, BRAZILIAN, AND LEAF-COVERED CIGARETTES... .. from 8/- per 100

TOBACCO MIXTURE:

Medium... ..	10/- per lb.	Mild	12/- per lb.
--------------	--------------	-------------	--------------

JAMRACH & CO.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS

199 PICCADILLY, LONDON

Suppliers to the Nobility.

Established 1871.

Please forward me, post paid,
for which I enclose
Name
ACADEMY. Address

*Thomas West, fl. 1568-94, Symbolaeographia, 1590 (D.N.B.).

†A docked, or short introduction of a matter, documentum (Gouldman).

The bearer shook his burden off
As he reached his retinue:
He has flung him into a knot of fiends,
Red, yellow, green and blue:
'I have brought a pipe for my private use,
Go trim it, some of you!'

They have sliced the very crown from his head,
Worse tonsure than a monk's—
Lopped arms and legs, stuck a red-hot tube
In his wretchedest of trunks;
And when the Devil wants his pipe
They bring him Jan Van Hunks."

Compare the two, and you will observe no less than ten variations in eleven lines (from "The bearer . . ." to ". . . his pipe")! What is to be thought of this? What was Mr. Watts-Duntton—who describes the manuscript as "one of my most cherished possessions"—doing to make, or to allow to be made, these purposeless, but apparently intentional departures from the original?

There is no reason at all to suppose these lines are printed less accurately than the remainder of the poem, which contains (if we may trust the English Review even so far) 264 lines. By a perfectly legitimate deduction we may therefore assume that the published version contains about one hundred and eighty errors.

The poet's punctuation has been revised for him; his spelling modernised; his colloquialisms translated; his metre modified. This we can see for ourselves. But what else may not have been done to improve Rossetti's work? Perhaps a phrase or two has been softened, as being not quite suited to family reading; the sequence of the stanzas altered in a few cases, thereby enhancing the effect of the whole; certain stanzas, below the level of the rest in point of excellence, or retarding the progress of the narrative, omitted. Those of us who love Rossetti's work, and who at the same time hate all editions of notable writings which are modernised, abridged, expurgated, adapted to domestic or Protestant perusal, furnished with apparatus criticus or variorum references or running commentary, or in any other manner deformed or defiled, would surely be glad to know what this ballad is really like; and it is to be hoped that when the next edition of its author's works is issued, a correct transcription will enable them to do so.

BATTISCOMBE GUNN.

78, Gower Street, W.C.
January 13th, 1909.

"I WOULD LIKE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I read, quite recently, the following sweeping assertion in "The King's English," published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford: "I would like, is not English." As a linguist, I beg to submit my humble opinion in the matter: When I would like is meant as the translation for j'aimerais, je voudrais, in French, it is not English, and I should like must therefore be used instead; because when one speaks of things over which one's will can have no control, as for instance, when one speaks of one's feelings, which is the case here, shall, in the first person, expresses a simple future event, and should (in the first person) a simple condition.

Conditional mood, present Conditionnel présent du tense of the verb To Like. verbe Aimer.

I should like.	J'aimerais.
Thou wouldst like.	Tu aimerais.
He or she would like.	Il ou elle aimerait.
We should like.	Nous aimerions.
You would like.	Vous aimeriez.
They would like.	Ils ou elles aimeraient.

But when I would like means, in French, je voudrais aimer ou j'aimais habituellement, j'aimais, à suivre, etc., the use of it, to my mind, is justified.

FIRST EXAMPLE.

I would like that man (if I could) on account of his family, but, unfortunately, I cannot: he is such a worthless fellow.*	Je voudrais aimer cet homme (si je le pouvais) à cause de sa famille, mais, malheureusement, je ne le puis: c'est un être si indigne!
--	---

*This example has been borrowed from the Treatise on Shall and Will p. 64) published by HACHETTE & Co., Charing Cross, London.

The meaning of I would like that man, here, is equivalent to I should like to like that man, or I should like to esteem that man. I would, here, is the translation of the Conditional mood, present tense, of the French Verb Vouloir, (je voudrais),†

EXAMPLE.

I would like.	Je voudrais aimer.
Thou wouldst like.	Tu voudrais aimer, or tu aimerais.
He or she would like.	Il ou elle voudrait aimer, or il ou elle aimerait.
We would like.	Nous voudrions aimer.
You would like.	Vous voudriez aimer, or vous aimeriez.
They would like.	Ils ou elles voudraient aimer, or ils ou elles aimeraient.

In the above sentences, the conditional of the Defective and Irregular verb Will forms, with regard to the verb to like, a kind of auxiliary which is in common use in the English language, whenever volition is meant.

In the following examples, would refers merely to habitual practice:

SECOND EXAMPLE.

I would like sweets when I was a child (i.e.—I used to like sweets, etc.).†	J'aimais les bonbons (à suivre, or habituellement) quand j'étais enfant.
Thou wouldst like, etc.	Tu aimais, etc.
He or she would like, etc.	Il ou elle aimait, etc.
We would like, etc.	Nous aimions, etc.
You would like, etc.	Vous aimiez, etc.
They would like, etc.	Ils ou elles aimaient, etc.

EXAMPLES FROM ENGLISH AUTHORS.

Presently I would hear plaintive little chirrups to Boxer, and when I turned round, I would see Boxer and Jenny coming amicably along side by side.—LADY BARKER.

Soudain, j'entendais (j'avais l'habitude d'entendre) de petits cris plaintifs à l'adresse de Boxer, et quand je me retournais, je voyais (je voyais habituellement) Boxer et Jenny arriver d'une manière tout amicale, marchant à côté l'un de l'autre.

She was a good mother . . . yet she would always love my brother above Mary.—CHARLES LAMB.

C'était une bonne mère . . . cependant elle avait toujours plus de tendresse pour mon frère que pour Marie.

When he was irritated, he would rave like a madman.—MASON'S GRAMMAR.

Quand il était irrité, il délirait (il avait l'habitude de délirer) comme un fou.

We would sit out in the air all day, and read and talk.—BESANT & RICE.

Nous nous asseyions (nous avions l'habitude de nous asseoir) dehors, toute la journée, pour lire et causer.

For want of better things to do, I was often singing and guitar-scraping, and we would have many a concert.—THACKERAY.

Faute d'autres distractions, je chantais souvent et pinçais de la guitare, et nous donnions (nous donnions habituellement) bien des concerts.

The smaller birds did not appear to be at all afraid of me, but would hop about me.—SWIFT.

Les petits oiseaux ne semblaient pas du tout me craindre, mais sautillaient (habituellement) autour de moi.

† It might be urged that, for the Imperfect tense of the Indicative, which expresses habit, I liked or I used to like, should be employed instead of I would like, in common parlance. Granted. But the following question now arises whether, as an examiner, I should be justified in marking I would like as a mistake, in the case under consideration? This common Hebrew form being often used in English.

A FRENCH LINGUIST.

["I would like" is perfectly good English, and "A French Linguist" may take it from us that the book to which he refers is not always a reliable guide.—ED.]

† This case, I admit, is theoretically possible, but of very rare occurrence in practice.

HERBERT VIVIAN AND OSCAR WILDE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I have noted for some months past in John Bull Mr. Vivian's reiterated depreciation of Wilde's writings, and perhaps it would not be inopportune to ask what has caused Mr. Vivian to change his opinion of Wilde's merits as a writer. Has he forgotten the time when he asked Wilde to honour him by writing an introduction to a volume of his own reminiscences? There can be little doubt, as Mr. Vivian acknowledged in a letter which is still extant, that the whole interest of the book would have been confined to the introduction.

Oxford, January 12th.

C. S. M.

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I trust some better voice than mine may be raised in protest against the misdirected energy of Mr. E. Wake Cook. Mr. Cook's extraordinary views cannot be allowed to pass without comment, although to the majority of your readers his letter should carry its own condemnation palpably enough; besides, this letter is in the nature of an impertinence, being but a réchauffé of one written by Mr. Cook to Vanity Fair some years ago. In the Vanity Fair letter he says, speaking of Martin's wonderful composition on any scale (sic): "On any scale from four by three inches, up to fourteen by ten feet." One should notice how, in deference, apparently, to the literary atmosphere of THE ACADEMY, this becomes "a twelve-foot canvas or a four-inch wood-block." Half the number of words, but still exhibiting the same precious gem of thought.

At the beginning of Mr. Cook's letter he speaks of Martin as "the most amazing genius that ever appeared in the art world." At the conclusion thereof he implies that this same John Martin achieved the ultra-ridiculous. This very work—which he has dubbed ridiculous—is, he goes on to say, "an amazing work," and "should find a national home." Well! what is one to do with a man like that? And Bulwer Lytton! Good heavens! Bulwer Lytton! in the name of all opacities, Bulwer Lytton! Mr. Cook quotes from him—he does, indeed—and, what's more, he acknowledges his author in THE ACADEMY, a courtesy which he neglects elsewhere. In conclusion, it would be interesting to know what harm Newcastle has ever done to Mr. Cook.

In the words of one of Mr. Cook's most ardent admirers: "The time has now come for a little fresh air to be let in upon the stuffy atmosphere which surrounds these special pleaders." Extract from a letter signed "A British Painter" in Vanity Fair, November 26th, 1903. CALEB PORTER.

Green Room Club, Leicester Square,
January 12th, 1909.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

Great Masters of Dutch and Flemish Painting. W. Bode.
Translated by Margaret L. Clarke. Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.

DRAMA

Master Flachsman. Otto Ernst. Translated by H. M. Beatty. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.
A Social Experiment. A. M. Gwynne. Lothian, 1s.

FICTION

Every Man a King. Orison Swett Marden. Rider.
The Girl from Gatford. Olivia Ramsey. Long, 6s.
Lady Letty Brandon. Annie E. Holdsworth. Long, 6s.
Fatality. G. G. Chatterton. Long, 6s.
High Life in the Far East. James Dalziel. Unwin, 6s.
The Portent, and Other Stories. George Macdonald. Unwin, 3s. 6d.
The Isle of Lies. M. P. Shiel. Laurie, 6s.
The Golden Key. Desmond Coke. Chapman and Hall, 6s.
A Whirl Asunder. Gertrude Atherton. Lane, 1s. net.

HISTORY

The Development of Hungarian Constitutional Liberty. By Count Julius Andrássy, translated from the Hungarian by C. Arthur and Ilona Ginever. Kegan Paul, 7s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Wisdom of Ploninus. Charles Whitby. Rider, 2s. net.
The Reform of the House of Lords. William Sharp McKechnie. Maclehose, 2s. 6d. net.
Dutch Art in the Nineteenth Century. G. Hermine Marius. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. Moring, 15s. net.
The New Punto Tagliato Embroidery. Louisa A. Tebbis. Chapman and Hall, 5s. net.
An Evening with Shakespeare. An entertainment of readings, tableaux, and songs, set to the old tunes; arranged by Maskell Hardy. Chatto and Windus, 1s. 6d. net.
Effects of War on Property. Almá Latifi. Macmillan, 5s. net.
My Experiences of Cyprus. Basil Stewart. Routledge, 6s.
America Revisited and Men I Have Met. Rev. D. Macrae. Smith, 2s. 6d. net.
Hermes and Plato. Edouard Schuré. Translated by F. Rothwell. Rider, 1s. 6d. net.

POETRY

Seen from the Hill, and Other Verses. Helen W. Gibson. Culley, 1s. net.
The Dawn of Life. H. Macnaughton-Jones. Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net.
Conradin: A Philosophical Ballad. C. R. Ashbee. Essex House Press.
Egmont. Herbert Church. Lothian, 2s. 6d.

THEOLOGY

The Fulness of Christ. Edward Stuart Talbot. Macmillan, 1s. 6d. net.
The Religion of the Common Man. Sir Henry Wrixon. Macmillan, 3s. net.

For Those Who Want Something Fresh.

THE LOG OF A SAILORMAN

6s.

By W. BROOKE

Spectator.—"It is quite obvious that Mr. Brooke writes of that which he knows. His descriptions are true, realistic pictures of life at sea."

Athenæum.—"Capital reading and full of good yarns, such as we expect from a man who has spent a score of years at sea."

Daily Chronicle.—"This moving and undoubtedly true account of the wanderings of a nation's nomad. . . . And it is all here—touching and finding quick response in one's heart as only human doings, privations and successes can touch us. Here we see the brutality of Then, the greater humanness of Now—the humour, and humour happily without tragedy—the downright heroism—the grandeur. . . . By heaven! it must have been something worth seeing."

Standard.—"It is a first-rate yarn."

At this season of the year new novels flow from the publishers in a ceaseless stream, and the reader finds it difficult to make his choice among them. At such a time there is always a danger of missing a book that really is worth reading; and we would therefore recommend you to lose no time in ordering from your library or bookseller.

"FEET OF WOOL"

By MARY DEWETT

The book is neither "startling" nor "sensational" nor "daring," like so many that are forcibly thrust upon your notice at this time. It is a wholesome, well-written story of English family life, which gains its effects by legitimate means, and never fails to interest. The plot follows naturally from the well-drawn characters of the different actors, and never flags for an instant from the day when Jaqueline comes to visit her wealthy relative to the final scene, which shows us that, in spite of human schemes and treacheries, the gods have all the time been "creeping on with feet of wool."

6s.

THE CENTURY PRESS,

6s.

69 SURREY STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Books for Sale

AINSWORTH (WILLIAM HARRISON), THE NOVELS OF: 20 vols., fcp. 8vo, cloth, gilt tops. Title design by Brangwyn, and each vol. contains 4 Plates after Cruikshank and other artists. Gibbons, 1901-2. Pub. 50/- net, for 30/-, new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE. Plates, 20 vols., cloth; new; 50s. (cost £7). Another copy in half-morocco, 70s. (cost £10).—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO., BOOKSELLERS, &c.
32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.
NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND WEEKLY PERIODICALS.
AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE DIRECTORIES.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss Messer, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.

BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).

37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature, or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

A. LIONEL ISAACS,
59 PICCADILLY, W.

RARE BOOKS, AUTOGRAPHS, & MSS.

Speciality:—French Illustrated Books of the Eighteenth Century and Modern French EDITIONS DE LUXE.

*Gentlemen wishing to dispose of any of these will oblige by kindly reporting same to me.

Catalogue of Rare Books and MSS. now ready.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIATHE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

Now Ready, completing the record of the Book Year, the January BOOK MONTHLY, 8d. net.CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR.—Small Talk on some Large Literary Matters, with Illustrations to Brighten the Way.

WHAT BOYS READ.—A Talk with the Editor of "The Boys' Own Paper."

"SKIED!"—Conquest of the Air a Literary Necessity.

"PUNCH" POETRY.—And a Quarrel between Tennyson and Lytton.

MISS WINKWORTH.—And their Gossip about Some Great Victorians.

A LONDON LETTER.—Do "Grown-Ups" read Books Written for Young Folk?

THE GENERAL READER.—Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

LIGHT AND LEADING.—New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.—Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH.—A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS.—Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT

Eight years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the chairman. The object in view is clearly stated in the following extract from a letter signed by the Bishop:—

"At present the Institution has an income of only eighteen pounds a year, and this is insufficient for its purpose. The front of the Museum has recently been restored, but the two rooms now used for exhibits are overcrowded, and we feel that the whole of the house should be devoted to the public, who would then be admitted to the 'John Gilpin' room and other rooms now occupied by the Curator. For this purpose it will be necessary to form a small endowment, and it has been calculated that the sum of £2,300 is required. We sincerely trust that the public will respond generously to this appeal."

HANDLEY DUNELM, Chairman of the Committee.

The Secretary is MR. THOMAS WRIGHT, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

Concerning Debating Circles

All who are interested in the formation of Debating and Reading Circles in Clubs and Social Institutes, in Town and Country, should send a penny stamp for a Sixteen-Page Booklet on

How to Form a Debating CirclePUBLIC OPINION

31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

Each week PUBLIC OPINION gives a series of subjects for debate. It not only gives subjects, but puts the questions to be answered, and furnishes a multitude of facts and opinions with which speeches can be made on all sides. No other paper gives so much valuable information on all the great topics of the day. It presents the cream of all the best thought in the best papers and magazines and books.

Every week lengthy and informing summaries of two of the most important books are given, so that in the course of a year the reader is put in possession, by direct quotation, of over one hundred books. In fact, the information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of many pounds.

If a paper like this interests you, write for a Free Specimen Copy to the

Manager of PUBLIC OPINION
31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

It is published at Twopence Weekly. Post free in the United Kingdom 10s. 10d. yearly, or 13s. yearly abroad.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDAR LONDONENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 15s. xiii. ss. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiahs; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.

"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHOOTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discarded ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbedness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.] "The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."

First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.

"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.

"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TANNER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festin d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile.

"Had Browning written prose instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festin d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.

"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a side-purport. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGGIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTELTON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.

"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets adorned with gifts and distinguished by 'the' adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lytton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.] "These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.

"His 'Elizabeth' takes something of a Shakespearian quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 5s. net.

"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Breaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GAMROOD. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPARE. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.
"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.

"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.

"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musical.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman."

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.

Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.

"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TYMAN.

"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

CAEDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

YOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

PUBLICATIONS OF
THE OPEN COURT
PUBLISHING CO.

CHRISTIANITY OF TO-DAY SERIES.

NOW READY.

GOD. An Enquiry into the Nature of Man's Highest Ideal, and a Solution of the Problem from the Standpoint of Science. By PAUL CARUS. 239 pp., cloth, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

JESUS AND MODERN RELIGION. By EDWIN A. RUMBALL. 160 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

WHAT WE KNOW ABOUT JESUS. By CHARLES F. DOLE, D.D. 89 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

PARALIPOMENA. Remains of Gospels and Sayings of Christ. By BERNHARD PICK, Ph.D., D.D. 158 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND MINISTRY OF JESUS. According to the Historical Method. Being a Course of Lectures by RUDOLPH OTTO. Translated from the Third Unaltered Edition by W. J. WHITBY, D.D. Circa 85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

SCRAPBOOK OF ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS. By WM. F. WHITE, State Normal School, New Paltz, N.Y. Cloth, 248 pp., 5s. net.

A few of the seventy sections of this attractive book have the following suggestive titles:—Familiar Tricks, Algebraic Fallacies, Geometric Puzzles, Linkages, A Few Surprising Facts, Labyrinths, The Nature of Mathematical Reasoning, Alice in the Wonderland of Mathematics. The book is supplied with Bibliographic Notes, Bibliographic Index, and a copious General Index.

MAGIC SQUARES AND CUBES. By W. S. ANDREWS. With Chapters by PAUL CARUS, L. S. FRIERSON, and C. A. BROWNE, jun., and Introduction by PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 206 pp., cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

THE SCOPE AND CONTENT OF THE SCIENCE OF ANTHROPOLOGY. By JUL DIESELDORF, A.M. 200 pp., cloth, gilt top, 8s. 6d. net.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S MARTYRDOM, "A Satire." By PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 67 pp., boards with cloth back, 4s. 6d. net.

BEL, THE CHRIST OF ANCIENT TIMES. By Dr. HUGO RADAU. 60 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

AVESTA ESCHATOLOGY. Compared with the Books of Daniel and Revelation. By Dr. LAWRENCE H. MILES. 8vo, viii+83 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. DAVID P. ABBOTT, widely known as the Author of "Behind the Scenes with the Mediums," feels that a star of first magnitude has arisen on the magical horizon, and accordingly has written a pamphlet describing in glowing colors

THE MARVELLOUS CREATIONS OF JOSEFFY. 25 pp., 15 Illustrations, 9d. net.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE HISTORY OF A STRANGE CASE: a Study in Occultism. 50 pp., paper, 9d. net.

Please write for Illustrated Catalogue.

THE
PEOPLE OF THE POLAR NORTH.

A Record by KNUD RASMUSSEN.

Being a presentment of the life, character, customs, legends, and religious belief of the Polar Eskimos, collected during a stay with them, together with some actual experiences narrated by members of the almost extinct race of the East Greenlanders, and a collection of East Greenlandic legends and fables, and also containing sketches of life among the Christianised West Greenlanders of the present day.

Compiled from the Danish Originals and Edited by G. HERRING.

With 150 Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by COUNT HARALD MOLTKE. Royal 8vo, £1 1s. net.

THE STORY OF A LIFETIME. By Lady PRIESTLEY. With numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

ANNE SEYMOUR DAMER. By PERCY NOBLE. With 35 Illustrations and a Frontispiece in Coloured Photogravure, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE CARDINAL DEMOCRAT. Being the Life and Work of the late Cardinal Manning. By I. A. TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA. By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD. Edition de Luxe, printed on specially made hand-made paper, watermarked "Light of Asia," and illustrated with Pictures of Indian Scenes from Photographs by MABEL EARDLEY WILMOT. Demy 8vo, handsomely bound in Roman vellum, 15s. net.

THE PRIVATE PALACES OF LONDON. By E. BENEFORD CHANCELLOR, Author of "The Squares of London." With over 40 Illustrations, crown 4to, £1 1s. net.

DUBLIN CASTLE AND THE IRISH PEOPLE. By BARRY O'BRIEN. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF THE KINGS OF EGYPT. By Dr. WALLIS BUDGE. In 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s. net.

FATHER TYRRELL'S MODERNISM: An Expository Criticism of "Through Scylla and Charybdis," in an Open Letter to Mr. Athelstan Riley. By HAKLUYT EGERTON. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH. With a Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. Fcap 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. net.

This edition has been revised, and contains an Appendix on the sale of "The Vicar of Wakefield."

THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD. By CHARLOTTE M. MASON. Vol. I. THE HOLY INFANCY. Fcap 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 3s. 6d. net. Vol. II. HIS DOMINION. Fcap 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ÆNEID OF VIRGIL. BOOKS VII-XII. Translated into blank verse by HENRY SMITH WRIGHT, B.A. Vol. II. completing the Æneid. Fcap 8vo, net, 5s.

FATHER PAUL. By JAMES CASSIDY. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. "It has a certain charm as potent as it is hard to analyse. It would probably bear even the test of a second reading."—Birmingham Post.

A PROLOGUE, AND OTHER POEMS. By WILLIAM GERARD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Mr. Gerard's poems are poetical. His poetry is really thoughtful, and while not difficult to read, compels the reader's attention."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Please write for our Illustrated Autumn List.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & CO., Dryden House, 43 Gerrard St., London, W.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1916

JANUARY 23, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community. Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net. A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 22 2s. net. [Ready shortly.

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. WYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDARIUM LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 158 x 114. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.
"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to rectify that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of carelessness or tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Poet 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. (Fourth Edition now ready.)
"The greatest poetry is always impersonal. But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."
First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HARRIS-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.
"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-splinters share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.
"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TAMER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bislephile.
"Had Browning written pieces instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.
"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a whoddy. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEBBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LUTTERTON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.
"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'the adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lutters has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Poet 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. (Fourth Edition.)
"These are all of her best work. Every year of her period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.
"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupillage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.
"His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearian quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.
"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Colotypes. Fcap. 4to, 3s. net.
"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GARDNER. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPARE. Crown 8vo, 5s. 7d. net.
"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.
"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.
"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Edinburgh Review.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except in truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.
"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musical.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman.

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.
Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.
"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TYNAN.
"The sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

OSWALD'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

VOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 699	The Religion of the
Tithonus . . . 701	Common Man . . . 707
The Poetry of Oscar	The Platinudinarian . . . 708
Wilde . . . 702	Shorter Reviews . . . 709
Tennyson, Poe and	Morar Bheanaichte . . . 710
Shaw . . . 703	Meetings of Societies . . . 711
The Star Comes of Age . . . 704	Correspondence . . . 712
The Way of the World . . . 706	Books Received . . . 715
Cyprus . . . 707

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

WE were glad to read in the Evening Standard of Tuesday last some very proper observations on the earthquake at Messina. Says our contemporary: "Was it also merely a coincidence that the earthquake followed three days after a blasphemous parody printed in a Radical paper of that city, inviting Heaven to send an earthquake:

"Tu che sai che non sei ignoto,
Manda a tutti un tenemoto?

The drunken attack made on a procession of the Bambino may be passed over in contempt, but a vile parody with such an ending scattered throughout the city without restraint comes under a different category." We do not quite follow the Evening Standard in the distinction it draws between the act of vile sacrilege it mentions and the writing of the blasphemous parody, one seems to us as horrible as the other; but we are glad to notice that a workaday evening paper is not above confessing to a belief in the possibility of the supernatural even in this enlightened generation of "intellectuals" and "stalwarts."

In reply to our query in last week's ACADEMY: "Where is the word in the English language that ends with gd?" we have received the following from Professor Skeat:—

Scarce—because the sound is scarce; and verbs in g are scarce.

But "dog'd" occurs in Shakespeare twice.

"We shal be dog'd with company."—Midsummer Night's Dream, i., 2, 106.

"Are dog'd with two strange followers."—Troilus, i., 3, 365.

And twice we have "dogg'd."

"I have dogg'd him."—Twelfth Night, iii., 2, 81.

"Will be dogg'd with curses."—Coriolanus, v., 3, 144.

I think the apostrophe is not really required.

W. W. SKEAT.

We do not think that any impartial judge will be disposed to think that Professor Skeat had made out anything approaching a case. In none of the instances he has produced is there a word ending in gd. G'd is not the same as gd; the apostrophe is put in on purpose to show that the e is omitted, and this fact, so far from bolstering up Professor Skeat's plea for "simplified spelling," goes to show that the juxtaposition of the letters "g" and "d" at the end of a word was as unnatural and repugnant to English spelling in the time of Shakespeare as it is now. Professor Skeat remarks that he thinks "the apostrophe is not really required," which is simply begging the question. Meanwhile, we have heard the children crying, Oh, my brothers, and we are seriously thinking, as far as our own family is concerned, of allowing the suffering little ones to spell Professor Skeat's name Skeet in future. We trust the Professor will approve.

We are glad to see that our contemporary Vanity Fair is shedding, or, at any rate, toning down some of its more violent Socialistic and Anarchical opinions. On the other hand, it has lately broken out into a perfect torrent of rather dubious poetry. This week the editor prints an effusion by a Mr. Aleister Crowley, entitled "After Judgment," which combines the qualities of blasphemy and silliness in a quite remarkable degree. This is how Mr. Crowley addresses the Deity:—

For this I curse Thee! She was fair
As day and brighter than the moon,
And all the gold sung in her hair,
And all the dawn of May, of June,

Kindled her cheeks; her eyes were blue
As all Thy skies, as all Thy seas.
Her mouth—oh, God! her mouth, that slew
Imagination's ecstasies!

For while I praised the pearl-clear skin,
The bright lithe body's supple growth,
By God! I could not even begin
To say one word about her mouth!

Later on Mr. Crowley lashes himself into the following beautiful exhibition of fine frenzy:—

With corn and wine; Thou hast made Thee man;
Thou hast loved and suffered, died and risen;
But—hath Thy mouth grown white and wan,
Sucked out into that strange sweet prison?

Nay, Thou hast never kissed the mouth
Of Dorothy! as I—as I!
Thou hast never felt its eager growth
Upon my Lesbian ecstasy.

Therefore I curse Thee not, accurst,
Who art in that one flower foregone—
And I, the last, match Thee, the first,
When that red mouth I fasten on.

Farewell! O God, in endless bliss
Crowned, with Thine angels singing by;
I go to hell, with her last kiss
Yet tingling in my memory.

Nay, start not from Thy throne! I go
At Thy black damning to the deep.
Thou canst not follow me! I know
This thing I had, and this I keep.

God! I have loved! I love! I love!
And shall love through Thine ageless hell.
Thou hast the kingdom of the Above,
And I, her memory. Fare Thee well!

* * * * *

To Thine I am—supreme exclaim,
The total of all that may be said!
I answer from the abyss of flame;
Dorothy! and her mouth was red.

It is quite obvious that if one were to allow oneself to take a serious view of this sort of writing, the only thing to do would be to shout for the police, or even to requisition the aid of the Fire Brigade in an attempt to quench the ardours of Mr. Aleister Crowley's "Lesbian ecstasy." It is perhaps fortunate for Mr. Crowley that his frantic yelpings after the tremendous produce, along with disgust, a certain amount of laughter. It is impossible to take seriously a man who can write such unspeakable balderdash. One thing is certain, nobody but a tom-fool poet would write such stuff, and nobody but a tom-fool editor would print it. We venture to think that Mr. Frank Harris has allowed his editorial judgment to be unduly influenced by the knowledge that Mr. Crowley is an admirer of his novel, "The Bomb," a momentous fact which was revealed to the listening earth some weeks ago in an advertisement of that work which appeared in the most prominent part of the body of Mr. Harris's paper. We have noticed that ever since Mr. Crowley expressed his admiration for "The Bomb," he has been allowed to spread himself all over the pages of Vanity Fair, to the obvious detriment of such of the lieges as still continue to read that wonderful journal. This is a pity from Mr. Harris's point of view, as tending to show that the sort of people who admire "The Bomb" are not the kind of persons for whose judgment in literary matters one can entertain respect. "The Bomb," by the way, according to the ever-recurring advertisement which Mr. Harris with characteristic modesty continues week after week to cause to appear among the reading matter right in the middle of his paper, is still in its second edition. We can understand Mr. Harris's pride and joy in the fact, but surely his readers are now sufficiently informed on the point, and might not further announcements be postponed till it has reached a third edition? At present the announcement that, after all the combined roars of approval from Mr. Frank Harris's admirers, "The Bomb" has got no further than the second edition, which it reached at least six weeks ago, cannot be regarded as either exhilarating or important from the point of view of Mr. Harris, whatever effect it may produce on those who do not happen to be enamoured of the great work. Having reached a second edition, j'y suis, je reste, seems to be the motto of "The Bomb." We do not repine; quite the contrary.

The January number of the Quarterly Review contains a very able and well-reasoned article on the subject of Women's Suffrage by Professor Dicey. Here are his conclusions:—

Woman suffrage means adult suffrage; and adult suffrage means the transfer of the right to govern the United Kingdom from some 7,000,000 of men to some 20,000,000 or, it may be, 24,000,000 of men and women, whereof women will be the majority.

That the women to be admitted to the parliamentary franchise will often be excellent persons, highly endowed with the virtues of fortitude, personal unselfishness, and self-sacrifice, we are convinced; but the conviction that English women will exhibit in the highest degree the virtues of women is not the contradiction but the complement of the belief, entertained by nearly every man, that women of pre-eminent goodness are often lacking in the virtues, such as active courage, firmness of judgment, self-control, steadiness of conduct, and above all, a certain sense of justice maintained even in the heat of party conflict, which are often to be found in Englishmen, even of an ordinary type. Whoever asks for the vindication of this belief should study the deeds and the words of the fighting suffragists. He should note at the same time that the female leaders in the battle for women's rights have for the most part never unreservedly condemned the lawless follies and the hysterical insolence of their followers. These leaders have thus condoned courses of action which, if pursued by every body of persons who deemed that they suffered real grievances, would reduce the United Kingdom to an anarchy deeper than that which destroyed Poland.

We hope Mrs. Fawcett, Lady Henry Somerset, and Lady Grove, and other "Constitutional Suffragists," will note. Continuing, Professor Dicey says:—

Of the features which discredit the agitation whose war-cry is "Votes for Women," we have of set purpose said little. The antics of the fighting suffragists hardly deserve serious notice. The misapprehension both of history and of law which suggests the delusion that English women have been robbed of a suffrage which they never possessed, has, we trust, been finally disposed of by the impressive judgment delivered by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords. The silly and mendacious insinuation that over 140 women have been sent to prison only for asking for votes is in itself hardly more deserving of confutation.

We make no apology for quoting at such length, and we only regret that space does not permit us to reproduce more of Professor Dicey's brilliant and remorseless exposure of the logical fallacies and absurdities underlying the idiot cry of "Votes for Women." Our hope is that our extracts will send our readers to the article itself, which occupies nearly thirty pages of the Quarterly Review.

Mr. Massingham has been lecturing on "The Duties of the Press" at Trinity College, Dublin, with Mr. Birrell, if you please, as chairman. For some reason or other the average "great journalist" would appear to know just as little about journalism as the average great bookseller knows about books. A while ago we had Mr. St. Loe Strachey informing us that the hapenny press had always refrained from attempts to corrupt or debase the public mind. We are now assured by Mr. Massingham that the founders of the new hapenny journalism "have formed in the people a desire for romantic colour and movement." Hence, of course, Miss Charlesworth's red cloak and rapid motor flights. Mr. Massingham is further of opinion that a journalist's business "is not to make life moral, but to make it interesting." Hence, of course, the weekly scramble for the Nation. We shall not suggest at this juncture what the particular duties of the Press may be; but it is quite certain that the duty of the journalist is an affair which journalists themselves are a little prone to neglect. The desire to be interesting is, perhaps, just as noble in its way as the desire to be moral. On the other hand, neither of these desires should be allowed, as they are so frequently allowed, to overshadow and even to extirpate the desire to be honest. Of course, we are well aware that in the twentieth century honesty is no virtue, but a sort of old-fashioned vice. Cleverness is a much sounder attribute. But as the universe is founded on the fact that two and two make four the cleverest attempts to turn the four into five are bound to come to grief in the long run.

An American has been expressing his views about England in Scribner's Magazine. We reproduce his impression of the English administration of justice:

You may do as you please unmolested, uncriticised, unreported, unphotographed, unheralded, unnoticed even, as in no other country in the world, but the moment you do what you ought not to please to do, from the policeman to the court, and thence to the jail, is a shorter road here than anywhere else. So much personal liberty is only possible where justice is swift, unprejudiced, impartial, and sure. The lord, the millionaire, the drunkard, and the snatch thief are treated the same—within the same six months a great financial schemer and the son of a great nobleman were ushered behind the bars with almost as little ceremony, and as little delay, as are required for the trial of a wife-beater or a burglar. Personal freedom has this serious responsibility, its misuse is promptly punished, and there is no escape—they even behead a king on occasion.

Apart from beheading kings, which has been rather out of fashion amongst us for some years past, it is gratifying to find that there are points about England which an American might at a pinch bring himself to admire.

The Nation's latest poetry is by Mr. John Galsworthy, who addresses himself to his dog as follows:

My dear, when you leave me
You do not even drop a shoe;
And yet you know a man to be
The sort of dull monstrosity,
Whose spirit cannot follow you
When you're away, with all its heart,
As yours can follow me.

My dear, since we must leave,
One sorry day, I you, you me;
Teach me to grieve as you can grieve;
Then through the ages we'll retrieve
Each others' scent and company,
And longing shall not pull my heart—
As now you pull my sleeve.

Which is more or less edifying as regards outlook and aspiration. On the whole, we think Mr. Galsworthy will be well advised to stick to his tales of wife-beating on the part of persons who do not happen to be male Suffragists.

The January number of the New Quarterly contains a rather slipshod set of verses by Mr. Thomas Hardy. Mr. Hardy calls his "poem" "The House of Hospitalities," and proceeds to rhyme "barrel" with "carol," and "viol" with "dial," and to assure us that:

Now no Christmas brings in neighbours,
And the New Year comes unlit;
Where we sang the mole now labours,
And spiders knit.

We were always under the impression that knitting was an old woman's affair: and if spiders really do knit, we may take it that Adam span while Eve did the delving. But Mr. Hardy is a good deal more of a poet than he appears to be, and we must give him his head. In the same journal we find a little gentle, humorous blank verse by Dr. Verrall, who sets out to prove, after the manner of Aristophanes that Tennyson:

Was uninventive, dull, a mere machine, and that the "beginnings" of his poems are all capable of being tagged with the line:

Had a bad cold and blew his little nose.

For example:

The last tall son of Lot and Bellicent,
And tallest, Gareth, in a showerful spring
Had a bad cold and blew his little nose.

Also:

Leodogran, the King of Cameliard,
Had a bad cold and blew his little nose.

And still worse:

Elaine the fair, Elaine the lovable,
Elaine the lily-maid of Astolat,
High in her chamber up a tower to the east,
Had a bad cold and blew her little nose.

Of course, this is the noblest of wit. The angels will sniff and blow their noses over it. And, what is more, Mr. Verrall should run round to the offices of Punch at once.

TITHONUS

"So, too, did Dawn of the golden throne carry off Tithonus. Now so long as winsome youth was his, in joy did he dwell with the golden-throned Dawn at the world's end, beside the streams of Oceanus. But when hateful old age had utterly overcome him, and he could not move or lift his limbs, to her this seemed the wisest counsel; she laid him in a chamber and shut the shining doors, and his voice flows on endlessly and no strength is his such once there was in his limbs."

At the world's pillared end by Ocean's stream
Is the Dawn's palace-porch, shot with a gleam
Of flashing water, through and through; a wide
And arched palace on the unvesselled tide,
High-built upon a terrace, salt with foam,
Greater than any bastioned mountain-dome.
A double light upon the sea and sand
The broad ooze burns before it to the land,
Yet vapour-turbaned are its galleries,
And wet with the reproof of bathing seas;
Lapt in some dream it seemed, severely grave
And resonant as a world-forgotten cave.

Here lay Tithonus, weak as a spent wave,
White as are breasts of ripple-feathered cloud,
And wrinkled as the glossy sands unploughed,
Whom Dawn, that lady, in her chambers hid,
And fresher than a trickling rainbow slid
Earthward, car-borne; while her white stallion team
Beat into milky light the untravelled stream,
Where their pale breaths were mixed inseparably
Into the wide-spread clamour of the sea.

But a voice flows behind the amber door,
As of a dry husk on the threshing floor
Of earth, or a light-bodied phantom shell
Washed by Time's waters, as they beat and fell
About the sun, and broke in months and days.
'Tis that immortal shadow, that can raise
Such tinkling as the dry cicada beats
From sunburnt thighs, in the meridian heats,
Or as the whimpering dead with voice of reeds.

Waiting not on his youth, no nor the seeds
Planted by that irremeable shore,
But with bent head, as one that stoops for ore,
Seeking the path of ordinance, as is meet,
Beyond the gushing light, for cold thin feet,
Where he might set his burthen to the ground,
And plant it underneath some cairn-heaped mound;
And, pausing, to the humid earth return,
A little light dust in a sealed-up urn.
So in the golden chamber, the voice flows
Unceasing; but the golden doors shut close.

M. JOURDAIN.

THE POETRY OF OSCAR WILDE

THE claims of the late Oscar Wilde to rank with the great English poets are in danger of being overlooked, not because there is any lack of attention bestowed on his works, but because it has become a sort of legend that he was a writer of prose first and a poet only in a secondary sense. There is no doubt that the actual bulk of a poet's work has a great deal to do with the position he takes in the eye of the critical as well as the uncritical. The man who writes very little, and that exquisitely, often has to take a place in the general estimation behind the man who pours out a constant stream of good poetry, the best of which is yet inferior to the best of his rival. On the whole, it is, perhaps, right that this should be so, at any rate, it is natural. The poet's business in life is to write poetry, and if he allows years to go by without breaking his silence in that direction he must not complain if he has to yield place in critical estimation to more assiduous wrestlers with form. On the other hand, it might well be argued that nearly all poets have written too much and destroyed too little. How much of Keats there is (especially in Mr. Buxton Forman's deplorable edition) that we could not only dispense with, but could wish to believe that Keats had never written; how much of Wordsworth, how much of Shelley! A great deal of this superabundance is due, of course, to the scandalous custom which has grown up among biographers and editors of dead men of genius of hunting up every kind of unconsidered trifle which can be brought home to their author and printing it under his name without the smallest regard for what would be his feelings. We can imagine the annoyance, not to say the rage, of Keats if he were to return to this life and pick up the aforesaid Buxton Forman edition. It would probably kill him again. So that between the sin of writing too little and the sin of writing too much it is hard to hold the scales evenly, and we shall not attempt to do it here, at any rate on this occasion. These reflections have been called forth chiefly by the unexpected bulk of the volume of Wilde's collected poetry which we have before us in a beautiful, though pirated, edition, published by Mr. Mosher. We do not, of course, approve of pirated editions, but the collected edition of Wilde's works, published by Messrs. Methuen, is, as we have already had occasion to explain, marred by the non-inclusion of "The Picture of Dorian Gray," and this insolent and idiotic impertinence on the part of a trading establishment to the memory of a great writer, in our opinion warrants any amount of piracy on the part of those who have sufficient respect for that writer's written words to refrain from imprudent attempts at censorship. The fact that the omission to include in their edition that great book, with its august and terrible moral lesson, was due to the interference of Mr. T. H. Warren, President of Magdalen College, Oxford, is no excuse for Messrs. Methuen. It is part of the business of a competent publisher to have, at any rate, some faint inkling of the value of contemporary criticism, and if they did not happen to know that Mr. Warren was very ill-qualified as a literary critic Messrs. Methuen could easily have found it out if they had taken the trouble to enquire from those who were in a position to inform them. That they did not do this, and that, consequently, they failed to include "The Picture of Dorian Gray" in their edition, destroys the value of that edition and produces, moreover, a feeling of resentment against them in all true lovers of letters which can best be expressed by refraining from buying that edition. This is what we have done and what we advise others to do. As far as being victims of pirating goes, we are in the same boat as Messrs. Methuen, for Mr. Mosher has appropriated one of our sonnets published in THE ACADEMY and used it on the first page of the volume without so much as a "by your leave." We forgive him on account of the print, paper, binding, and general "get up" of this beautiful book.

We think that most people will be surprised to find what a lot of poetry Wilde wrote. Although we have been familiar with every line of it for years, we were ourselves astonished to see how large a book it makes, and if there is some of it which we could spare, is not that, as we have already said, the case with every poet? Anyhow, the fact is established that Wilde wrote enough actual stuff in poetry to satisfy the exigencies of those who refuse to grant the high places in poetry to poets whose output is slight. The question arises, Is the quality of the poetry really great? We believe that it is. That is to say, we believe that poets must be judged by their best work, and we believe that the best poetry of Wilde is equal to the best that has been produced. It is not much use arguing about these matters, the best way is to quote. Here are eight stanzas from "The Harlot's House":

Like strange mechanical grotesques,
Making fantastic arabesques,
The shadows raced across the blind.

We watched the ghostly dancers spin
To sound of horn and violin,
Like black elves wheeling in the wind.

Like wire-pulled automatons,
Slim silhouetted skeletons
Went sidling through the slow quadrille.

They took each other by the hand,
And danced a stately saraband;
Their laughter echoed thin and shrill.

* * * * *

Then turning to my love, I said,
"The dead are dancing with the dead,
The dust is whirling with the dust."

But she—she heard the violin,
And left my side and entered in:
Love passed into the house of lust.

Then suddenly the tune went false,
The dancers wearied of the waltz,
The shadows ceased to wheel and whirl.

And down the long and silent street,
The dawn, with silver-sandalled feet,
Crept like a frightened girl.

Who that has any love or feeling for poetry can read these moving and wonderful lines without knowing that they are the highest poetry?

Wilde in his early days came very much under the influence of the work of Rossetti and William Morris, and their influence was not favourable to his genius. Such poems as the "Ballade de Marguerite" and the "Dole of the King's Daughter" in their studied artificiality read almost like parodies, and have no value as serious verse; but whenever he was possessed by real emotion he wrote beautiful poetry. He had a complete mastery of the technique of his art, and in this respect he may be taken by the student as an almost impeccable model. He knew so well how to do the thing that we constantly find him turning out what are merely exercises. A great deal of this work he would probably have destroyed or gladly seen forgotten, but the moment Life touched him he rose to the occasion. His extraordinary "Ballad of Reading Gaol" was beaten out of him by sheer agony of mind, and the extent to which, in that masterpiece, he took the wind out of the sails of the late W. E. Henley can be gauged by the mean and envious ill-nature of Henley's signed review of the poem. It was exactly the kind of thing Henley had been trying all his life to write and had always just failed to bring off. Henley was very nearly a great poet, but between his attempts at emotional realism and great poetry there was always a gulf fixed. Wilde, in the "Ballad of Reading Gaol," swung over the gulf in his stride, so to speak, while Henley, in his "Hospital Lyrics" and elsewhere eternally boggled on the take-off side. Finally, we have "The Sphinx," which is perhaps Wilde's most complete and satisfactory poetical work, for here he was hampered neither by the insincerity which sacrifices everything to style on the one hand, nor, on the other hand, by the crude brutality of real and horrible life breaking like a violent unresolved discord into the harmony of his delicate yet stately music. We quote three superb stanzas:

Wild ass or trotting jackal comes and couches in the mouldering gates.
Wild satyrs call unto their mates across the fallen, fluted drums.

And on the summit of the pile the blue-faced ape of Horus sits
And gibbers while the fig-tree splits the pillars of the peristyle.

The god is scattered here and there: deep-hidden in the windy sand,
I saw his giant granite hand still clenched in impotent despair.

Here, incidentally, one may note the tremendous effect produced by printing as two-lined stanzas what are in effect four-lined stanzas, written in the metre of "In Memoriam." Oscar Wilde was for ever proclaiming that the voice and not the eye was the test of poetry, yet he was not above using this device, and its success is a proof that in a printed poem (pace Professor Skeat) the eye cannot in our day be left out of account.

If Wilde had written only the poems we have named he would have established his claim to rank among the great English poets, and we doubt whether, apart from two or three sonnets, he wrote any others which would strengthen this claim, though he wrote nothing which might seriously invalidate it. Too often he wrote without inspiration and without genuine emotion, but at his worst he was always an accomplished master of his craft, and at his best he was a great poet whose immortality is assured as long as the English language exists.

TENNYSON, POE AND SHAW

MR. GEORGE BERNARD SHAW would appear to be arriving at somewhat hasty conclusions with respect to Mr. George Bernard Shaw. As we pointed out in these columns last week a certain friend and humble admirer of his has taken the trouble to place him upon "a recognised and unassailable critical throne." We have most of us heard of the imaginary lion which runs round the world. Mr. Shaw's recognised and unassailable critical throne is just as illusory, and even a great deal less true to the imagination. But Mr. Shaw is pleased with "recognised" and delighted with "unassailable," and he has lost no time in sitting down upon thin air, as it were. To his hand, of course, "ready, aye, ready," and willing as Barkis, there are journals—the penny Socialist weekly, and the Nation, which is a mere Radical print at sixpence. In the penny Socialist weekly Mr. Shaw has been accustomed to toy tenderly with his aforesaid humble admirer. For his high critical fulminations, however, he prefers the Nation, probably because it is sixpence, and therefore fivepence "heavier," and fivepence more "influential" than its vapid penny contemporary. We do not know, of course, but we wonder if some time last week Mr. Shaw wrote to Mr. Massingham as follows:

My dear Massingham,—As you will gather from the Illustrated London News I now occupy a recognised and unassailable critical throne. Poe is about just now. Might I put the comether over him for you at the usual rates. Of course, Orage will be glad for me to do it; but—well, there you are.

Thine,
G. B. S.

To which Mr. Massingham may conceivably have replied:

Mon cher Confrère.—Certainly. Make it two pages, and be quite sure I have the copy by Wednesday morning without fail, please.

Yours,
W. H. M.

In any case, under the head of "Life and Letters"—which we seem, by the way, to recognise—there duly appeared in the Nation of Saturday an article nobly entitled "Edgar Allan Poe," and modestly signed "G. B. S." We cannot suppose for a moment that when Mr. Massingham commissioned or agreed to accept Mr. Shaw's panegyric, he expected to get his money's worth in the shape of criticism, explication, or appraisal of Edgar Allan Poe's poetry. Nowhere in his three columns and a half does Mr. Shaw say a word as to the only point which should really concern your recognised unassailable critic—namely, Poe's poetry. The reasons for this omission are not far to seek, and we may set them down simply to want of capacity. It is impossible for Mr. Shaw, or any other person of his peculiar temperament, to have any opinion of poetry at all. The sixth sense of the Socialist is not for poetry, but for property. Socialism and poetry, like Socialism and religion, may be counted plain contradictory terms. Of course, the Socialists will deny this, but we know. They possess no poet or critic of poetry at the present moment; they never have possessed a poet or a critic of poetry, and they never will possess a poet or a critic of poetry. And if they cry "Shelley," as they are wont to do when it suits them, we have plenty of good answers for them. Meanwhile we must take the recognised and unassailable criticism of Shaw. This is how Mr. Shaw commences operations on Edgar Allan Poe:

There was a time when America, the Land of the Free, and the birthplace of Washington, seemed a natural fatherland for Edgar Allan Poe. Nowadays the thing has become inconceivable; no young man can read Poe's works without asking incredulously what the devil he is doing in that galley. America has been found out, and Poe has not—that is the situation. But did he live there, this finest of fine artists, this born aristocrat of letters? Alas! he did not live there; he died there, and was duly explained away as a drunkard and a failure, though it remains an open question whether he really drank as much in his whole lifetime as a modern successful American drinks, without comment, in six months.

We are informed, too, that "if the Judgment Day were fixed for the centenary of Poe's birth, there are among the dead only two men born since the Declaration of Independence whose plea for mercy could avert a prompt sentence of damnation on the entire [American] nation; and it is extremely doubtful whether these two could be persuaded to pervert eternal justice by uttering it. The two are, of course, Poe and Whitman." Mr. Shaw's unassailable critical position will be obvious. After his headline "Edgar Allan Poe," he prints a pretty little asterisk, referring the reader to the bottom of the column, where we read "Copyright U.S. America, 1909." Mr. Shaw knows full well what made him write the passages we have quoted. Plainly, his motive cannot have been a literary recreants and shibboleths of renegades." The tremendous strain which the Star would have to suffer when the sophistries of recreants and the shibboleths of renegades were abroad will be obvious. In a sense it is almost too much to require that a newspaper should be loyal to anything or anybody at such times; but the Star has remained loyal. Furthermore, it has not been content with mere, sheer, pig-headed, dog-like loyalty. "For the greater part of our life," it says, "we have been engaged in fierce war against the enemies of the people, sometimes resisting the resurrection of old tyrannies; sometimes the establishment of new abuses. The conflict has raged all along the line of our national and municipal life, and at every point the Star has been in the forefront of the battle against those who have sought to benefit the privileged few at the expense of the many; the rich at the expense of the poor, the strong at the expense of the weak, and the classes at the expense of the masses." Of course, on a man's twenty-first birthday much may be forgiven him, and if he puts on the figure of the braggart it is charitable to remember that he has had wine. So that we shall make large allowances for the Star. At the same time the truth has its uses, and we are not disposed to agree that the Star is half such a wonderful, creditable and high-principled journal as it believes itself to be. Particularly do we doubt whether our contemporary has the smallest right to assert that for the greater part of its life it has been engaged in fierce war "against the enemies of the people." In point of fact, the war in which the Star has really been engaged from the day of its birth to the present happy anniversary, and the war in which it is still engaged and will always be engaged, is the war for the people's hapence. And what is more, while it has ever shouted its profession of tenderness for the people from all available housetops on all conceivable occasions, it may be reckoned one of the most flagrant and implacable enemies that the people ever encountered, and this because it carries on the warfare for hapence in a manner which can only result in the absolute moral and material undoing of the very masses whom it pretends to benefit. We have more than once pointed out in these columns that the Star newspaper, in its earlier editions, at any rate, is a plain, unvarnished betting sheet. The Fourth Edition of Tuesday, for example, contains "To-Day's Finals," with "Selections" for various races at Dunstall. In addition to these selections, which, by the way, are put forward over the name of the redoubtable "Captain Coe," the dear people are offered "A Manchester Double," by a gentleman who calls himself "Starlight," a "Mid-day Final" by another gentleman, who styles himself "Uno," and a list of horses which have the "best chances on form." There is also another list of horses, headed "Naps at a Glance," and a table of "Selections from To-day's Papers"; four to five columns in all. It is on these admirable features that the Star practically depends for its morning sale. And there can be no doubt in the world that the persons who buy it are not in the least concerned with either the sophistries of recreants or the shibboleths of renegades, but simply and solely with possible winners and likely odds. And on Tuesday morning "Captain Coe" would appear to have been in a most excellent vein of prophecy, inasmuch as he succeeded in naming six consecutive losers, and never a single winner. For the first race at Dunstall he "selected" Romany Rye. Quite appropriately, "All Going Out" won. For the second race he gave Sir Henry, and Periwinkle II. won. In the third race his selection was Lady Edwardine, a horse which was not even placed; Glen Mazarin for the fourth race ran second; Curby, which "Captain Coe" starred for what is known in "sporting circles" as "a nap bet," ran fourth in the fifth race, and Lord Schomberg fourth in the sixth race. Then "Starlight," with his marvelous Dunstall Double, advised the people whom the Star so loves to put their money on Wolfkin and Curby; and the people, of course, lost, inasmuch as neither Wolfkin nor Curby won. "Uno's" Mid-day Final likewise came to grief; not a single winner was mentioned in the "Follow Form" list; and not a single winner was mentioned in the "Naps at a Glance" list. We are in no position to gauge the morning circulation of the Star newspaper, but we will suppose that it is a hundred thousand copies, and we will suppose that only half the people who purchased the paper made a bet on the Dunstall racing, and that each of those persons made only a single bet, and risked no more than one shilling in the day. This would mean a clear loss to the working classes of fifty thousand shillings, or two thousand five hundred pounds. And calculating on the same basis, with, say, only three racing days per week in the year, the losses to the public on the advice of the Star newspaper may very well amount to three hundred thousand pounds per annum. The which has been going on for twenty-one years! Twenty-one years of "fierce war against the enemies of the people. . . . in the teeth of reaction, and the face of defeat, and in the dark days when Radicalism seemed to have foundered in the storm, and the people themselves were swept away by this sophistry of recreants and shibboleths of renegades." Indeed, coupling these terrible antagonists with the selections of "Captain Coe," the finals of "Uno," and the doubles of "Starlight," one wonders that there is anything of the people left at all. Of course, the estimate we have made takes no account of possible winnings. But it is such a ridiculously moderate estimate that the winnings do not need to be counted. It seems to us more than probable that the Star is helping the bookmakers to much larger sums of money than those we have named. But even if we cut them down by half, or divide them by four, they are serious sums, and "the sophistry of recreants and the shibboleths of renegades" notwithstanding, we are inclined to the opinion that a newspaper which has part or lot in such a business should be very careful not to boast of its benevolence towards the people. The fact that other papers besides the Star are engaged in the betting business will not excuse our Stonecutter Street philanthropist; especially as the other papers do not swagger about their high principles, and make no profession to be engaged in journalism for any other purpose than money-making. There can be no question in the world that for a journal intimately concerned with betting to asseverate that it has at heart the best interests of the working man and the "family circle" is so much arrant cant. And if you find a paper canting brazenly you should beware of it. We do not in the least imagine that the Star will cease to traffic in selections or tips and doubles, and kindred lures for the poor man of its love; of course, if it did, it would probably cease to exist. But we do hope that before its twenty-second birthday comes round it will have learnt the wisdom of singing small where matters of public morality and public principle are concerned. The fact is that the Star is simply a newspaper, and a newspaper of the inferior tip-giving order, which has really little or nothing to do with journalism in its proper sense. The people engaged in its production or concerned in its profits are, to all intents and purposes, just as dependent on racing for their living and their profits as the next bookmaker; and they are no more entitled to brag about their good works, or their deep feeling for the working people of this country than has the keeper of a betting shop, or the furtive penciller, who is compelled by the law to do his business in dark passages and blind alleys.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR is evidently determined to turn a reasonably honest penny where'er he can. In the current issue of T. P.'s Weekly he treats us to the following profound remarks:

Education is becoming more and more the chief weapon both of individual and national progress and success. And in nearly every home in England to-day there are young minds eager to equip themselves with all that knowledge can supply. Very many of them embark upon the task of self-culture on their own account, without seeking outside assistance, only to find that it is beset with pitfalls. Some of these aspirants, knowing my profound love of education, especially of the young, and learning through this journal to take an intelligent interest in literature, have appealed to me to help them in this same work of self-culture.

And, of course, Mr. O'Connor is willing to oblige. In connection with his journal he has consequently arranged "to found and conduct a Correspondence College, the objects of which will be to give the students who join it such instruction, direction and guidance as will open up to them the golden portal of the Temple of Learning in the shortest space of time, with the least difficulty, with the most rapid results"—and no doubt on the lowest terms.

Mr. O'Connor is of opinion that "self-culture unguided or misguided is almost as futile as the absence of the attempt to gain a taste for culture at all." This is a trifle cryptic, but if it means anything it serves to indicate Mr. O'Connor's wonderful lack of qualification for the duties he would fain take upon himself. Self-culture is a cheap and ugly phrase. The people who use it are not cultivated people, being rather "snobs," whose snobbery runs to a profession of tenderness for letters. However, it seems that Mr. O'Connor's "courses" of self-culture are to include Literary Training, Mental Training, Business Training, and French. Mr. O'Connor may be an expert in mental training, an acute man of business and an accomplished French scholar. Whether he is qualified to instruct "students" in the slightly more important department of literature is open to question; and, indeed, if we are to judge from his already existing "Literary Help Column" he is one of the last men in the world who should engage in the task. We believe that, so far as literary and mental training are concerned, any person who happens to have an inclination in these directions may easily accomplish for himself as much as Mr. T. P. O'Connor is likely to do for him, and probably a great deal more, without the outlay of a single shilling in the way of advice. "The golden portal of the Temple of Learning" is absolutely and yawningly wide open for everybody who possesses so much as a hornbook. If you wish to go through that desirable gate you will really go through it alone and unattended and you may take it from us that the hiring of an Irish journalist to put his shoulder to your back is not in the least likely to hasten your passage. We will go more deeply into this matter next week.

Mr. Bottomley has taken our advice. After a display of coyness which is probably without parallel in the history of misfortune, he paid his fine of three hundred pounds, and thus prevented himself from going to prison. We are of opinion that in this particular he acted most sensibly. But before paying, Mr. Bottomley talked somewhat. Mr. Justice Bigham had not been explicit, it seems, and Mr. Bottomley failed to comprehend the exact intention of his Lordship's order with regard to the fine and writ of attachment. Of course, Mr. Bottomley is nothing if not explicit, and he possesses an intellect so massive that one is disposed to tremble at the bare thought of it. The King's judges, however, have not yet learnt to tremble, even in the presence of Mr. Bottomley. Then it seems that in the matter of this Contempt, Mr. Bottomley has friends whose sympathy for people who slander the King's justice is so keen that they offered to pay three hundred pounds by way of expressing their feelings. Mr. Bottomley and his secretary very properly refrained from giving us the names of these gentry, though two of them are stated to be Members of Parliament. Until we have their names we shall indulge our own opinion as to their wisdom, let alone their ability to pay. Meanwhile, Mr. Bottomley is well out of a difficult situation, and by this time he will no doubt have learnt the salutary lesson that there are powers in England which are not to be defied even by Mr. Bottomley with John Bull at his back. The affair generally will doubtless be of great help to Mr. Vivian's promised "character sketch" of Horatio.

It seems that Mr. H. W. Lucy, of Punch, did have a reply for Mr. Beaven after all; we print it herewith:

Dear Mr. Beaven,—Had I guessed that behind the signature, "Alfred B. Braun," attached to the letter in the Liverpool Daily Post, lurked my old friend and correspondent, assailing me from Preston—is it 20 years ago?—I, being a busy man, would have taken no notice of the renewed pleasantry.

Being "translated," as Bottom puts it, to Leamington, there is, I find, from the letter to the Standard you kindly enclose, no change in his method or manner. There is the same inclination to attribute base motive, the same turbulence of expression.

This last leads to lack of lucidity. I assure you it was only on reading your correspondence a second time that I perceived its point. At first I thought, as most casual readers will, that you were concerned to deny that Mr. Gladstone ever told me the story related in Cornhill. On second reading, I find that what all the pother is about is that, inadvertently, I have written "Conservative" where "Liberal" should have been printed. That was due either to a slip of memory or a slip of the pen, made at the time of the original record, and innocently repeated.

I thank you for the correction, which shall be noted when the articles are printed in book form. In return for the service, will you allow me, in sincere friendliness, to call your attention to the constitutional habit, possibly increasing with growing years, of imputing evil motive and indulging in blustering rebuke? These ways ill befit a man of your cloth. They should be wrestled with in prayer.

Yours faithfully,

HENRY W. LUCY.

Whitethorn, Hythe, Kent, Jan. 11.

Really, therefore, Mr. Lucy is one of those silken, sad, uncertain, rustling persons who by inadvertence say "aye" when they mean "no" and "chalk" when they mean "cheese." On a jury, by quite an innocent slip of the tongue, Mr. Lucy might say "guilty" when he meant "not guilty." And if he were going to be married he might say "I won't" when he meant "I will." So much for inadvertence. On the whole, we are inclined to think that Mr. Lucy's memory has probably failed him altogether, and that he really wrote "Conservative" and not "Liberal" at all. The person who made the inadvertence was the printer. The printer printed "Braun" for "Beaven." We have known him print "maggie" for "Maggie" and "shins" for "sins." "Conservative" for "Liberal" would be nothing to him. When Mr. Lucy publishes his "History" in book form we should advise him to sit up all night with the printer. And even then he may not be right.

REVIEWS

CYPRUS

My Experiences of Cyprus. By BASIL STEWART. (Routledge, 6s.)

CYPRUS, even in these days of rapid transit and tourist-explorers, remains fairly difficult of access, and doubtless to its out-of-the-way position and its lack of a frequent steamer service, we owe the fact that in many respects it has not changed much since the time when St. Paul "sailed under Cyprus, because the winds were contrary." Paphos, where Elymas the sorcerer was deprived of his sight, is in ruins, though still inhabited by a dozen or so of families; but the processes of agriculture, the methods (or want of methods) of the people, their general indifference to enterprise, seem rooted in ages past. The character of a race does not alter with a fresh Government, and, considering the terms of the treaty of 1878 between England and Turkey, the way in which those terms have been set aside by the latter, the trying climate, and the primitive means of internal communication, this island jewel in the British Crown shines with a very dubious lustre. Our authority there does not appear to be particularly stringent. At a concert in the town of Limasol our National Anthem was printed at the foot of the programme, but, the Levantine Greek predominating among the audience, the Greek anthem was substituted. This peculiar human blend of Europe and Asia, the Levantine Greek, outnumbers the native population, it seems, and Mr. Stewart gives us some curious glimpses of the customs of town and country:

The Greek portion of the community in the large towns, who consider it the "thing" to copy European dress, generally forsake the picturesque native costume for Whitechapel slops, and their women-folk look perfect frights in awful native versions of Paris fashions of ten or fifteen years ago, though I am glad to say that this craze for aping European customs and manners is at present confined to the larger coast towns, and there only among a certain class, middlemen and shopkeepers, and in the more remote villages in the interior of the island the natives are unspoilt, and hardly changed from their earliest ancestors in their mode of living.

To realise this, one has only to go out into the Messaoria and watch the ploughing. Their ploughs are nothing more than a stick with an iron shoe to it, which doesn't do more than scratch the surface of the soil, and in consequence does not root up the thistles and bulbous weeds which thickly cover the ground, drawn by a couple of oxen, or sometimes a donkey and an ox. They cut the corn with a sickle, thresh it with a board studded with flints underneath, drawn by oxen over the corn, on which sits or stands the driver. . . . The grain and straw is pitched up into the air with wooden shovels, when the wind carries off the straw further than the grain, and so separates them. . . . In fact, I don't suppose Abraham, or even Adam, prepared his daily bread, from sowing the seed to baking, any differently than these Cypriots do at the present day.

The above passages, interesting in themselves, exhibit rather painfully the fact that the author's phrasing and composition leave much to be desired; in parts they are simply wretched. We have no wish to be severe on one who has given us a capital book of travel and dealt very capably with the political and commercial side of an important question, but we are bound to remark that a little more care in the writing would have added greatly to the pleasure of the reader; especially does this refer to the first half of the volume.

The state of affairs which prevents Cyprus from rising to a prosperous and popular country is illustrated in many anecdotes and asides; one example must suffice, bearing on the exportation of salt from Lake Akrotiri:

The salt from a lake of this size was a very valuable asset to the island before we took over the management of affairs from Turkey, and would be so still were it not for that peculiar lack of foresight and acumen which distinguished the Government of Great Britain in concluding the treaty, not only in this clause, but in all of them, by which we promised not to export it in competition with other salt lakes of their own on the mainland. To make assurance doubly sure, the wily Turk immediately clapped on a prohibitive duty on salt imported into the Turkish Empire.

On the subject of the ruins which abound almost everywhere, Mr. Stewart is most interesting; his comments are by no means those of the chance visitor—they betray a considerable amount of painstaking research. He includes an admirably condensed account of the principal churches that still remain, their history and their vicissitudes by earthquake, flood, and pillage, and the book in its revised and enlarged form is a valuable contribution to the scanty literature concerning a corner of our colonies which to the average person is practically unknown. The fifty photographs which intersperse the letterpress are excellent; but that there should be no map is an unfortunate omission which it would be well to remedy in a future edition; even the sketchiest delineation of the island would have been useful for reference. We may conclude, by way of indicating that the author has a turn for the humorous side of things, by quoting a good story which bears on Turkish naval matters:

A former Governor of Beyrout had occasion to be transferred to Tripoli, forty-four miles farther up the Syrian coast. The Sultan, wishing that the Governor should travel in a state worthy of his high position, ordered him to be conveyed in a Turkish man-of-war. The only available ship of the Turkish Navy in Beyrout Harbour at the time was a somewhat antiquated and dilapidated torpedo-boat. The Governor, being wise in his own generation, and doubting its seaworthiness, as it had probably not moved from its moorings for several years, refused to trust his life to such a frail shell, and elected instead to go as a passenger in a steamer of the Princess Line which happened to be sailing for Tripoli. However, to give a certain amount of dignity to the journey of so illustrious a personage, the torpedo-boat was deputed to act as convoy.

The captain of the Prince boat, wishing to do a quick passage, and being also a bit of a humorist, urged his boat at her best speed, about 10½ knots. When they had proceeded a couple of miles or so, the torpedo-boat had already fallen nearly a quarter of a mile astern, and despairing of ever reaching Tripoli even within sight of her charge, ignominiously blew up, killing and drowning all on board. This, of course, led to enquiries from Constantinople, and the only available gunboat in Beyrout was requisitioned to carry despatches reporting the details of the accident to headquarters. This gunboat was an old paddle-steamer which had been laid up in harbour for three years or more. To signalise the departure of a Turkish man-of-war on an errand of such importance, the captain, dressed in his best, and marching up and down the bridge with his drawn sword over his shoulder, ordered the only gun to be fired. The gun, however, refused to be fired, even when red-hot cinders had been rammed down it. So the captain, finding this part of the entertainment did not come up to his expectations, rang up the engine-room to full speed ahead. Yet again was there disappointment; the engines gave a feeble half-turn and then stuck. It was three months before that gunboat left Beyrout, but whether she ever reached Constantinople or not history does not relate.

Young Turkey, of course, will improve on all this.

THE RELIGION OF THE COMMON MAN.

The Religion of the Common Man. By SIR HENRY WRIXON, K.C. (Macmillan and Co., 3s. net.)

THERE are some good books which need recommendation. This is one, otherwise it would miss the effect which it deserves. It has more merit than attraction, and its title does not give a very true idea of its aim. It suggests that Sir Henry Wrixon is offering a religion suitable for the ordinary individual; he really does nothing so useless. In the first place, by "the Common Man" he means thoughtful and intelligent persons, without time or perhaps inclination to make a special study of religions; and in the second, he writes of no specific form of religious belief, but of Religion in contradistinction to Materialism. His book might rather be described as a short review of the reasons for believing in a personal God, which appeal to persons who have not made a special study of the subject. He also writes with much more than his "Common Man's" knowledge of how the subject has been treated before, while he expresses that person's range of view ably and accurately. The book may be read in an hour, and is written in simple language without the use of theological, philosophical and metaphysical terms. It is particularly adapted for public libraries, or libraries of religious institutions of all varieties, for it could not offend those who already believe in God more definitely than Sir Henry pretends to treat of Him, and is likely to suggest grounds for belief where none yet exists, or where it has been lost.

The best chapters are those in which it is argued that Religion, far from dying out, is as great a force in the world as it ever was; those which review its force in the past; and especially the chapters devoted to the craving for Deity within the human breast, and to the evidence to be found for it in an impulse within us, whether that be called "the voice of God the Holy Spirit," "Conscience," or "the Categorical Imperative." Sir Henry says little that is new, but novelty is not his object, he sets forth clearly the old grounds of belief. His quotations are of themselves valuable in a small book, they are well chosen, often of great beauty, are derived from authors unexpected by "the Common Man." "The heart is the home of God" is a phrase from a Japanese writer worth remembering. The daily prayer of a Wat Ja negress will find popular appreciation beyond that of "the Common Man" only: "O God, I know Thee not, but Thou knowest me—I need Thy help."

The objective evidence of the being of God—the signs of design in the material universe—is very adequately treated, but the evidence in itself is never so convincing as the subjective evidence. Sir Henry is less successful in establishing the beneficence of the designer, weakest when he deals with the thorniest section of his subject, "Whence the evil?" His arguments never claim to be conclusive, but here they are not always logical. Nevertheless, they are offered with such complete sincerity that their inefficacy does not weaken his main thesis, and they provide incidentally contributory detail.

Again, in a very good chapter on "Belief" Sir Henry points out well that the belief in a personal God, founded on reason, is as well founded as the belief of science in the "ultimate secrets of nature"; secrets, as Hume says, surrounded with "that obscurity in which they ever did, and ever will, remain"; "facts which," as Sir Henry says, "are incomprehensible to us, but which, nevertheless, we believe to exist." In the instances of the distance of the fixed stars, of the rotation of electrons, and of electric oscillations, he gives excellent examples of "the fundamental postulates of every science," which are "incomprehensible and appalling to us." Similarly, the experience of those high saints who have drawn nearest to the divine Mind are no more incomprehensible and appalling to the students of natural science.

Exception may be taken to occasional references in the course of the book, but they do not effect the course of the argument, and need not be specified in a generally sympathetic notice. Of the more definite forms of Sir Henry's personal belief there is no trace, unless they be indicated by a tendency to exaggerate the importance of Judaism in Christianity; this is a habit now common among professors of its less dogmatic forms. The fact that Sir Henry does not define religion further for once serves to widen the appeal of the book and increases its usefulness.

THE PLATITUDINARIAN

Every Man a King. By ORISON SWETT MARDEN.
(Rider and Son, Ltd., 3s. 6d.).

This is one of a peculiar type of semi-religious, sententious treatise which has sprung up of recent years under the ægis of the "New Thought" movement in America; and, as do all his colleagues, the author suffers with a superb sense of his message to mankind that renders him portentous and exasperating, in spite of his benevolent desires on our behalf. He would have every man an optimist—a perfectly legitimate and laudable notion; but we find it rather difficult to take life cheerfully after reading the exposition of his method. In fact, we incline to the opinion that the average unregenerated man had better pick up a frankly funny book after his day's labour is over, and steal a march upon dull care in that way, than endeavour to follow out the ethical labyrinths so laboriously constructed by Mr. O. S. Marden. Some of the chapter-headings project a chilly shudder to begin with: "Steering Thought Prevents Life Wrecks"; "Our Worst Enemy is Fear"; "Killing Emotions"; "Mastering our Moods"; "Negative Creeds Paralyse"; "Affirmation Creates Power"; "Don't Let the Years Count"; and so on. There are twenty-one of them, a doughty company, and we were heartily pleased when we waded safely to shore through the pellucid platitudes of the last. For the author is as adept at platitude as Tupper. Let us listen to the ripples for a moment:

No one ever looked for trouble yet without finding plenty of it. This is because one can make trouble of anything if the mind is set that way.

We all like sunshiny, bright, cheerful, hopeful people; nobody likes the grumbler, the fault-finder, the back-biter, the slanderer. . . . It is just as easy to go through life looking for the good and beautiful, instead of the ugly; for the noble instead of the ignoble; for the bright and cheerful instead of the dark and gloomy; the hopeful instead of the despairing; to see the bright side instead of the dark side. To set your face always toward the sunlight is just as easy as to see always the shadows, etc.

The world is too full of sadness and sorrow, misery and sickness; it needs more sunshine; it needs cheerful lives which radiate gladness; it needs encouragers who shall lift and not bear down; who shall encourage, not discourage. . . . Oh, what riches live in a sunny soul! What a blessed heritage is a sunny nature, able to fling out sunshine wherever it goes, able to scatter the shadows and to lighten sorrow-laden hearts, etc.

Whatever the world needs, it doesn't need this sort of twaddle, and it is rather hopeless to find that such an invertebrate repetition of what everybody has heard a thousand times can pass into print in the form of a reputable book. Where does the "New Thought" come in? There are other sentences, however, the perusal of which suggests in blank astonishment the question as to whether or not they could have been penned seriously. For example:

You must feel that proper control of your own thoughts will cause all good things to come naturally to you, just as all bad things will be your portion if you misuse your God-given powers.

In setting about the overcoming of fear, we must first understand what it is we fear. It is always something that has not yet happened—that is, it is non-existent. Trouble is an imaginary something that we think of, and which frightens us with its possibility.

Under no circumstances can the worrying be justified by the situation at any particular time. Its object is always an imaginary situation of the future. . . . All fear resolves itself into fear of death.

The least experienced student of life could flatly deny these didactic statements, we fancy; but it would hardly be worth the trouble.

Pretty little stories, in illustration of the author's

"points," deck this desert like waterless oases, and one poem which is inserted to decorate the indubitably new thought that we may all remain young until the curtain falls is such a gem that we feel compelled to pass it on to our readers:

Never grow old. Time's furrowed lines
Of pain, of sorrow, and of tears
Must leave their impress, wide and deep,
On the face of declining years.

But the gentle spirit, fraught with love—
Bright deeds of happiness unfold;
Grows brighter, lovelier with age—
More winsome still—grows never old.

The poet's name we forbear to give; but we could wish to see what he would make of a sonnet.

Taken as a whole, the book is a warning against the danger of indiscriminate generalisation. A little study of the science of logic might have saved the author many a trip; but to generalise is so easy and so specious; it looks so incontrovertible to the uninitiated, and conveys such an impression of rectitude, that the writer with views to enforce frequently falls a victim to its allurements. For the last time, we will illustrate from the text before us:

Go into almost any gathering, no matter how happy and gay the crowds seem to be, you will find, if you question one of even the gayest, that the canker-worm of fear gnaws at the heart in some form.

The things which turn hair grey and plough fair faces with cruel furrows, which rob the step of elasticity, and take the buoyancy from life are bridges that never were crossed, misfortunes that never came.

Some people spend most of their time in hunting themselves over for some new ailment, and when they have found it they are the most happy that they ever are (sic).

Harmony, health, beauty, success—these are the realities; their opposites are only the absence of the real.

This last is a delightfully easy argument to refute, since to reverse its terms is to demonstrate precisely the antagonistic condition.

We suppose there are dear people who read this sort of immature philosophy, imagine it "deep," and think with a glow of satisfaction of their intellectual temerity in tackling an author so poignant and original; who will take his reiterated advice, "Affirm that you are one of the most fortunate beings," and watch for the sequent good fortune. No amount of affirmation will convince us how fortunate we are after reading this book. Shorn of its tinsel and padding, it resolves itself mainly into an announcement of axiomatic truths which most sane persons hold from childhood: that a cheerful man gets on better than a morose one; that worry is unhealthy; that by indulging morbid fancies as to disease one becomes predisposed to "catch" any illness that happens to be about; that energy accomplishes more than lassitude; and so on. Go to, Mr. Marden, go to, and if you must write, give us something less flabby. Turn we to a page of "Elia" for reparation and comfort. . . . Is it chance, that we open on "The Sanity of True Genius"?

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Sunburnt South. By FRANCIS CAREY SLATER. (Digby, Long and Co., 3s. 6d.)

THIS little collection of South African stories does not call for any lengthy criticism. It has no particularly strong interest, but the narratives ring true, and are carefully written. We gather that this is the author's first venture in prose, and we would warn him, firstly, against a tendency to moralise and get off the track; his central ideas (they are hardly sufficiently elaborate to be termed plots) are slight, and any digressions in the way of didacticism can but weaken that which is already none too strong. Secondly, the use of the hackneyed phrase is a pitfall he should avoid. A sentence such as the following: "After meditating upon the tranquil beauty of this scene, and envying those whose lines had fallen in such pleasant places, I coaxed my jaded steed into motion and made for the farmstead," is a fault; there are plenty of synonyms in the English language by which "tranquil beauty" and "jaded steeds" can be furnished up into something less painfully familiar. The longest story in the book, "Magic Casements," at its latter part comes perilously near the pretty-pretty, homely-pathetic style dear to readers of penny novelettes; the kind of thing which is sometimes expressively called "soft." The first one, on the other hand, "Lena of Lion Kloof," is a clever and powerful little study. For the rest, they will give many readers, we doubt not, a gentle, unruffled hour of pleasant, arm-chair exploration in the land of Boers and Kaffirs.

The Isle of Lies. By M. P. SHIEL. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

BEWILDERMENT, not unmixed with resentment, is an unequivocal description of our feelings upon turning the last page of this extraordinary book, for a more incoherent, improbable, fantastic story it would be difficult to conceive. It opens well; the adventures of Dr. Lepsius at the Abyssinian monastery are capitally related, and his escape with the mysterious trinket leads us to infer that we are on the edge of something exceptionally fine in the way of romance. But the good time never comes. The deciphering of the inscription on this stolen trinket, which we were induced to believe was to form the central idea of the book, seems to be completely lost sight of; the old Doctor, who marries, retires to a lonely island of the Outer Hebrides, and trains his son with the sole purpose of reading it, is relegated to a trivial position in the plot; and the remainder of the narrative deals with the affairs of this amazing son of his, Hannibal Lepsius. It trails off, in fact, to a very dreary account of third-rate intrigue and conjuring tricks on the part of Hannibal, and not a single character is seemly or life-like. We will quote a specimen of the appalling nonsense that the hero talks, and have done:

"Love is apparently an instinct of fate," Lepsius replied; "the lover prophesies in a kind of trance of triumphs to come. . . . The line of your profile has a hint of hollowness to the eye, owing only to a most slight jutting of your chin's point, a nothing which has overjoyed me with emotions the most poignant, with a sense of brotherhood for you, with a sense of the earth from her furnace-birth to her furthest sunsets, when the sun shall shine much nigher her, and the moon loom hugely; and I have compared you with ages, and with the Lady in the Chair of Cassiopeia. Or, looking sideways at you with your legs crossed, I have been struck by the great prolongation of your thigh-bones—so great that you could hardly run on your toes and palms, as I and apes may, since your knee-caps would doubtless graze the ground—so evolved, patrician; and I have cried extravagantly that, at their greatest stretch, the very galaxy would find space and to spare 'twixt their gaping gateway—an extravagance merely in appearance, since it is in a trance-dream of graces great even to infinity in types fated to grow from you that I thus exclaim; it is my subconsciousness, nay, my consciousness somewhat, all bewildered with a blaze of the world-wonder, and how, darling, but in boundless words may the mortal heart blurt out a little that burden of the Eternal? . . ."

There are several pages of this, and it is the sort of stuff he can turn on, at any moment, by way of making love. Admittedly, he is a crank, and his up-bringing has been peculiar, but he does not strike us as the kind of eccentric who makes for amusing reading. The whole story, after the first chapter, is chaotic and improbable to the last degree, unredeemed by any cleverness of plot or dialogue, and we cannot advise our readers to risk their time in its perusal.

Fatality. By G. G. CHATTERTON. (John Long, 6s.)

As may be inferred from the title, this is rather a sombre story, but the author has treated his subject with a sense of proportion that restrains him from unduly emphasising the darker tones, and, although the ending is sad, it is by no means hopeless. Some pleasing touches of humour, too, relieve the tension frequently; indeed, there is no heavy-handedness throughout the book. The principal situation is that of a woman, Lady Delacour, under suspicion of having poisoned her husband, who fears to marry her former lover lest the cloud overshadow the children yet unborn. She is wholly innocent, and at the trial there was not sufficient evidence to convict her or the nurse, who, with the dead man himself, formed the possible alternative; but the mystery remaining unsolved, she suffered the temporary ostracism of an unkindly world, and, naturally, the tortures of a sensitive mind. The events which follow her retirement to Cornwall are exceedingly well related, and the smug, self-satisfied vicar, who visits his brilliant new parishioner with a view to admonishment and gets severely admonished himself, is a character well and forcibly drawn:

Going his way, as he rounded a curve of the lane, he came face to face with Lady Delacour, halted, and introduced himself. So, Esterelle invited him to retrace his steps and come back to tea with her.

"It would be too bad that you should go away a second time without coming in," she said pleasantly. "We have been watching the tide rush in—we, meaning my dog and myself. Such waves every now and then! The foam splashed right over us!"

Mr. Kingdon gazed at her in astonishment. This was the woman whom he had noticed, shrouded in her long crane veil, glide quietly into church, as quietly glide out of it, and flit solitarily away when service was concluded. And now, as he came round the curve, she had been running—yes, running; encouraging the dog to jump at her by flapping his nose with her glove, and her bare hand sparkled with many rings. . . . Had she instead been taken unawares promenading staidly, wearing her widow's veil and bonnet, with ungloved hand, were that necessary, showing only a wedding-ring, she would have drawn nearer to his charity. . . . The room into which Esterelle lightly ushered him helped him in his sensations. . . . The pretty knick-knacks, the costly bibelots and pictures that Esterelle had transplanted from her boudoir in Grosvenor Square, had here an effect, unnoticed by her, that impressed the vicar as exotic; and again the vague uneasiness assailed him. He felt almost as if unawares he had stumbled on an ante-chamber of the Scarlet Woman herself.

The scene is much too lengthy to quote in full, but it is one of the best in the book. We think that the author would do well in future to avoid the use of so many "sentences," if such they may be termed, which lack a main verb, as, for example: "Unveiled, with wind-blown hair curling about her face, and speaking in the ringing tones of youth." This sort of writing should be very sparingly employed; it is meretricious, a trick much in favour with certain sensational scribblers, by which not many readers whose opinion is worth having are beguiled. Apart from this, the prose is good, the interest is strongly held, and, we are glad to be able to say, the book is marked by a restraint and delicacy which form no small portion of its attraction.

High Life in the Far East. By JAMES DALZIEL. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

A good novel, like fair play, is a jewel, and the short story, being and professing to be but a single facet of the precious stone, should be brilliant enough to justify its existence. To our regret we know that not a few collections of short stories can hardly boast a respectably bright flash amongst them; it is therefore a pleasure to be able to praise Mr. James Dalziel's latest book. None of the fifteen clever little sketches could be omitted to advantage, and they all balance excellently in that each deals with some aspect of that mysterious, bewitching, many-coloured fantasy of Eastern waters, which is the very antithesis of our calm, grey, Northern sea-life. They are artistic, but not too obviously so; the great temptation of the average writer essaying this form of his art which seems so easy is to tell too much; these are free from that fault; suggestive, yet carried through with a regard for suitable picturesqueness of language and vividness of description that harmonises exactly with the mise-en-scène.

It is a vexatious and ungrateful thing to quote from a short story, as a rule, but we will allow ourselves to take a paragraph or two from the career of "Bos'n," the black retriever, for our readers' enjoyment; in doing so we neither reveal the principal heroic incident in which he was concerned nor spoil the story. Bos'n was well known all up and down the coast on the boats of a certain Company:

Only once was he known to board a craft other than those belonging to the Celestial Coasting Company, and on that occasion but little option was left him. His ship was timed to sail at daylight, and he arrived at the wharf at 6 a.m., meaning to make a "pier-head jump"—for Bos'n, like other of his shipmates, was not above indulging in a "fly-round" at Shanghai—to find the steamer already some distance from the wharf, and proceeding slowly down the river. . . . But as the channel became clearer, the ship slipped rapidly away from him, and when abreast of the Dock, he saw that the chase was hopeless, and decided to take a rest on a vessel moored conveniently in the fair-way.

So five minutes later Bos'n was standing on the deck of the United States cruiser Monocracy, the centre of an admiring crowd of man-o-war's men, who, with the elastic morality of the sailor, straightway decided to enrol him in the ship's company. . . . The crew clubbed together and had built for him a resplendent silver collar engraved with the ship's name, flanked by a curious fowl that represented the Chinese silver-smith's idea of the Bird of Freedom, and a nondescript female of disreputable appearance that stood for the Goddess of Liberty, with the motto E Pluribus Unam to complete the circle. . . . What was the reason of his dissatisfaction will never be known; but one day when a steamer of the Celestial Company was passing there was a rush and a scuffle and a splash, and Bos'n and the American Eagle and the Goddess of Liberty, and the Many that became One and six yards of brass chain flashed through a gun-port as if they had been shot from a catapult. By and by a sampan came down the river and delivered a ragged brown paper parcel, which on being opened was found to contain the collar and chain, and a chit rather forcibly than elegantly worded enunciating some unkind ideas about dog-stealers in general, and intimating that if they wanted Bos'n they could blanky-blank well come and fetch him. . . .

Of his tragic end the remaining pages tell graphically. Our one complaint must be that too many of Mr. Dalziel's stories, though often treated with considerable humour, are on the sad side; in his next collection perhaps he will give us rather more of the laughter that is not extinguished by tragedy or darkened by broken love-idylls. We feel sure that he could do it, and do it well.

MORAR BHEANAICHTE

Nor far from the beaten track lies an enchanted region, known superficially, if at all, to the ordinary tourist. It is full of old-world lore, of legend and of superstition. Till yesterday the English tongue was hardly spoken within its boundaries. Most wonderful of all, in a country where theological controversy and the strife of sects have raged through long centuries, no breath of discord has crossed its encircling hills and seas. Still, as four centuries ago, the Ancient Faith holds undisputed sway and the Cross upon the mountain guards "Morar Bheanaichte," blessed Morar, where no Protestant ever preached; where the Peace of God abides in minds untroubled by questioning or doubt.

We had wandered for days and nights through "Prince Charlie's Country." We had trodden the Dark Mile; had skirted Loch Arkaig, where the treasure lies buried; had drunk of the Well of the Seven Heads, by the shores of Loch Ness; had heard the deep tones that call to worship from the tower of S. Benedict's Abbey. And, when Compline was over in the dim lit church where cowed monks enter in solemn procession, we came out under the stars, resolved to seek again the regions of the West and find for ourselves if what we had heard were indeed true.

How the road winds it matters not. Every inch of it is haunted by memories of other years. Where in Moidart and Glenfinnan can you wander "for Charlie and his men?" Now a mansion where the kind, the clement, the gallant Prince of the '45 was an honoured guest; there the well by Kinlocheil that bears his name; here the tree in whose hollow trunk he hid while the red-coats searched; there the Tor-a-Phrionna where he disembarked. But at length you reach the spot where the Royal Standard was raised on the green meadow at the head of long Loch Shiel.

Not far off from "the old, ancient house" of Kinloch-Moidart, where the Prince's Avenue can yet be visited, stands the statue of Charlie, still, as Andrew Lang puts it, gazing towards the throne. As you pass in the glory of an autumn morning, ere the sun has dried the dew, soft shadows flit along the hill-sides and the heather burns purple. The air is sweet with the scent of bog-myrtle. Turn for a moment and gaze back upon the great mountain mass of Ben Nevis. There, high on its rocky bosom lies a cross of snow, pointing to the region that never swerved. For it was at Loch Shiel that the tide of the Reformation broke, once for all, in futile foam. Up on the hill stands "the Church with the Open Door." You enter in to rest awhile in the holy calm. The spell falls; you have stepped back through the centuries.

The stalls are void, the doors are wide,
The tapers burning fair.

From the ever-open door, symbolical of so much, you see hill and loch shimmering in the heat. The monument fades into the haze like a dream, and in its place there floats the Standard of the Exiled King, with Tullibardine at its foot; and grouped round it, Clanranald and his men, their tartans waving, their bare blades glittering. The music of the pipes comes through the still air and is answered from the glen. It is Lochiel with his clan, and by his side Jenny Cameron with the White Cockade.

What though not a man of them knows a word of the Prince's speech? Thirteen hundred bonnets fly into the air. The Standard unfurls on the breeze. It is the 19th of August, 1745, and 163 years have slipped away!

But it is a far cry to Morar and the road grows rough and steep and deserted. No conveyance seems to come that way now. Loch Eilt lies in solitude; over Loch Ailort brood the peaks of Froshven and the Stac. Was it in the Wood of the Green Moss, where every boulder and tree trunk is clad in the fairy colour and the evening light throws strange, fantastic shadows, that the heir of Castle Tirrim, hiding from Allan-nan-Corc, encountered, on a day of days, a maiden with eyes mysterious as the twilight and a voice musical as the song of The Nameless Burn? The goats had strayed far among the rocks, where the Atlantic surges break at the edge of the forest. She only saw a goodly youth; he, a maid, fairer than the daughters of men. Not until the priest had given his blessing, did either guess that the son of the Chief of Castle Tirrim had wedded the daughter of that fierce Allan of the Sword who had murdered his father.

On, by the back of Keppoch, till at last, with Rum and Eigg and then Skye, outlined across the blue expanse, the sands of Morar, white as snow-drifts among the heather, tell their tale. Then you come to the translucent waters where, in the gloaming and in the dawn, Morag is seen swimming when a Macdonald or a Gillies is to pass.

"They will be saying strange things about Morag. No, I will not hef seen her myself; but my father did. It was just behind the island with the three peaks she was seen. Yes, indeed!"

And strange things they will tell you, those simple folk, if you can win their confidence, things not to be set down here, lest, hearing of them, they tell no more. Some have seen Morag as a seal-maiden; some, as a strange shapeless beast. It was Morag, too, that the Jacobite Minstrel named "the lad with the bloom of a lass" for whom so many went to their deaths—"Morag, the beautiful maiden with the hair of gold."

The breeze is redolent with the subtle odour of peat from the thatched cottages at the head of the sea-water loch. The Morar river dashes down the gorge. A fisher is casting a fly below the fall. The twilight deepens; but on the mountain outlined against the fading sky stands the Holy Symbol. We have achieved our goal. Compline has been said ere we reach the church on the shores of the fresh-water loch. The night deepens. The late-rising moon is in the sky and a single star shines radiantly beyond the cross upon the hill. Blessed Morar is wrapt in a mantle of repose.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday evening, the 20th instant, at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Westminster, Dr. H. R. Mill, President, in the chair.

Dr. Mill devoted his presidential address to "Some Aims and Efforts of the Society in its Relation to the Public and to Meteorological Science." He pointed out that the Society is composed of Fellows whose interest in meteorology varies widely, and there is moderation in dividing the Fellows into no more than three orders: meteorologists, observers, and interested persons. Meteorologists have either voluntarily devoted much time to the scientific study of atmospheric phenomena or are professionally engaged in meteorological work; observers, while often well versed in meteorology, specialise in collecting data and preparing them for discussion; and persons interested are those—and they form the majority—who have neither the special training of a meteorologist nor the special aptitude or inclination of an observer, but are none the less convinced of the importance of the work which is being done by the other two orders, and willing to support it, eager to become acquainted with the results obtained, able to follow and appreciate and often to criticise very usefully the expositions which meteorologists and observers lay before the meetings. The public contains many interested persons of this class who do not belong to a meteorological society and are the less able, on that account, to understand what is going on in the air above them, but the great multitude of the public, which for convenience may be called the general public, consists of persons who are not interested either actually or potentially in the scientific study of atmospheric phenomena, but require stimulation and education before they can think rationally or speak intelligently about the weather. In dealing with the subject matter of meteorology there are two extreme points of view held among meteorologists, which appeal to two opposite types of mind: these are the simply observational and the purely analytical; and it is one of the great advantages of a scientific society to bring representatives of the two types together and to encourage mutual toleration and understanding. After referring to the activity of the Society in the establishment of well-equipped and carefully-inspected stations, for accurate observations of meteorological phenomena, and to the work carried out by various special committees, the President proceeded to call attention to two lines of usefulness which lay open to the Society at the present time. One is the correction of the impulsive sensationalism and anti-scientific spirit in meteorological matters of a certain section of the Press in this country, which no doubt faithfully reflects the somewhat muddled ideas of the general public; the other is the advance which has been made in meteorological science during the last few years and the new opportunities it brings. He then alluded to the popular errors which are current concerning published weather records, and the effect of these on the Meteorological Departments maintained by many municipalities. There seems to be an opinion that (1) sunshine is good; (2) rain is bad; (3) cold is bad; (4) dryness is good; (5) heat is good; and (6) to be above the local average in the "bad" elements or below it in the "good" is a disgrace never to be acknowledged if it is possible to deny it. So much is this the case that he had heard instances of reports being suppressed in order to obviate misconceptions, and of instruments being moved in order to obtain more agreeable records. He next stated that we now stand at a very important point in the history of meteorology, which bids fair to expand in interest and importance in the twentieth century as chemistry did in the nineteenth, and from the same cause increasing necessity of applying its principles to practical ends. The standpoint of the meteorologist to-day is different from that of ten or even of twenty years ago. Then the only department in which much general interest could be expected was climatology, the study of the average conditions of the atmosphere at different places. Much remains to be done in that department, but the main interest is being diverted from the study of the air four feet above the ground, on the study of which climatology has been based, to the vast expanse of the upper atmosphere miles above the abode of man. He believed that in a few years the "airy navies grappling in the central blue" will demand a far more exact knowledge than is now required of atmospheric circulation and the relation of wind to gradient; or the disturbing influence of insolation on pressure; on the nature and movements of atmospheric eddies and currents; and these things being of practical importance, it will become worth the while of wealthy people to find the means for studying them.

After Dr. Mill had been thanked for his address and for his services during the past year, Mr. H. Mellish was elected President, and Mr. F. Campbell Bayard and Commander F. W. Caborne, C.B., Secretaries for the ensuing year.

CORRESPONDENCE

CHAUCEER AND MODERNITY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Dipping from time to time into Coleridge's "Table-Talk," one is struck not only by its modernity, but also by its incisive common sense. Coleridge's few plain rules for the reading of Chaucer are "not for himself," for he "cannot in the least allow any necessity for Chaucer's poetry being considered obsolete." He goes on to say, "Strike out those words which are now (considered) obsolete, and I will venture to say that I will replace every one of them by words still in use out of Chaucer himself."

Amongst words still in use would be included those expressive dialect words, mostly Saxon, which are identical in meaning, and possibly pronunciation, with Chaucer's use of them five hundred years ago. It is curious to reflect that provincialisms which are uncouth and without meaning beyond a very limited locality were current and even metropolitan English at that time. Of these may be instanced a few, such as the following:—Neshe (Yorkshire), tender, thin-skinned; threpe (Yorkshire), to call, to reiterate an opinion offensively; ligge (Yorkshire), to lie down; lithe (Yorkshire), to soften, to thicken a liquid; hilled (Derbyshire), hidden; wick (Yorkshire), quick, living; nappe (Yorkshire), sleep; urclon, hedgehog; throstle, thrush; heron-sewe, young heron (Yorkshire and Midlands); span-newe, or bran-new, quite new; flitted, removed, shifted. This word, which is used in the present tense in the Prayer Book version of the Psalms, "Thou tellest my flittings," is also in constant provincial use at that period of anxiety to both tenants and landlords, known as quarter-day. The county limitations are not, of course, arbitrary, but merely to indicate the extent of personal knowledge. It would take up too much space to give all these and other provincialisms, with the context, in Chaucer, and a few instances must suffice.

"Mordre is so wlatson (loathsome) and abhominable
That (God) ne wol not suffre it hyllid be."

—The Nonnes Preestes Tale.

"Sol gold is, and Luna silver we threpe."

—The Chanones Yemannes Tale.

"Thilke ground that beareth the wedes wick."

—Troilus and Creside.

"But sir, ye lye, I tell ye plat."

—The Romaunt of the Rose.

This last word, which will be readily identified with its equivalent "flat," is used indifferently either way in heated conversation between rustics in many provincial localities.

There have been many attempts to modernise Chaucer, but none, it seems to me, sufficiently disinterested to present him without mutilation, or some infatuated show of improvement. The moderniser is never content to sink his own personality, and by the time he has done with him, there is precious little left of the beautiful simplicity of the original Chaucer. Dryden is the greatest offender of all. In fact, he is little better than a common thief who passes all his loot of Chaucerian chased gold through the thieves' kitchen and expands it into thinnest leaf gold before putting it on the market. What could exceed the audacious barbarity of his treatment of the "Wife of Bath's Tale"? Its exquisite prelude of twenty-five lines is expanded into fifty, to the utter dispersion of that key-note of Faery which catches the spirit-ear in this strain.

"In olde dayes of the king Artour,
Of which that Bretons spoken gret honour,
All was this lond fulfilled of faerie;
The Elf-queene, with hire joly compaignie,
Danced ful oft in many a grene mede.
This was the old opinion as I rede;
I speke of many hundred yeres ago;
But now no man can see non elves mo."

Expanded and metamorphosed with variations and accretions it becomes Dryden pure and simple.

Pope is less expansive, and has the good taste to acknowledge his indebtedness to Chaucer; but all the same it is the voice of Pope that speaks. I think Wordsworth retains more of the tone and spirit of Chaucer than either and keeps nearer to the original diction, but it is not Chaucer. To give a story in modern language, say, from "The Canterbury Tales," is not reproducing Chaucer any more than "Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare" are Shakespeare.

The little penny prose book, in the series called "Books for the Bairns," containing Tales from Chaucer, has been read probably by thousands of children; but not one in a thousand read the original Chaucer, and, perhaps, not one in tens of thousands read him with the pleasure that induced Coleridge to say, "I take increasing delight in Chaucer." Furthermore, he suggests a method "of restoring so great a poet to his ancient and most deserved popularity" which has the merit of common sense.

"Let a few plain rules be given for sounding the final e of syllables, and for expressing the termination of such words as ocean and nation as dissyllables—or let the syllables to be sounded in such cases be marked by a competent metrist. This simple expedient would, with a very few trifling exceptions where the errors are inveterate, enable any reader to feel the perfect smoothness and harmony of Chaucer's verse." Who could have been more competent than Coleridge himself? But he didn't do it, and he would never have done it. His want of application and his own singing instincts were insuperable hindrances to the carrying out of the inspired dicta of his unpremeditated "Table Talk." The poet of "Christabel" and "Kubla Khan" and the divine fragments which ravish and disappoint the listening ear of time could never have put himself into harness of the "competent metrist" to achieve the task. His version, probably, would have been more poetically wide of the mark than either Dryden or Pope.

The question arises, is it possible to modernise Chaucer so that readers who are not students, and who would be impatient of a glossary, shall take increasing delight in the "morning star of song"? Can the spirit of the fourteenth century, with its pathos and humour, catch the ear and touch the heart of the twentieth century in the original voice which moved to tears and laughter the earlier century?

The Chaucerian authority and eminent philologist, Professor Skeat, has published portions of Chaucer in modernised versions, and even he has substituted his own diction frequently whilst endeavouring to convey the original sense, which seems to contradict Coleridge's assertion that there is no necessity for his poetry being considered obsolete. It is true, however, that those provincial words still in use, and identical with Saxon words used by Chaucer, are obsolete except in very limited localities. Though many, like nesh, nap, lig, wick, flitting, etc., have a wider acceptance, and might still be retained, as the very sound of them is often suggestive of their meaning.

It seems to me it would be possible to give a rendering of Chaucer by this means and by very occasional transposing, without either mutilation or substituting with a supposed improvement of diction, which is almost equivalent to sacrilege. This might involve the occasional halting of a line, and perhaps some loss of rhythm and rhyme. But it would be Chaucer, and not Dryden or Pope or another.

Take the beautiful unfolding of an English spring in the opening lines of the "Prologue," of which you and I feel the freshness and fragrance:—

"Whanne that April with his shoures sote
The droughte of March hath perced to the rote,
And bathed every veine in swiche licour,
Of whiche vertue engendred is the flour;
Whan Zephirus eke with his sote brethe
Enspired hath in every holt and hethe
The tendre croppes, and the yonge sonne
Hath in the Ram his halfe cours yronne,
And smale foulles maken melodie,
That slepen alle night with open eye."

"When as that April with his showers sweet
The drought of March hath pierced to the root,
And bathed every vein in such liquor,
Of which virtue engendred is the flower;
When Zephyrus eke with his sweet breath
Enspired hath in every holt and heath
The tender crops, and the young sun
Hath in the ram his half course run,
And little birds make melody,
That sleep all night with open eye."

This is all very simple, and to the lover of Chaucer such trifling alterations must appear supererogatory, and yet I have discovered that the average reader, who may revere the barbarities of Browning, is bored by the quaint terminations, and puzzled by the primitive Saxon for which he will not trouble to refer to a glossary. Tyrwhitt gives only about fifty "words and phrases not understood," and some of these, I believe, are still in use as provincialisms.

The prejudicial obsolescence of diction is seldom more apparent than in the above opening to the "Prologue," which is less than a thin April mist scarcely veiling a distant coppice at dawn, but which disappears entirely as you approach it. Though occasionally, as aforesaid, destructive of rhyme and very occasionally of rhythm, yet I submit (with deference) that a literal rendering on this method preserves the tone and spirit of Chaucer himself. Compare in this manner the opening to "The Wife of Bath's Tale" with Dryden's version:—

"In olden days of the King Arthur
Of which that Bretons speak great honour
All was this land fulfilled of faerie
The elf-queen with her jolly company
Danced full oft in many a green mead
This was the old opinion as I read
I speak of many hundred years ago."

And now take Dryden's magniloquent expansion of the pure gold of these seven lines beaten out into sixteen:—

"In days of old, when Arthur filled the throne,
Whose acts and fame to foreign lands were blown;
The king of elfs and little fairy queen
Gambol'd on heaths, and danc'd on every green;
And where the jolly troop had led the round,
The grass unbidden rose, and mark'd the ground;
Nor darkling did they glance, the silver light
Of Phœbe serv'd to guide their steps aright,
And, with their tripping pleas'd, prolong the night.
Her beams they follow'd, where at full she play'd,
Nor longer than she shed her horns they stay'd,
From thence with airy flight to foreign lands convey'd,
Above the rest our Britain held their dear,
More solemnly they kept their sabbaths here,
And made more spacious rings and revel'd half the year.
I speak of ancient times."

Of the above passages, the original, with only the spelling modernised, is more modern in tone and conception than its elaborate paraphrase and will still be modern when Dryden is reckoned more obsolete than he is now. Chaucer's modernity is the modernity of all true poetry since the beginning of human history, which is itself inconceivably modern in the order of the universe. The apparent obsolescence is, as we see, superficial. A fairly educated compositor, with a glossary at his elbow, might produce an edition of Chaucer that would be as readable to the lazy average reader as Shakespeare, or Coleridge, or Keats. The poet and scholar are not to be trusted; for neither can resist the temptation to show off at the risk of submerging Chaucer.

A Special Offer to Smokers

OUR JAMAICA CIGARS are equal in aroma and taste to those from Havana, whilst the cost is half that of the latter. A sample box, containing 25 of the following brands of Cigars, will be sent post free to anyone filling in the coupon below and enclosing P.O., cheque or stamps for 10/6 to us:—

Flor ...	80/- per 100	Bouquet Finos ...	35/- per 100
Celestiales ...	65/- per 100	Caribas ...	33/- per 100
Favoritas ...	65/- per 100	Conchas Especiales ...	30/- per 100
Ideales ...	45/- per 100	Exquisitos ...	27/6 per 100
Perfectos ...	45/- per 100	Excelentos ...	27/6 per 100
Governor ...	42/- per 100	J. T. C. ...	25/- per 100
Reina Victoria ...	38/- per 100	Operas ...	22/6 per 100
Londres Imperiales ...	37/6 per 100	Young Ladies ...	20/- per 100

IMPORTED EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES:

The "Seymour" ...	6/6 per 100
Lord Rothschild, Gold Tipped ...	9/6 per 100

TURKISH CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 1 ...	6/6 per 100
-------------------	-------------

VIRGINIA CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 2 ...	5/6 per 100
-------------------	-------------

RUSSIAN, BRAZILIAN, AND LEAF-COVERED CIGARETTES...

... from 8/- per 100

TOBACCO MIXTURE:

Medium... 10/- per lb. Mild ... 12/- per lb.
--

JAMRACH & CO.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS

199 PICCADILLY, LONDON

Suppliers to the Nobility.

Established 1871.

Please forward me, post paid,.....
for which I enclose
Name
ACADEMY. Address

And how completely he was submerged for a period, owing to the rapid efflorescence of the language which he "first with harmony informed," the writers of the seventeenth century attest. His praise was in every mouth; but it was the praise of one dead and buried. Waller, in his poem "Of English Verse," has a stanza which reads like his epitaph:

"Chaucer his verse can only boast,
The glory of his numbers lost!
Years have defaced his matchless strain,
And yet he did not sing in vain."

Dryden, too, sounds the note of praise, and calls him "a perpetual fountain of good sense," whilst he takes care to bury him in a gorgeous mausoleum which is to the honour and glory of the sculptor, and no more like Chaucer than Young's paraphrase of the Book of Job is like that beautiful Eastern epic.

E. K.

SENTIMENTALITY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—There is a tendency nowadays to lengthen words in order to enlarge their denotation. We are not content with speaking of a "temper," but must needs call it "temperament." Even so a visit becomes a "visitation," and the simple monosyllable "man" is hideously transformed into "humanity." But these are sad omens for the future, and unless something be done to curtail this devolution of language, we are like to find ourselves also on the downward path.

A conscious elongation of words is nevertheless infinitely superior to an unconscious extension of their meaning, a process which has taken place with regard to the hybrid word "sentiment." It was never, at its best, a word with a very lofty significance, but when used sparingly it did imply a certain manly and respectful attitude between a person and an idea, or even between two persons. The habitual ending to a French epistle, "Recevez mes meilleurs sentiments," is not without its dignity, and is certainly restrained in its meaning. The gentleman who hung the Lord's Prayer above his bed, and said each night, "Them's my sentiments," employed the word quite legitimately, and doubtless received much edification thereby. But when "sentiment" becomes "sentimentality," we are faced with a very grave problem. Many people employ the word "sentiment" where they should employ "sentimentality," and this abuse is but a sign of the general decadence which is setting in throughout our country. If we recall certain of the outbursts made at the beginning or during the course of the South African War, we can see that this blight of sentimentality was already attacking the people at large, as evidenced by the Press. Over the lists of casualties there was exaggerated weeping and gnashing of teeth, not for the sake of the people who suffered by these losses, but because they served as a stimulus to the lower sentiments of the people at large.

This canker that has attacked our nation has reached its culmination in the timid and futile efforts of members of Parliament and others in authority to deal with the Woman's Suffrage question. Those in authority are absolutely afraid to treat them as they deserve, owing to the political capital that might be made out of it, and the indignation which would be evidenced throughout the baser organs of the Press. This sickly sentimentalism which now reigns pretends to attribute its lack of initiative to a spirit of justice in which both sides of the question must be discussed. Cowardice is called chivalry: blatant rowdiness is treated as a joke, and a horde of unrestrained viragos sweeps triumphantly through the streets of London. Not content with this evidence of moral cowardice, there have actually been some delicately-minded members of the House who have protested against the far too lenient treatment of these female hooligans.

It is not the time to discuss such a paltry question as giving the franchise to women. Woman is woman, and until methods of parthenogenesis obtain, she will remain an inferior creature to man. Women even who pay taxes have, in the majority of cases, inherited their money from male relatives, and should really consider themselves lucky to be allowed the undisturbed possession of it when there are so many men poor and unemployed. Moreover, it can be conclusively proved that in all history the predominance of woman has been concomitant with the dissolution of the State, and those who are wise will read the signs of the times.

Nor can we attribute this sentimentalism to anything else but a lack of education. The old public school system, which helped scholars and produced men, is dying out, to be superseded by a system which causes manliness to abort and fills our newspaper offices with a crew of half-fledged degenerates, who have no power of endurance, and have not suffered enough to make them understand the value of anything. Hence we have a Keir Hardie, whose career through our Empire is curiously punctuated by disturbances. Nothing but an absurd sentimentality would allow such an incompetent to meander through the country when we are on the eve of serious trouble in India, and a probable revolution in Egypt, to say nothing of the complications in the Balkans.

The country is being ruined by sentimentalism and futile advertisement. No sooner does a man die in the street than a swarm of reporters appear like flies or carrion, each eager to get "the story" for their ignoble publications. No sooner is a murderer arrested than columns appear describing his methods of life, "by one who knew him." However much we may desire to regard matters coolly, we cannot fail to recognise the deleterious effects of this unbridled sentimentality. Troubles are, unfortunately, an evil necessity under the existing conditions, but there is no need to magnify them in this loathsome manner.

We want a system that will produce men in the highest sense of the word, men whose sentiments are calm, honest, and restrained. We do not require this medley of hysterical men and women, whose god is advertisement, and whose mind is averse to any form of true patriotism.

We must clear our minds of sentimentality if there is to be any hope for the future. Woman is very well in her proper place—a judicious obscurity mitigated by the capture of a husband. Socialists who have coloured brethren will do well for the Kingdom of Heaven, where no distinction of colour is known, and morbid journalists and newspaper proprietors will find another sphere of usefulness; but in England we require a return to methods of sanity and sentiments worthy of a great nation.

R. L. LESLIE.

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—If Mr. Caleb Porter had shown a little more knowledge and fairness, and less prejudice and animus, his letter might have been convincing. He accuses me of "impertinence" in sending you a réchauffé of a letter of mine in Vanity Fair five years ago; with more truth he might have said it was an abstract of a long letter in the Times and an article in the Artist two years before. The letter was printed in the Victoria Memorial Number of the Times, which had "the largest circulation in the world" that day, and it brought me sympathetic encouragement from strangers in all parts of England, so my views are not so "extraordinary" as Mr. Porter would have your readers believe. As nothing was then done, and it is now proposed to do something to lessen the injustice to Martin, another plea to remove the stigma from ourselves was eminently called for. Nothing disgraces and belittles a nation so much as insensibility to the greatness of its sons; and I do not want it left for the foreigner to "discover" Martin, as the Germans claim to have discovered Shakespeare.

I said that Martin, in aiming at the sublime when his powers were failing, toppled over the perilous line; in one picture Mr. Porter makes me say he achieved the "ultra-ridiculous." Milton toppled over the perilous line when he made the angels use artillery in the war in Heaven; but "Paradise Lost" is a magnificent work despite such defects. So Martin's "Last Judgment" is marred by the flowing robes of the angels, which suggest crinolines, and by the saved rising through the trees, suggesting that they are roosting on the cedars. As I said in the Artist: "Despite these defects, it is a wonderful composition. Compare it with the utter chaos of Tintoretto's 'Paradise,' then say who but Martin could have ordered such a triune world into unity? The domes of the Celestial City soar like evening cumuli above the Great White Throne flanked by the four-and-twenty-Elders. Through the stratus dividing the upper and lower worlds, the Avenging Angel, thunder-clad, is descending upon the panic-stricken multitudes of evil-doers. The scarlet ladies, the grasping misers clutching their useless gold, and the faithless stewards of Church and State stand out from the warring myriads of maddened sinners, who extend in serried masses back into the immensity of night. On the other hand, we have a galaxy of the blest, a countless multitude extending in orderly array to the distant city, which is a dream of loveliness, a pearl city faintly incarnadined by the blood-red sun as it sinks into the abyss. The art that could marshal such amazing masses of material is of a higher order than any we have experience of to-day."

That Martin should have been able to put such subjects with equal ease on a huge canvas or a tiny wood-block shows a range of power that artists will appreciate, although Mr. Porter boggles at it. Indeed, it is to artists I appeal to confirm my statements; and I challenge their judgment, as they can only make the reservations I have made, and say they do not like such art. But I simply hate Dante's "Inferno." At the same time I recognise the greatness of the work. As for Bulwer Lytton, I quoted him because he described Martin's works more eloquently than any other writer, and because I heartily endorse his statements; and with both pen and brush I have proved my right to speak.

As for my "misdirected energy," which Mr. Porter is so anxious that some "better voice" should protest against, that energy has been used to expose shams, insincerity, humbug, pretentious incompetence, and conscienceless criticism, and the amazing blindness that has mistaken decadence for progress. I have raised a vigorous protest against the mistaken and unpatriotic action of the Press in allowing a steady defamation of all that is best in our national art, in the interests of small decadent cliques and of dealers in Old Masters. This misdirected energy of the Press has depreciated modern art by millions of pounds in value, besides paralysing upward effort. But I not only exposed abuses; I traced them to their root-causes, showed the true inwardness of an unprecedented situation, and the way out. I showed the higher purpose of Art, which had been so strangely overlooked, and the need of a Higher Criticism, that should understand itself and Art, and the delicate and weariable nature of the faculties the critic works with, and to which Art is addressed. But I was only expressing the best thought of the time, others lacking the courage to run counter to the foolish fads and fashions of the day. What I said, and others thought, yesterday, people are beginning to say to-day, and everybody will be saying to-morrow. So Mr. Porter will look in vain for that "better voice" to stay my plea for justice.

E. WAKE COOK.

20, Fairlawn Park, Chiswick, W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

Aeneas Silvius (Enea Silvia de'Piccolomini), Orator, Man of Letters, Statesman, and Pope. William Beulding. Constable, 12s. 6d. net.

FICTION

Merely Man. Gertrude Warden. White, 6s.
Did She Do Right? A. J. Macdonnell. Paul, 6s.
The Two Goodwins. R. Murray Gilchrist. Milne, 6s.
A Question of Means. Margaret Cross. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
The Faith of his Fathers. A. E. Jacomb. Melrose, 6s.
The Stormy Petrel. L. T. Meade. Hurst & Blackett.
Nights with the Gods. Emil Reich. Laurie, 6s.
Moonfleet. J. Meade Falkner. Nelson, 7d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Compleat Benedict, or Marriage in Brinland. Law-Lacy. Stock, 2s. 6d. net.
Catalogue of Pottery and Porcelain, which will be sold by auction by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson.
Eton, from a Backwater. H. E. Luxmoore. Sold for the benefit of the Eton Memorial Building Fund. A. & C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.
Tragedies of the Medici. Edgumbe Staley. Laurie, 12s. 6d.
An Historical Introduction to the Marprelate Tracts. William Pierce. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.

POETRY

The Waters of Argyra, the Vision of Belshazzar, and Other Verse. B. Burford Rawlings. Stock, 3s. 6d. net.
Songs and Poems, Old and New. William Sharp. Stock.

THEOLOGY

The Psalms at Work. Charles L. Marson. Stock, 6s. net.
Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology. S. Schechter. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's New Books

The Ancient Greek Historians

(Harvard Lectures). By J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

EVERSLEY SERIES.—New Vol.

Shakespeare.

By Professor WALTER RALEIGH. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

William Morris.

By ALFRED NOYES. [English Men of Letters.] Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

Notes of a Botanist on the Amazon and Andes.

Being Records of Travel during the Years 1849-1864. By RICHARD SPRUCE, Ph.D. Edited and Condensed by ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M., F.R.S. With Illustrations and Maps. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

Earthwork of England.

Prehistoric, Roman, Saxon, Danish, Norman, and Mediæval. By A. HADRIAN ALLCROFT, M.A. Illustrated with Plans, Sections, &c. 8vo, 18s. net.

The Religion of the Common Man

By Sir HENRY WRIXON, K.C. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

One Immortality.

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Inward Light," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"There are three loves that make and keep the world—the love that binds man and woman into one flesh and soul, the love that draws families into nations, the love that holds the world to God. . . . This book is about the first."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

NOW READY.

THE PRIZE NOVEL OF 1909
250 GUINEAS AWARD.

THE FAITH OF HIS FATHERS

By A. E. JACOMB. Price 6s.

Out of 156 MSS. submitted in the great First Novel Competition of last year,

Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. W. L. Courtney, and Mr. Clement K. Shorter

have selected the above as winner of the prize.

EXTRACT FROM FIRST REVIEW THE DAILY CHRONICLE SAYS:

"The knowledge of human nature it displays, the craft of the characterisation, the tragic force increasing as it goes along and culminating in the terrible irony of the last few lines, are exceptional. There is no other word for it. . . . Mr. Jacomb has written a notable book."

ANDREW MELROSE
3 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Books for Sale

AINSWORTH (WILLIAM HARRISON), THE NOVELS OF: 20 vols., fcp. 8vo, cloth, gilt tops. Title design by Brangwyn, and each vol. contains 4 Plates after Cruikshank and other artists. Gibbons, 1901-2. Pub. 50/- net, for 30/-, new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE, Plates, 20 vols., cloth; new; 50s. (cost £7). Another copy in half-morocco, 70s. (cost £10).—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO., BOOKSELLERS, &c.
32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.
NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND WEEKLY PERIODICALS.
AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE DIRECTORIES.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S WINTER EXHIBITION OF PORTRAITS and LANDSCAPES by Early British Masters is NOW OPEN.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address MISS MASSER The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.
LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.
140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).
Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature, or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

THE

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

For further information apply to the Secretary, MR. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

Now Ready, completing the record of the Book Year, the JANUARY BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR.—Small Talk on some Large Literary Matters, with Illustrations to Brighten the Way.

WHAT BOYS READ.—A Talk with the Editor of "The Boys' Own Paper."

"SKIED!"—Conquest of the Air a Literary Necessity.

"PUNCH" POETRY.—And a Quarrel between Tennyson and Lytton.

MISSES WINKWORTH.—And their Gossip about Some Great Victorians.

A LONDON LETTER.—Do "Grown-Ups" read Books Written for Young Folk?

THE GENERAL READER.—Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

LIGHT AND LEADING.—New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.—Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH.—A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS.—Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

LORD ROSEBERY MR. BENJAMIN KIDD AND PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Warders, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

Numerous complaints having reached this Office as to difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY, we publish below a first list of the names and addresses of Newsagents and Booksellers at whose establishments THE ACADEMY is always on sale. Further lists will be published from time to time.

Messrs. Samuels and Taylor, 7 New Broad Street, E.C.	Mr. W. Morflew, 19 Edgware Road, W.	Messrs. F. Calder Turner, 1 Bathurst Street, Hyde Park Gardens, W., Also 8 Craven Road, Paddington, W.
Messrs. Davies and Co., 23 Finch Lane, Cornhill, E.C.	Messrs. Scripp's Library, 13 South Molton Street, W.	Mr. M. E. Wilson, 8 Clarendon Road, Holland Park, W.
Mr. E. Born, 80 Copthall Avenue, E.C.	Mr. H. Offord, 15 Avery Row, Brook Street, W.	Murley Brothers, 112 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Mr. James Barker, 2 Castle Court, Birchin Lane, E.C.	The Manager, Foreign Bookstall, Café Royal, 68 Regent Street, W.	Mrs. E. Jarvis, 186 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Messrs. Leathwait and Simmons, 5 Birchin Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bolton's Library, 81 Knightsbridge, W.	Mr. M. Pittman, 41 Notting Hill Gate, W.
Mr. George Blair, 16 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Mr. E. George, 13 Swallow Street, Regent Street, W.	C. H. Cooke, 11 Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Messrs. Pottle and Sons, 14 and 15 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Messrs. Knowles and Co., Crown Court, Pall Mall, W.	Mr. S. C. Carter, 1 Porchester Gardens, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Mr. T. Jenner, 40A King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.	Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Poniter, 8 Bury Street, St. James Street, W.	Messrs. Stanesby and Co., 179 Sloane Street, Belgravia, S.W.
Messrs. Wm. Dawson and Sons, Ltd., 121 Cannon Street, E.C.	Messrs. May and Williams, 160 Piccadilly, London, W.	Messrs. M. Hildreth and Co., 10 and 12 Fulham Road, S.W.
Messrs. E. T. Bottom and Co., 51A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 97 Queen Street, E.C., and Also at 165A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 32 Chancery Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bingham and Co., 97 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, W.	Mr. Henry Roberts, 2 Lower Grosvenor Place, S.W.
Mr. George Blair, 11 King Street, Cheapside, E.C.	Mr. F. Batson, 82 Grosvenor Street, W.	Messrs. Scottier and Law, Belgrave Mansions, Grosvenor Gardens, S.W.
St. Bride's Publishing Co., 96 Fleet Street, E.C.	The News Stores, (next) Hyde Park Hotel, Albert Gate, W.	Mr. J. Shrubbs, 165 Ebury Street, Pimlico, S.W.
Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Co., 37 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.	Messrs. T. Rastall and Son, 81 Ebury Street, London, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith, Bookshop, Sloane Square, S.W.
Mr. Harrison, Devereux Court, Temple, W.C.	Mr. T. Wyatt, 198 Ebury Street, Pimlico, W.	Messrs. Wright and Son, 43 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.
Messrs. Farnell and Co., 63 Southampton Row, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.	Mr. W. Weaves, 157 Great Portland Street, W.	Messrs. Jesson Bros., 129 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookstall, Hotel Russell, Russell Square, W.C.	Messrs. Toler Bros., Ltd., 10 Coptic Street, Bloomsbury.	Mr. A. F. Vedy, 265 and 420 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. O. G. Norton, 38 Marchmont Street, Russell Square, W.C.	Mr. William Green, 138 Great Portland Street, W.	Mr. George R. Riches, 510 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. R. C. Willis, 1 Green Street, Leicester Square, W.C.	Mr. Noble, 28 Upper Marylebone Street, W.	Mr. R. Snare, 21 Lower Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Mr. J. Brown, 5 New Street, Covent Garden, W.C.	Messrs. Keith, Prowse and Co., Bookstall, Langham Hotel, W.	Messrs. Blake and Co., 62 Putney High Street, S.W.
Mr. H. Hunt, 12 Bury Street, Bloomsbury, W. C.	Mr. I. Carpenter, 17 Lancaster Street, Lancaster Gate, W.	The Idler's Own Newsagency, 169 Upper Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Mr. W. G. Palmer, 5 West Kensington Terrace, W.	Mr. M. A. Ridge, 43 Craven Road, Hyde Park, W.	Mr. R. Andrews, 120 Upper Richmond Road, East Putney, S.W.
Messrs. Yates' Library, 79 Wigmore Street, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookshop, 19 Craven Road, Paddington, W.	Mr. Wm. John Arnold, Approach Book Stores, London Bridge, S.E.
Mr. H. Perkins, 3 Seymour Place, Portman Square, W.	Messrs. Crockett and Co., 22 Leinster Terrace, W.

Persons who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested kindly to communicate with

*The Manager of THE ACADEMY,
63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C.*

NEW AND INTERESTING BOOKS

BY THE
REV. J. STUART HOLDEN

REDEEMING VISION

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.
"Marked by genuine spirituality, clearness of expression, definiteness of personal application, together with not a little apt poetic illustration."—Churchman.

SUPPOSITION AND CERTAINTY

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. net (by post 2s. 3d.). Leather, limp lambskin, g.i.t., 2s. net (by post 3s. 3d.).

BY THE
REV. C. L. MARSON

THE PSALMS AT WORK

Being the English Church Psalter, with notes on the use of the Psalms. Revised and Enlarged Edition. Post 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net. With wide margins for notes.

"How Mr. Marson managed to accumulate such a rich store of illustrations of the use of the Psalter is not explained, but he has succeeded beyond the hope which one author might fairly be expected to excite."—Guardian.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST—Its True Definition

PREFACE BY THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

Contributors: Rev. HUBERT BROOKE, M.A.; Rev. D. M. MCINTYRE; Rev. Preb. WEBB-PEPLOE, M.A.; Rev. W. FULLER GOOCH; Rev. JOHN WILSON; Prof. JAMES ORR, D.D.; Rev. Canon BARNES-LAWRENCE; Rev. DINSDALE T. YOUNG; Rev. HARRINGTON C. LEES, M.A. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

SUGGESTIONS FOR BIBLE STUDY

By Rev. F. R. MONTGOMERY HITCHCOCK. PREFACE BY THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF OSSORY, CHARLES F. D'ARCY, D.D.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. net.

Three New Missionary Books.

A VISIT TO CHINA'S MISSIONS

By Rev. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A.
Fully Illustrated from Photographs specially obtained en route.

Crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 2s. 6d. net.

"In itself the narrative is delightful, and the excellent pictures from Mr. Webster's snapshots invest these bright pages with an added charm."—Record.

COVERLEIGH RECTORY

By MARY D'AGUILAR.

Large cr. 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.
"A delightfully fresh missionary story. . . . The needs of missionaries on the field are vividly portrayed."—Methodist Times.

BROKEN SNARES

By EVELYN S. KARNEY (C.E.Z.M.S.). PREFACE BY THE LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM.

"Good as the style is, the matter is even better, and those who wish to see the work-a-day life of a missionary and to appreciate the difficulties that assail him will find this little volume an eye-opener."—Church Gazette.

Write for our Descriptive Catalogue of New Gift Books and General Literature, sent free by post on application.

LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

WORKS BY THE
REV. CANON WALPOLE

PERSONALITY AND POWER

or, The Secret of Real Influence

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"A thoughtful and beautiful book. . . . These addresses are mature and sympathetic and fitted to be most helpful."—Church Family Newspaper.

VITAL RELIGION

or, The Personal Knowledge of Christ

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"Dr. Walpole has given us a work of real spiritual value, and we heartily commend it to all thoughtful readers."—Guardian.

NEW WORK BY THE VEN. ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE

THE HOPE THAT IS IN ME

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

The Sermons contained in this Volume were directly suggested by questions from those who had a right to ask the Preacher "a reason concerning the hope that is in him."

Uniform with

SERMONS PREACHED IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

SIXTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s

"Thoughtfully and carefully reasoned sermons, deserving of careful study."—Church Family Newspaper.

"They are vigorous, and frequent poetical quotations impart a flavour of literary effort."—Times.

NEW (?) THEOLOGY

Thoughts on the Universality and Continuity of the Doctrine of the Immanence of God

SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"The sermons are able and interesting, and open up new and suggestive lines of thought."—Scotsman.

CHEAP EDITION. NEW STYLE FOR THE POCKET.

Foolscap 8vo. Clear type. Cloth gilt, top, silk Register, 2s. net (post free, 2s. 3d.).

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST

By THOMAS KEMPIS. Faithfully Rendered into English Rhythm after the manner in which it was written. Preface by the late CANON LIDDON.

BEHOLD I SHOW YOU A MYSTERY

By "LEX," B.A., LL.D.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. 54 Illustrations by the Author.

This remarkable book deals with the mysteries of Revealed Truth in a profoundly interesting, fascinating, and convincing manner; startling betimes as to its conclusions; but these conclusions are based on premises that cannot be controverted.

BY THE RIGHT HON.
AUGUSTINE BIRRELL

MEN, WOMEN, AND BOOKS

Foolscap 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.; Cheap Edition, new style cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"A very entertaining and handy little book for leisurely reading."—Times.
For complete list of works, please write to the Publisher.

JUST PUBLISHED. GOOD FOR EVERYONE.

THE COMPLETE BENEDICT

By LAW-LACEY. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

Marriage is a subject which is never exhausted and always interesting to everyone. The "Compleat Benedict" is a book to be thoroughly enjoyed, to keep by one, and to help to make married life worth living.

FAMOUS LOVE MATCHES

By C. J. HAMILTON. An unusually interesting work. An Ideal Gift Book. Illustrated by several authentic Portraits. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

CANADIAN LIFE AS I FOUND IT

By HOMESTEADER. Four Years' Homesteading in the North-West Territories. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 1s. 6d. net.

A ROYALIST RAID

and other Poems

By WALTER CLIFFORD MELLOR. Foolscap 8vo, Japanese Parchment, 2s. net.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

A BEAUTIFUL STAR

Notes on the Star of Bethlehem. Foolscap 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. net.

New Books for the Lenten Season

CONFIRMATION LECTURES

By the Rev. Canon A. E. BARNES-LAWRENCE, M.A.

A Series of Notes on the Church Catechism. New and Revised Edition. Cloth, 1s. net (post free 1s. 2d.).

FOR USE BY THE CANDIDATES.

A Syllabus of Confirmation Lectures: Brief and Simply Arranged. Crown 8vo, 16 pp., 1d., or 6s. 3d. per 100 net.

"Mr. Barnes-Lawrence is clear in his arrangement and in his statement of doctrine. We know of no more convenient volume of its kind."—Record.

WITH CHRIST TO GETHSEMANE

By HELEN THORP. A book for use during the Forty Days of Lent. Preface by the LORD BISHOP OF ROCHESTER. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. net (by post 2s. 4d.).

RESURRECTION LIFE

By the Rev. Canon N. JONES, M.A.

A Prayer Book Study for Easter-tide. Introductory Note by the Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net (post free 2s. 3d.).

LIGHT FOR LESSER DAYS

By Rev. Canon TUCKER. With Meditations on the Black-Letter Saints of the Prayer Book. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (by post 6s. 4d.).

Thoughts on BIBLE TEACHING

By CONSTANCE NANKIVELL.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net (by post 1s. 2d.). A book which will definitely help both parents and teachers in studying and teaching the Bible and Church Catechism.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,
REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE

By W. I.

MANUAL

Arran

EVERETT & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS

THE LIFE OF COL. FRED BURNABY

By THOMAS WRIGHT, Author of "The Life of Sir Richard Burton," etc.

One Vol. Demy 8vo, with 60 Plates, 12s. net.

"All the stirring incidents in Burnaby's meteoric career are related with force and fidelity, and the many anecdotes of his deeds of prowess make delightful reading."—Sunday Times.

"A Cœur de Lion in physique, strength, bravery, and magnanimity. . . . The author has told the story of his life right well."—Daily Graphic.

"Admirable amongst biographies."—Army and Navy Gazette.

LONDON IN THE SIXTIES

By "One of the Old Brigade"

With Illustrations by HAROLD PIFFARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A Book of interesting Recollections and many anecdotes of London as it was nearly two generations ago. The greater part of them are sporting and dramatic, but for the social historian there is much that is interesting in connection with old streets, inns, and clubs.

MY LIFE AND DANCING

By MAUD ALLAN

Illustrated from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

(SECOND EDITION NOW READY.)

"Gives some delightful stories of her youth in California, her student days, her début in Berlin, and of her triumphs at the Palace."—Outlook.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

ENGLISH BIRD LIFE

By H. KNIGHT HORSFIELD

With 100 Photographs from Nature specially taken for this Book. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"An admirable book."—Country Life.

"The text combines in an unusual degree familiar description with scientific knowledge. . . . The book is one that will be eagerly welcomed."—Glasgow Herald.

"A wholly delightful book, as conspicuous for its close and sympathetic observation as for its graceful and scholarly style."—The Bulwark.

"Splendidly illustrated."—Scotsman.

"Among the many excellent books on ornithology which have been recently produced a conspicuous place must be given to this delightful volume."—Outlook.

SPORT INDEED

By THOMAS MARTINDALE

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt extra, 6s. net. Illustrated from Photographs.

CONTENTS:—A Caribou Hunt; Calling the Moose; The Fun of Hunting; A Day in the Big Woods; A Close Call; etc., etc.

THE SCOTTISH TERRIER

By O. J. LAWIES

Crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON

Author of "The Call of the Wild," "Love of Life," etc.

"There is no sign in 'The Iron Heel' of any falling-off from the strong virile style to which Mr. London has accustomed us. . . . It is a remarkable book."—Daily Mail.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM

Author of "Ere the Mormon," etc., etc.

"In these days of anæmic fiction a novel inspired with such passionate indignation is something of a rarity, and, alike for its matter and its manner, deserves the attention which it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

"A justifiable attack on those who think to honour God by dishonouring His methods."—Daily Telegraph.

"The novel is ably written. It should find favour with all except the peculiar sect to whom it is frankly and fearlessly antagonistic."—Scotsman.

A ROYAL HOAX

By FRED WHISHAW

Author of "The Great Green God," etc.

"A good story, chock-full of adventure."—Times.

"Will leave Mr. Whishaw to tell in his crisp and humorous tale of the imbrolios and complications which ensue. . . . It is a dramatic that the novel would undoubtedly make an modern play."—Yorkshire Post.

THE LORD AT REDGATE

By W. H. NICHOLSON

Author of "A Thousand Candles," etc.

"A new style of romance. . . . It is a thrilling tale to the end."—Morning Post.

THE FIGERS

By EDITH

et," etc., etc.

Lane, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1917

JANUARY 30, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CLOUD UPON THE SANCTUARY. A Text Book of Christian Mysticism. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo, xxix+144 pp., 3s. 6d. net. By COUNCILLOR KARL VON ECKARTSHAUSEN. Translated and Annotated by ISABELLE DE STEIGER, and with an Introduction by ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE. The fullest and clearest exhibition of the Doctrine of a Secret Holy Assembly within the Christian Church.

Ready February 3rd.

PSYCHIC PHILOSOPHY, AS THE FOUNDATION OF A RELIGION OF NATURAL CAUSES. By V. C. DESERTIS. With Introductory Note by Professor ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M., D.C.L. New edition, cloth gilt, crown 8vo, 416 pp., 4s. 6d. net.

"If the starting-point be granted it will be found that the resulting discussion is both ingenious and interesting, and is presented in a literary form and with a clearness of statement which contrasts favourably with much that has been written from a similar point of view."—The Literary World.

THE WISDOM OF PLOTINUS. A Metaphysical Study, by C. J. WHITBY, M.D. 120 pp. crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. net. A Treatise on the philosophical opinions of the great Neoplatonic Philosopher.

THE LIFE OF LOUIS CLAUDE DE SAINT-MARTIN, the Unknown Philosopher, and the Substance of his Transcendental Doctrine. By A. E. WAITE. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

OBERMANN. By ETIENNE PIVET DE SENANCOUR. Translated from the French, with Biographical and Critical Introduction by A. E. WAITE. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

"A Spiritual Autobiography, rich in the invitation to think, alive with the quest of truth, and yet full of speculative unrest. . . . Matthew Arnold . . . asserted that the stir of all the main forces by which modern life is impelled lives in the letters of 'Obermann.' The value of this edition is greatly enhanced by the critical appreciation with which Mr. Waite has enriched a book that deserves to be much more widely known."—The Standard.

"An excellent translation."—The Times.

OCCULT SCIENCE IN INDIA AND AMONG THE ANCIENTS. With an account of their mystic initiations and the history of Spiritism. By L. JACOLLIER. Translated from the French by W. L. FELT. Royal 8vo, 276 pp., cloth gilt, gilt tops, price 7s. 6d. net.

FLAXIUS. Leaves from the Life of an Immortal. By CHARLES GODFREY LELAND, Author of "The Breitmänn Ballads," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Godfrey Leland, apart from the keen sense of humour which inspired the 'Hans Breitmann Ballads,' has a great deal of old-world knowledge at his command. Both the humour and the knowledge jostle one another in 'Flaxius,' a book which is rather a rhapsody than a romance. Flaxius is an immortal, and into his lips Mr. Leland puts his own philosophy of Life."—Standard.

HAVE YOU A STRONG WILL? How to Develop and Strengthen Will Power, Memory, or any other Faculty by the Easy Process of Self-Hypnotism. By CHARLES GODFREY LELAND. Third and Enlarged Edition, containing the Celebrated Correspondence between Kant and Hufeland, and a Chapter on Paracelsus and his Teaching. 3s. 6d. net.

EVIDENCE FOR A FUTURE LIFE. A Translation of GABRIEL DELANNE'S Important work "L'Ame est Immortelle." By H. A. DALLAS. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

This work has been accepted by all Spiritualists as an unequalled summary of the most notable phenomena of modern times, chiefly with reference to the "perisprit" or fluidic body, by which man is brought into direct contact with the unseen universe.

CHRISTIANITY AND SPIRITUALISM. (Christianisme et Spiritualisme.) By LEON DENIS. Translated by HELEN DRAFER SPEAKMAN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

The writer contends that Spiritualism brings us the natural and tangible proofs of immortality, and thereby carries us back to the pure Christian doctrines.

THE GIFT OF THE SPIRIT. A Selection from the Essays of PRENTICE MULFORD, the celebrated American Mystic. Reprinted from the "White Cross Library." With an Introduction by A. E. WAITE. Second Edition. 3s. 6d. net.

THE GIFT OF UNDERSTANDING. A Further Selection from the Works of PRENTICE MULFORD. Reprinted from the "White Cross Library." With an Introduction by A. E. WAITE. 3s. 6d. net.

THE SCIENCE OF THE LARGER LIFE. A Selection from the Essays of URSULA N. GESTEFELD. 3s. 6d. net.

THE OCCULT REVIEW.

Annual Subscription, 7/- post free.
Single Copies, 7d. net.

THE LEADING COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE DEALING WITH OCCULT SCIENCE AND COMPARATIVE RELIGION

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE TO

WILLIAM RIDER & SON, Ltd., 164 Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular. It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. MYNART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDAR LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 15½x11½. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. "To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiahs; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times. "Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net. "It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbedness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready. "The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR." First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT. "Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times. "All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TAMER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net. "A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile. "Had Browning written pirate instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald. "This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a whoddy. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net. "A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTELTON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net. "A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions. . . . It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'th' adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lytton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. "Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition. "These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net. "Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman. "The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her music comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net. "His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearian quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. net. "There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 3s. net. "The work shows accomplishment."—The Times. "Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GRIMMOND. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPARK. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net. "As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald. "Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook. "An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman. "A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net. "These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Horning Post. "Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide. "A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By ANONYMOUS WRITER. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. "These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Music.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net. "An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman."

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net. "A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.
Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET. "We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TYMAN. "Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

GEDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

VOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 723	Rembrandt and his Con-
In the Park . . . 725	temporaries . . . 732
Liverpool and the Poets 725	A Prize Novel . . . 734
Letters from "Tay	Country Life . . . 735
Pay" . . . 727	Shorter Reviews . . . 736
Poe and Baltimore . . 729	Rustic Religion . . . 736
George Meredith . . . 730	Correspondence . . . 738
	Books Received . . . 739

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Archbishop of Canterbury is quite unrepentant and quite unchastened by the reception given by Churchmen to his squalid attempts to "compromise" with Mr. Runciman over the Church schools. In his speech at a meeting of the Canterbury Diocesan Education Society on Wednesday last, he said that to his mind the balance of advantage lay with the suggested settlement, and if it had all to be done over again, nothing that had happened since would lead him to speak, write, or act otherwise than he had done. Fortunately it has been demonstrated that the Church is not at the mercy of the Archbishop and the bishops, and that they are powerless to impose their political opportunism on the great body of Churchmen. When next the great Archbishop starts his beautiful "compromising" games with the avowed enemies of the Church he will find that a great deal of the ignorance and misunderstanding which prevailed on the subject, causing so many "plain men" and "men in the street" to support him, has been dissipated, and that consequently he will not even be able to rely on the applause of the mob. For instance, the Pall Mall Gazette, which was one of his staunchest supporters a little while ago, has apparently discovered that it has made an awkward blunder. It has now executed a complete volte-face, and is coming out very strongly as a supporter of the Church's demands. This is distinctly amusing considering the attitude that the Pall Mall took up at a time when the Church was in real danger. "Bad citizens," "reactionaries," and "wreckers" were some of the epithets bestowed about six weeks ago by Mr. Astor's organ on all those who ventured to hold the opinions which it now professes to hold itself. Having discovered that the Church side is likely to be the winning side, the Pall Mall Gazette has altered its views accordingly. We make no complaint—indeed, we foretold exactly what would happen—and we are glad to think that the Pall Mall Gazette has had the good sense to change what it is pleased to call its mind even at so late a stage. The public at large will now have an opportunity for forming an excellent idea as to the value of the opinion of the Pall Mall Gazette on any question of public policy, or indeed on any subject whatever.

Mr. Bottomley is very angry about our paragraph in THE ACADEMY of January 9th, in which we wrote as follows: "We happen to know that the publisher of Oscar Wilde's collected works sent them for review to not more than six journals, and we question whether John Bull was included in the number. Of course, Mr. Vivian may have 'received' the collected works in the sense that he has bought them and paid for them, or that he has borrowed them from a friend, but when a reviewer talks about 'receiving' books, he implies that they have been sent to him or to his editor for review." "Well, they were," says Mr. Bottomley, and goes on to "venture to suggest" that the editor of THE ACADEMY "should have taken the trouble to consult the publisher before making accusations intended to suggest bad faith." As a matter of fact, we consulted Mr. Robert Ross, the editor of the edition, and he informed us in writing that the collected edition was originally sent only to six daily papers, and that subsequently, by special arrangement, it was sent to two more daily papers, and to no other daily or weekly. That makes eight in all, so that we were mistaken in saying that it was only sent to six, but that is immaterial to our argument. We leave it to our readers to judge whether we can fairly be accused of making accusations without taking due precaution as to our authority. As a matter of fact, we made no accusation. We merely said that we "ventured to doubt" whether Messrs. Methuen had sent the collected edition of Wilde's works to John Bull, or to Mr. Vivian, for review. Evidently either Mr. Ross was mistaken in what he wrote to us, or Messrs. Methuen suddenly changed their minds and sent the edition to John Bull alone among weekly papers, and without the knowledge of Mr. Ross. We should not be surprised at anything that Messrs. Methuen did; we have already indicated in these columns our opinion of their intelligence, their judgment, and their discretion, but it is obvious that in view of the information we had received from Mr. Ross we cannot be blamed for "venturing to doubt" that they had singled out John Bull as a recipient of their collected edition. In any case, the matter is a trifling one, and we see no necessity to make a pother about it. As to Mr. Bottomley's vulgar and foolish personal attacks on the editor of this paper, Mr. Bottomley probably knows his own business best (it is to be hoped, for his own sake, that he does), and if he thinks that his readers are amused or edified by the sort of repartee which takes the form of putting out the tongue and saying: "Yah! You may be a lord (sic), but you have not got the manners of a gentleman," by all means let him continue to make use of it. It doesn't hurt us, and it probably consoles Mr. Bottomley "in the hour of his trial."

In the current number of a magazine called The Humane Review, which we have not previously come across, there is a good example of the sort of effort on the part of the Humanitarian League which we can heartily support and approve. We refer to an article called "How to Kill Animals Humanely." It contains admirable advice and instruction on the painless destruction of old and decrepit pets who are often kept alive out of mistaken kindness, or because their owner "cannot bear" to have them destroyed. There are also some valuable remarks about traps. Steel traps for rabbits and vermin have always seemed to us brutally cruel and indefensible. Many preservers of game, we are glad to say, absolutely refuse to allow their keepers to use them. We think that their use ought to be made illegal. In the same number of the Humane Review there is reproduced, under the heading, "Savage Sport at Eton," a correspondence between a large collection of ladies, including the unspeakable Miss Pankhurst and the Head Master of Eton. The correspondence merely goes to show that the perhaps well-meaning ladies in question are impervious to argument and wanting in common sense. If hare hunting is cruel then all sport is cruel, and it is no more cruel for boys to hunt hares at Eton than for men and women to hunt any other animal anywhere else. The ladies who signed the remonstrance to Canon Lyttelton must be perfectly well aware of this obvious fact. Why, then, do they address themselves particularly to the Head Master of Eton? The answer is that it gives them endless opportunities for indulging in sentimental clap-trap about "the youth of the nation" and the "demoralising effect" that hare hunting by Eton boys has on "boys of lowlier station."

Ostensibly their complaint is made against the hunting of heavy hares, and if they had confined themselves to this point there might have been much to say for them, but when it is proved to them that this hunting of heavy hares simply "does not happen," to quote Canon Lyttelton's words, they do not for that abate their campaign one wit. The article in which the correspondence between the ladies and the Head Master of Eton is reproduced, goes on to protest against any kind of hunting of hares whether male or female, heavy or light. It quotes, with approval, Ouida's remark that "the very discussion whether the hares are heavy or light seems unsupportably brutal," and later on refers to the sport as "a very cruel blood sport." Elsewhere it says: "the ordinary incidents of beagling are horrible enough, with the 'breaking up' of the hare and the 'bleeding' of the hounds." The use of these words is obviously simply a device to make creep the flesh of the sentimental. Everyone knows that hunting of any kind entails the killing or making an attempt to kill an animal, just as sitting down to luncheon entails the killing of an animal for food. To call that killing "breaking up" makes it neither more nor less "horrible." But "breaking up" sounds so much more terrible than "killing" that the wily humanitarian must needs make a great point of using the technical sporting term.

We shall not enter into a discussion as to the morality of field sports. We shall content ourselves with saying that while in our opinion they would probably be avoided by high saints, they are harmless and even beneficial to the ordinary man, and as for the sanction to kill animals, that question is settled once for all in the New Testament. Our Lord and his disciples and apostles ate meat, and to eat meat you must either kill an animal yourself or tolerate its destruction at the hands of others. Looking at the matter again from the point of view of the hare, we can safely assume that it is no worse to be broken up by the Eton Beagles than to have the same operation performed by a fox or to be "caught napping" by a weasel. The instinct of hunting is a very strong one in the human race; like all other human instincts it is capable of abuse, but it is, when confined to the hunting of animals, one of the least reprehensible of those instincts. In any case it is infinitely to be preferred to the instinct which so many women seem to have lately developed of hunting and harrying their neighbours, yelling for votes, breaking up meetings (as opposed to hares), and generally making a pestilential and noisy nuisance of themselves. Who in his senses, having offended in any way, would not rather fall into the hands of a company of life-long sportsmen and devotees of field sports rather than into the hands of a band of female suffragists, whether they chose to call themselves constitutional or militant?

Morally speaking, Mr. Herbert Gladstone will find it hard to satisfy his own conscience that the responsibility for the shocking outrage at Tottenham does not rest with him. The Act for excluding undesirable aliens was passed with the very object of keeping out of the country such monsters as the "heroes" of this tragic affair, whereby two innocent people have lost their lives, and seventeen others been more or less seriously wounded. There is no doubt that if the Act had been enforced they would never have been allowed to land in England at all. But the Home Secretary, in obedience to the canting howl about "political refugees" which was raised in the Radical Press at the bidding of certain Jews and Socialists, has rendered this wise law of no effect. Mr. Winston Churchill also, we should imagine, must recall with mingled feelings his promises to the alien Semitic population of Manchester made on the occasion of his recent defeat in that city. He must perforce reflect that he gained nothing by these promises, since he failed to hold his seat, and he will have the uncomfortable certainty that he is not likely to be allowed to forget them for some time to come.

Meanwhile a great opportunity arises for Mr. Frank Harris and Mr. Bernard Shaw. The two noble "political refugees" who shot the policeman and the small boy, and wounded seventeen other people, are Anarchists, and their sad plight must necessarily appeal to the sympathetic feelings of the author of "The Bomb" and the author of the wonderful lamentations over the fate of the patriotic gentleman who endeavoured to blow up the King and Queen of Spain, and killed and wounded a large number of people in the attempt. Mr. Shaw wept tears of blood about this ruffian in the preface to one of his volumes of plays (we forget which at the moment), and tore his hair over the brutality of those who "hunted him down." But perhaps the nearness of the tragedy may affect the views of Messrs. Shaw and Harris. They probably think that Anarchists are all very well in Spain, or in Russia, or in the United States, but are not so desirable in London. At any rate, that seems to be the line taken by the Star newspaper, which has been denouncing the two Tottenham scoundrels in unmeasured terms. The Star, of course, was one of the strongest opponents of the principles of the Alien Immigration Act, and in addition to that, its sympathy with Anarchists, Nihilists, and murderers in Russia has been often openly expressed. The executors of the law in Russia were all, according to the Star, tyrants and ruthless butchers, while the persons who blew up Grand Dukes and threw bombs were the poor oppressed and down-trodden "people." But when the terror comes to Tottenham, which is not so very far from Stonecutter Street, the Star grows very pale, and begins, as it were, to feel upon its shuddering cheek the kiss of Caiaphas in a way which it had not calculated upon. Consequently for once it finds itself on the side of "the forces of reaction," otherwise known as the police.

At the Fortune Playhouse, Brewer Street, the English Drama Society have produced Pippa Passes, and four matinee performances have been given. We went round to the first of them, hoping greatly. And, in a sense, we were not disappointed. We consider Miss Isabel Roland's performance of Pippa to be a most intelligent and competent piece of work. Miss Roland surmounted difficulties with which surely few actresses have ever had to contend; and she must be the possessor of a large faith in her poet, not to say an even larger faith in her audience. In any case, she did admirably. Miss Lucy Wilson, as Ottima, may equally be congratulated. We believe that Browning himself would have been satisfied with her, as he undoubtedly would have been satisfied with Miss Roland, and we do not know that we could offer higher praise. The English Dramatic Society should be encouraged, at any rate by people who love poetry and the authentic drama as opposed to sheer entertainment.

At the Afternoon Theatre, otherwise His Majesty's, on Tuesday, we were proffered "The Admirable Bashville," described on the programme as "Bernard Shaw's Masterpiece." We quite agree that Mr. Shaw never did anything better. On the other hand, "The Admirable Bashville" is undiluted burlesque. And we are of opinion that Miss Löhr and Mr. Ben Webster and Mr. Henry Ainley are entirely wasted on such an impertinence, the due and proper presentation of "The Admirable Bashville" being really a job for Mr. Pellisier and his engaging troupe of "Follies." We mean no reflection on Mr. Pellisier, who, as everybody knows, is the corpulent chief of a comfortable band of humorists. One's sense of the fitness of things would, however, be a little disturbed if the "Follies" were suddenly to bill themselves for a serious production of "Hamlet." We think that in "The Admirable Bashville" Mr. Shaw has anticipated the famous Pellisier Potted Plays. Mr. Shaw is indeed a sort of Mr. Wimperis, and, on the whole, Mr. Wimperis can give us better fooling than his rival.

The conviction of Henry Hess removes from our midst for twelve months a member of that select coterie of persons who imagine that "cleverness" renders a man superior to the laws of his country. Hess's reputation for cleverness was phenomenal, and it seems to us more than probable that it was this reputation which the jury had in mind when they recommended him to mercy "on account of his previous good character." Hess was a financial journalist. After his failure as a newspaper proprietor he became a contributor of financial matter to Vanity Fair and sundry other journals, including, we believe, Reynold's Newspaper and John Bull. It was his boast that he had the handling of more financial columns than any other journalist in London; and there can be no doubt that he was esteemed wonderfully clever; otherwise he would not have been employed in so universal a manner. That such a man should be given the power to influence the investments or speculations of the readers of presumably "influential" newspapers does not reflect a great deal of credit upon journalism. Of course, Hess's conviction has nothing to do with his work for the papers we have mentioned, and it is to be hoped that the editors of those papers were entirely ignorant of his true character. Probably they were, in which case his cleverness again shines out with effulgence.

The February number of the new English Review contains a good deal of poetry, but not a word either from the editor or from Mr. Watts-Dunton as to the liberties which somebody has taken with Rossetti's "Ballad of Jan Van Hunks." Perhaps silence is the best way out. Indeed, the value of silence on most occasions is rapidly impressing itself on the modern journalistic mind. For our own part we should raise no objection to it, particularly if the persons with the shut mouths are resolved not again to offend. Meanwhile, the English Review has managed to obtain some poetry by writers who are still alive. In the new issue there are three poems by Mr. W. B. Yeats and five by Mr. Walter de la Mare. Mr. Yeats is evidently in a despondent mood just now. He says:

When I was young
I had not given a penny for a song
Did not the poet carry him with an air
As though to say, "It is the sword elsewhere,"
I would be now, could I but have my wish,
Bolder and dumber and deafer than a fish.

This is a pity. Mr. de la Mare's "Mrs. McQueen of the Lollie-Shop" is the most satisfactory piece of verse in the English Review's bundle.

IN THE PARK

A SATYR, in a ruinous fair place,
Dark-dappled, marble-eyed, with fissured face,
Sits in a bright blue web of ilex shade,
With half obliterated lips, close-laid
To pipes now sullen as a fountain dried
That once, through many-throated channels wide,
Beneath its net of shifting rainbow played;
His subtle hands are ruined, and decayed
His double pipes, his tottering hedge and wall,
And red, wet chestnut-littered pedestal.

A briary wilderness it seemed, that was
In days long past an alley, but the grass
Thickens, where once the flowers, unvisited;
And the lean thistle rears its flossy head
Above the fingered chestnut-drifts, outspread
Leaf by wet leaf, on that grey garden-bed,
Or where, in ranks, the sanguine sorrel stood
Mistily luminous, a multitude
Amid its niggard pasturage—unstirred
Save where a faint and autumn-throated bird
Begins. Else, under the clear-crested trees
And resonant autumnal stillnesses
No sound, but murmurous dropping of the few
And sweating leaves, those merrier multitudes
That trembled in the leopard-coloured woods.

LIVERPOOL AND THE POETS

THE city of Liverpool, noted for its crime and crimps, and perhaps the dirtiest city in these realms, boasts, it seems, a Liberal newspaper called The Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury, the editor whereof is one Sir Edward Richard Russell, who is a knight and whose recreations are set forth in "Who's Who" as "theatre, music, travel." This delightful old gentleman was born in 1834, so that we owe him the respect due to grey hairs. At the same time, he imagines himself to be a public man, and in Monday's issue of his Liverpool Daily Post—which, by the way, grows older and older even unto perfect dotage—he ventures to address himself to an examination of the religious and critical views of THE ACADEMY. It seems that Sir Edward Russell has arrived at a definite opinion about "the brightest of the literary weeklies" so recently as Saturday last. No doubt our unfortunate paper has undergone his severe scrutiny from week to week for years past; for he professes to know more about its history than we do, and he is full of vain assertion as to why we were founded and as to our intention and inspiration. But during these many weary years the good knight has been unable quite to make up his mind about THE ACADEMY, and, as we have said, it was on Saturday that he at length found himself in the happy position of being free to jump to conclusions and indulge himself in a leader about us. For in our issue of Saturday we published a paragraph and an article. The paragraph bore reference to the Evening Standard and the earthquake at Messina, and the article was an article respecting the poetry of the late Mr. Oscar Wilde. On the strength of this paragraph and this article Sir Edward has decided that "under the present editorship THE ACADEMY has been inspired by two main purposes: first, to preserve the power and purity of the Church's doctrines; and, secondly, to extol the literary excellence of the late Mr. Oscar Wilde." Sir

Edward Russell's wonderful gift of perspicacity does him credit and will no doubt be vastly admired in Liverpudlian (Liverpudlian is the Liverpool epithet) Nonconformist circles. Here are his comments as to the paragraph:

It seems that the other day the Evening Standard contained what Lord Alfred Douglas calls "some very proper observations on the earthquake at Messina." One very proper observation was as follows: "Was it merely a coincidence that the earthquake followed three days after a blasphemous parody printed in a Radical paper of that city inviting Heaven to send an earthquake?" Upon this suggestion, this imputation that Almighty God is capable of slaying with hellish torments two hundred thousand men, women, and children because His dignity was hurt by the scribbles of some miserable, obscure, Italian journalist, Lord Alfred gravely remarks: "We are glad to notice that a work-a-day evening paper is not above confessing to a belief in the possibility of the supernatural even in this enlightened generation of intellectuals and stalwarts." There is, of course, no arguing with Lord Alfred about his ineffable demon; if he likes to worship such a creation of his own he must; for our part, we rejoice to think that men have had the courage and goodness to cast down and dishonour the altars of a deity who must have had his origin in delirious evil fancy, and who has nothing in common with the Author of all good things, the Heavenly Father of Jesus Christ. Lord Alfred and the ecclesiastical school to which he belongs have smooth tongues, and the gyves they would fasten on the limbs of men are thickly sheathed in velvet, but when they come to us with their suave offers, it is well that we should remember what the imagined god is under whose foot they would place our skulls.

We are not in the least disposed to discuss matters of theology with persons of the type of Sir Edward Russell, who, it would appear, has discovered the Deity of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's three-and-sixpenny "new religion," and will, no doubt, be made the recipient of one of the Rev. R. J. Campbell's approving frying-pans. But on the mere point of logic it is quite obvious that Sir Edward Russell's "demon" is, on the whole, an impotent demon, just as Sir Edward is an impotent critic. If he—that is to say, the demon of Sir Edward Russell's worship—is the absolutely kind, lenient and indulgent demon that Sir Edward makes him out to be, we may suppose that he would have prevented the Messina earthquake if it had lain in his power so to do. It did not lie in his power; hence the earthquake and hence his failure in omnipotence. Of course, it is preposterous to discuss all such matters, inasmuch as they are beyond knowledge and beyond the reasoning even of persons from Liverpool. Our observation on the remarks of the Evening Standard was a perfectly sound observation, and we repeat here and now that it is most satisfactory to find a work-a-day evening paper not above confessing to a belief in the possibility of the supernatural. Sir Edward Russell evidently believes in the possibility of the supernatural; otherwise he could not possibly believe in the R. J. Campbell type of benevolent demon. Why should it be improper for the Evening Standard or THE ACADEMY to believe in the possibility of the supernatural, which belief is essential to a belief in the "demon" which happens to be the Deity of the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, or, if Sir Edward Russell so prefers, the Deity of the Rev. John Wesley? The Liverpudlian wit must be repaired promptly, otherwise it will fall into cureless ruin.

Now, as to the poetry of Mr. Oscar Wilde. Sir Edward Russell suffers from a pernicious and deep-seated complaint which is the sure mark of the limited and the provincial. He cannot refrain from confusing a poet's private life with a poet's poetical utterances. He condemns Wilde's poetry because of Wilde's private offence. He says that Wilde "was plucked out of a quagmire by the merciful hand of the law and put in the sweeter atmosphere of a British gaol." There can be no doubt about it in the least. At the same time, it does not in the least follow that Wilde was an indifferent or an incompetent poet, as Sir Edward Russell roundly and flatly asserts. Wilde, he assures us, "was incapable of feeling or expressing agony of mind," and the "Ballad of Reading Gaol" is "a nauseous whine of ingrained hypocrisy and vanity." Here you have Sir Edward Russell. We should advise Sir Edward Russell to read again the "Ballad of Reading Gaol," and then to deny, on that literary reputation for which he so hankers, that it is a great and moving poem, and that it is the work of a poet who, so far from being incapable of feeling or expressing agony of mind, has simply felt and expressed agony of mind in as sure and profound a sense as any poet of them all. Tom Hood wrote a short ballad called "The Dream of Eugene Aram." Sir Edward Russell and all Liverpool will agree that "The Dream of Eugene Aram" is a poem and that Tom Hood was capable of feeling and expressing agony of mind. They would go further and assert that Tom Hood was "a true poet," and they would as soon dream of cutting off their heads as of describing "Eugene Aram" as a "nauseous whine of ingrained hypocrisy and vanity." We assert that the "Ballad of Reading Gaol" is a much finer work and a much more poetical and humanly poignant work than "The Dream of Eugene Aram." And we do this, not in disparagement of Thomas Hood, and not in the least because it is critically necessary, but really because we believe that the comparison of these two poems will bring home to Sir Edward Russell and the likes of him the absolute foolishness and stupidity of his position. Why does Sir Edward Russell, who, presumably, "yields to no man" in his admiration for "dear old Tom Hood," go out of his way to describe Wilde as a nauseous, hypocritical whiner? The answer is only too simple. Sir Edward knows absolutely nothing to the discredit of Thomas Hood the man. Probably, and we are glad to think it, there is nothing to be known that is discreditable to Thomas Hood the man. But of Oscar Wilde there are woeful and black things to remember; and, being nothing if not charitable, Sir Edward Russell has a memory as long as the spoon we hope to use when we sup with the Devil. We say, and we know it to be the truth, that on these large issues of the worth of poetry the private personal man is neither our concern nor anybody else's concern. Sir Edward Russell sharpens up his article with admirable tags from the Latin and Greek classics. He would desire us to regard him in the figure of a critic who is "saturated" with the ancient masterpieces in poetry. We are glad to know that he has an admiration and a love for classical poetry. Yet he is evidently quite unaware that if he were so disposed he could prove out of many of the elder poets' own mouths that they were sinful and even depraved men. Yet their poetry remains and their wickedness is very properly forgotten. Even Sir Edward Russell forgets it, so that to all intents and purposes it is buried and wiped out and of no more consequence. It seems to us that the time has come when even the Liverpool Daily Post can with advantage dismiss from its mind the evil deeds of Oscar Wilde if it would fain criticise poetry. Forgiveness we do not ask for him. We are not concerned that Oscar Wilde as a private man should be forgiven or condemned. The Liverpool Post can neither forgive him nor condemn him; for from the Liverpool Post's point of view forgiveness and condemnation should be the affair of R. J. Campbell's demon rather than of Sir Edward Russell. What we are concerned for is Wilde's poetry. It is extant poetry, and it can be had by the volume, like any other poet's work. Let us take it for what it is worth as poetry and without putting it to the altogether superfluous and impudent test of sectional biography. If somebody were to discover to-morrow that Shakespeare murdered his mother English literature would be none the poorer in the presence of the wonderful fact. Sir Edward Russell might well set himself to the task of dealing straightly with some of the Sonnets from a certain point of view. But he could not howl down the Sonnets, and it will take a much greater and more powerful and more logical moralist than Sir Edward Russell can ever hope to be to discredit Wilde's poetical work with the help of references to British gaols. Meanwhile, we are glad to find that while our genial septuagenarian lover of the classics cannot abide "The Ballad of Reading Gaol," and affirms that the four stanzas from "The Harlot's House," quoted in these columns last week, "are indifferent jingle," he is still capable of deriving entertainment from some sorts of English verse. To a Mr. John Garth, author of a volume of verses called "Psyche," he has written as follows:

I have read your work, and am delighted with it. The "Psyche" has many fine, sustained passages, and few in which there is not something striking. It is noble, classic, and yet vivid. Equal praise is due to the other divisions of the volume, which you have well discriminated in your introduction, and what you claim for them is fully true. I have enjoyed and admired them.

Haphazard we take from Mr. Garth's volume the following lines:

A little bird sang on a leafy spray,
A little bird sang, for his heart was gay,
And Nature had poured a melody wild
Into the heart of her birdling child.

My heart was filled with the birdling's song,
My heart was thrilled, for the notes were strong,
And lo! as I listened, I thought I heard
A chorus of voices around that bird.

We will not call this a nauseating whine, and we should certainly not suggest that it was written by a poet who was incapable of feeling or expressing agony of mind. But it represents Sir Edward Russell's avowed taste in poetry. And, of course, in the face of such a critic Wilde must needs bow his crested poetical head. So much for the Liverpudlian and his puddles.

LETTERS FROM "TAY PAY"

LAST week we made reference to a beautiful new Correspondence College which is about to be "inaugurated" by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, editor and part proprietor of T.P.'s Weekly. We quoted from Mr. O'Connor's glowing preliminary announcement, in which "T. P." dwelt lovingly on his "profound love of education, especially of the young," and prattled to us about "the golden portal of the Temple of Learning." And we took it upon ourselves to assert that while Mr. O'Connor may be qualified to teach book-keeping and simple French to young people of either sex, he is scarcely the person from whom even the youngest of young people may hope to obtain profitable instruction in the department of letters. Undeterred by our remarks, Mr. O'Connor persists in his dubious enterprise, and the current issue of T.P.'s Weekly is described on the cover as a "Special Correspondence College Supplement." The supplement itself takes the shape of a four-page inset, with a portrait of "T. P." on the front of it, and a view of the portal of the Temple of Learning on the back. Over the portal we read the following touching words:

A detailed Prospectus and Syllabus will be sent to any address on receipt of the annexed form or of a postcard. They contain full particulars regarding the various courses, the methods of working, fees, etc.

So that there are to be fees, after all. Mr. T. P. O'Connor is doing nothing for nothing. He has a profound love of education, whatever that may mean, especially of the young; but he is also equipped with a profound love of fees. And if he is to help you through the golden portal of the Temple of Learning, you must rake up a little cash silver for his use, or go unhelped. The portal of the Temple of Learning is golden; Mr. O'Connor's fees, we take it, are silver. And why not? The labourer is worthy of his hire, and it is not reasonable that Mr. O'Connor should be expected to bestow "a literary training" upon the youth of the country free, gratis, and for nothing. Quack medicines are not given away, and the Principal of a Literary Correspondence College must of necessity take a little money from you, even if it be only for the mere and sheer purpose "of defraying postage, etc." We have not had the curiosity to discover Mr. O'Connor's precise rates for literary training. We will suppose that they are moderation itself, and that they run to not more than ten silver shillings for the whole course. Now for ten shillings the unimaginable youth who aspires after "literary training" can purchase the following works:

1. The Bible (authorised version).
2. The Plays and Poems of Shakespeare.
3. An English Grammar.
4. An English Dictionary.

And if the said delightful youth will peruse assiduously and with an humble and contrite heart the first two of these works, and refer assiduously to the last two as occasion arises, we can promise him absolutely all the literary training that he is likely to need for the next couple of years. And in any case we can promise him a great deal more of a literary training than he is likely to obtain from Mr. T. P. O'Connor in the course of the next century. With a view no doubt of justifying himself as a person of literary discrimination, Mr. O'Connor deals with the poetry of Francis Thompson on the front page of the current T.P.'s Weekly. He begins by assuring us that he never saw Francis Thompson, the which fact he counts as "one of the irreparable losses of my life." All the same, he is not in the least downhearted about it, because, if you please, "there is so much in [Thompson's] poetry that appeals to me, and seems an embodiment to celestial music of mine and of all humanity's experience." Dear, dear, think of that; "embodiment to," from a Professor of Literature in a Correspondence College! And think of the following passage and button up your money: "How can I even try to express the extraordinary beauty of that wonderful poem—its rush, its pathos, its inevitableness, its perfect rhythm? To do all that, one must have been gifted with a power of expression equal to that of Thompson himself. Just listen to these lines, and reflect that they come from the same hand as, perchance, shivering, wan, clammy, stretched out to you a box of matches as you passed carelessly, and perhaps in some hurry, as an unhappy and disturbing sight." And then our profound gentleman goes on to quote from "The Hound of Heaven"! It is quite plain that Mr. O'Connor has little sense of the grandeur and meaning of poetry. A person who, after reading "The Hound of Heaven," reflects in the manner of Peter Keary: "Lo! the hand that penned this noble poem may have offered me matches from the kerb," is a literary person indeed! It is as who should say after reading "Hamlet": "I wonder if Shakespeare ate peas with his knife." And it is a great deal more foolish than to have said that "In Memoriam" came straight from the full heart of an officer's widow. The fact is that Mr. T. P. O'Connor is one of those many worthy people who cannot tell good poetry from bad until they have been severely kicked into a little knowledge. In his usual pigmentary manner Mr. O'Connor informs us that Francis Thompson's name "was first mentioned to me when all London was intoxicated and astounded by his first volume of poems." We never knew that all London was intoxicated and astounded by anybody's first volume of poems; but Mr. T. P. O'Connor, of course, is a great feeler of the main pulses of life, and he hears thunders where undistinguished people hear only whispers. In any case, however, where is T. P. O'Connor's appreciation of Francis Thompson's first volume of poetry? How comes it that the great "Tay Pay" has been so many years discovering "the rush, the pathos, the inevitableness, and the perfect rhythm"—particularly the perfect rhythm—of Thompson's poetry, and how comes it that the rush, the pathos, and the inevitableness and the perfect rhythm have power only to induce in the mind of T. P. O'Connor such a snob's reflection as the one we have quoted? Well, the reason is that Mr. O'Connor knows next to nothing about poetry first hand. His knowledge is confined almost exclusively to what other people tell him; and the other people have to put in years of labour in order to convince him. Like all other people of his intellectual class, Mr. O'Connor is at length convinced about Thompson. But he does not know why he is convinced, and, consequently, all he can offer us is his rant about rush, pathos, and rhythm, and his marvel that a poem like "The Hound of Heaven" should have been written by a stripling who sold matches at Charing Cross. For our own part, we doubt very much whether Francis Thompson ever did sell matches. In any event, he had the grace not to sell T.P.'s Weekly. Mr. O'Connor's "interest" in him is the usual unintellectual person's interest. It is an interest which has its basis in the possibility that Francis Thompson sold matches and held them out to passers-by at Charing Cross with what Mr. T. P. O'Connor felicitously calls a clammy hand. Even so the Daily Mail, which for years refrained from reviewing poetry, and appeared to imagine that Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Meredith were dead, discovered a poet with a wooden leg, and printed a long account of his works. The interest, of course, for the Daily Mail and the Daily Mail's infatuated readers lay in the fact that a man with a wooden leg had actually written some verses. We should very much like to challenge Mr. O'Connor to a simple test of his literariness. We will submit to him in the presence of an unbiased third person, twenty type-written pieces of poetry—one good, the rest middling; and if he can then and there pick out the good one, we will pay up our fee for a course of his literary training. Naturally, Mr. O'Connor is too busy a journalist and too engrossed by his Parliamentary duties to engage in such idle sport, but if he would squeeze out an hour any afternoon, we will find the twenty pieces of poetry. Meanwhile, it is perhaps only just for us to mention that the literary training proffered by T.P.'s Weekly may be by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, or it may be by somebody else; for in the prospectus "T. P." talks largely of an "eminent expert." "Great care," we are told, "has been bestowed on the literary training course, with the object of making it thoroughly practicable. It has been prepared by an eminent expert. . . . Special attention is paid to such matters as the formation of style, and the choice of reading. . . . The exercises accompanying the lessons are of a specially interesting and practical nature. By their aid the student will more readily attain proficiency than by the study of many theoretical text-books. . . . After having been corrected by a trained expert the exercises will be returned to the students." One wonders if the "trained expert" is the same gentleman as the "eminent expert," and if either or both of them is "Tay Pay" himself. And if they are not "Tay Pay," who in the name of goodness can they possibly be? What

"eminent expert" is lending himself to such a catch-penny business; and what trained expert even will have a finger in such a matter? Furthermore, what is a trained expert in the literary sense? As Mr. O'Connor no doubt says occasionally in Parliament, "Name, name." We will undertake to deal with the eminence of expert number one right off if Mr. O'Connor will trot him out. And as for expert number two, he is probably some complacent hack who will be content to receive two or three pounds a week for correcting exercises whose authors have paid Mr. O'Connor a few hundreds. The whole business is as sad and unseemly from a journalistic point of view as anything well could be. And from the literary point of view it is ghastly. We like "T. P." in his place. He is a journalist of some parts if of no particular magnitude. His paper, M.A.P., no doubt pleases the class of readers for whom it is intended. His other paper, T.P.'s Weekly, is a snippet paper, and drags down literature to the not altogether elevated uses of the shouting advertiser. On the whole, however, it is better for the people than Pearson's Weekly or Answers, and so long as it refrained from quacking on its own part we might conceivably tolerate it. When it quacks in its Literary Help Column we conceive it to be our duty to protest, and now that it quacks blatantly and brazenly, and constitutes itself into a Literary Correspondence College, it is our plain duty to advise all persons who esteem themselves the friends of letters to be aware of it. In order, however, that there may be no misconception we may note that, according to "T.P.":

The "T.P.'s Weekly" Correspondence College will always be conducted with the one end in view—that of providing a helping hand to those in need of it. Mr. O'Connor has throughout been governed entirely by this consideration, regarding it, so to speak, as an extension of the aim he had in view when he originally founded T.P.'s Weekly six years ago.

Also:

In arranging for the carrying on of the T.P.'s Weekly Correspondence College, Mr. O'Connor and those associated with him have had consideration for slender purses. One of the chief purposes of such a College is to provide the best of teaching at such a cost as shall give to those students whose means are small, equal facilities with those in more favoured positions. With this idea the scale of charges for the various courses have (sic) been kept as low as possible, having regard to efficiency. As it is practically certain that many students will find the lessons a distinct help towards bettering their positions in life, it may reasonably be hoped that very many of them, so far from being put to any ultimate expense at all, may make an actual profit out of their course.

We are quite willing to agree that the business and French departments and, peradventure, even the "mental training" department may be helpful and worth the money. But the "literary training" department is another affair. Persons who pay fees for literary training, particularly under the suggestion that they may "readily attain proficiency," part with their money in the belief that they are about to find a royal road to literary competence or eminence. And this idea is greatly strengthened when their instructor is in a position to point, as Mr. O'Connor can point, to what is esteemed journalistic and literary "success." It is perfectly obvious, however, that there is no royal road to "proficiency" in letters, and that no amount of tuition (and, least of all, tuition by correspondence) will render one person in a thousand a proficient journalist or man of letters. We should hold that any Correspondence College offering its "students" a course of literary training which is to include "formation of style" and induce "proficiency" would really be compelled to commence operations by assuring quite nine out of every ten of its clients that they are quite unfitted for the literary vocation. And if it did this, of course, it would not be profitable.

POE AND BALTIMORE

THERE will be no celebration of the Poe centenary in Baltimore, Maryland; "that's a cinch," as they say "out there."

The other day a writer in the Daily Mail accused Richmond, Virginia, of neglecting Poe. Richmond, Va., does neglect him—though really only on the surface: actually, they are very proud of him there, and the University of Virginia misses no chance to celebrate him. But Baltimore is a good distance away from Richmond, and different. Baltimore, Maryland, ignores Poe. And yet in Baltimore Poe lies buried.

You remember the squalid tragedy? Poe, on his last legs, had gone to Richmond to find a wife among the people of his youth, the people who had always been kind to him, and he had become engaged to Mrs. Shelton, a wealthy widow. Had this marriage come off, what dreams we might still have had, what reveries, what magnificent pieces of prose! Poe never occurs to us as a man who had at all said his last word; as Baudelaire, to take the nearest name, very evidently does. But the marriage didn't come off: it was the fifth act of the tragedy—not the harlequinade that follows or, as Poe himself probably supposed, the first act of a new comedy. He left Richmond, intending to come back in a few weeks. A number of friends gave him a farewell supper and saw him to the train. He seems to have been more or less dazed; he slept, and was carried to Havre de Grace, a little station on Chesapeake Bay. The conductor—the guard as we say—put him out there, and he was bundled into another train going back to Baltimore. Then a thick foggy curtain falls, veiling the operation of the tragedy for hours and hours. Finally a printer recognised him as he lay on the sawdust floor of a bar-room, and notified a certain Dr. Snodgrass. He was carried to the Washington Hospital. As he lay there they heard him crying interminably for some man named Reynolds. To Dr. Moran, bending over him, he said: "It's all over, doctor; write, Eddie is no more." Then he said: "Lord help my poor soul." And shortly after he died in a place which society has set apart for its castaways.

If Poe was unlucky in his life and wretched in his death, after his death he was singularly fortunate. A man of as great, though not of so prolific genius as his own, a man, as one uneasily thinks, whose writings Poe would have denigrated with a will!—a supreme poet, a master of prose, Charles Baudelaire, made him a European classic. Through Baudelaire, everybody who knows anything has heard of Poe. Mallarmé said to the present writer that Poe was "le Dieu de sa jeunesse." Marcel Schwob said that much of the present-day popular literature was derived from Poe. And Villiers de l'Isle Adam, and Huysmans? He broke a way for their genius.

But before all this Baltimore, Maryland, remains impassive, even disdainful, as the old impoverished noble families of the Faubourg St. Germain economised on sugar and sneered at Napoleon. Those people had, after all, their excuse and their motive, and we can all make allowance for it; but what excuse has Baltimore, Maryland?

Baltimore, Maryland, is one of the few places in the world where you are landed happily at the station; not as at Cologne, too happily, right under the towers of the Cathedral, taking your breath away; and not as at Verona, on the other hand, where you are pitched out into a desolate landscape far away from the little jewel of a town. In Baltimore the train lands you, not amid squalor and slums—one can hardly fancy slums in Baltimore—nor yet in the best part, but just happily into grave Charles Street; and walking up that you come by degrees, with ever-increasing pleasurable surprise, on the "best bits," as they say. And over the whole place hangs, for the promenader filled with European traditions, used to finding in the city he visits the things he visits it for salient, the terrible tragedy of Poe. Baltimore—Baltimore—how often have we thought of that, the last station of his martyrdom?

But Baltimore, the distressing, irritating little place, seems to make a point of showing that it would never be so ill-mannered as to reveal—or rather, that it is not in the least conscious of—the fact that the bones of a great genius lie within the city. That might put a slur on the respectable families who have inhabited it from colonial times, from the times of Lord Baltimore himself. Nothing in the shop-windows, scanned eagerly by the pilgrim, gives a sign that within these precincts are the bones of a man who has influenced the literatures of the world. And he thinks of Edinburgh and Sir Walter Scott, or he thinks of Frankfurt and Goethe, and a mild wonder rises in his mind about the mentality of the people of Baltimore. Perhaps, however, there will be something further on.

Further on, the evening has fallen and the lamps are lighted. In the square, near the somewhat impressive Washington Monument, one perceives by the dim light a statue. Can it by chance be a statue of Poe? You see, one has fallen in love with Baltimore; one expects all sorts of wonderful things from it. One has been so captivated after coming from New York by the "let up on the money hunt"—a condition that sheds a dignity which a power to abide in your own house, not wanting anything from anybody, confers. All adds to the bewitching captivation: the slow, darky postman collecting his last mail in his little slow-moving cart; the sight in the distance of the coffin carried through the deserted streets. Is the already so charming Baltimore going to have the added charm of intelligence? Is it going to have a statue of Poe?

Alas, no! The statue one has sighted is of some worthy person all the world has forgotten—all the world, save Baltimore. After all, you will say—Baltimore people might possibly say—it will be a long time before a statue of Baudelaire is set up in Paris. Yes; but many geniuses for many centuries have lived and died in Paris; Poe is the only man of genius we have ever heard of who has died in Baltimore.

But if Baltimore pays no attention to Poe, it must be said that Poe paid little attention to Baltimore, a city where he sometime sojourned and where he met Kennedy, his only true friend. Poe, in fact, paid little attention to any American city, his chief preoccupation with them being what chance they offered for journalism and magazine writing. It is remarkable that in his writings there is never a word of grumbling at his surroundings, which must have been often so ugly and drear. Here, if anywhere, we have a case of absolute self-absorption, an unrivalled power of living in a vision. Poe probably figured the various cities of his pilgrimage by the people he liked or hated in them—not by any distinct impression of streets and squares. Nowhere does he mention any special feature in any one of them, and nowhere does he express any opinion about them as places of residence. Think of Baudelaire and his furies against Belgium!

But Poe, on the other hand, finding he could not escape from America, must have made up his mind to ignore it, and proceeded to create for himself a fantastic world in which he lived. From Poe's poetry no man could tell where he lived: there is no Rêve Parisien.

About his tomb in Baltimore, in the graveyard of the old decayed church, which must soon be pulled down, a high wall is raised. Except at the hours of service, the gates leading into the neglected graveyard are locked. Poe was buried in the poorest part; some years after, the piety of friends created an ugly, unimpressive tomb, which shows through the railings to the passers in the street. On a sunshiny day the birds drift over and find it a resting-place, and the butterflies play hide-and-seek. The lounging, Southern men in straw hats, the nigger washerwomen, the street-cars, all pass by with never a look. And Poe lies there, as detached, as isolated from the American city as he was in his life.

A few years ago somebody made an appeal to the city authorities that the wall of the churchyard by Poe's tomb might be thrown down, so that passers in the street might see more plainly where the genius lay buried. But the city authorities refused.

No, there will be no celebration of the Poe centenary in Baltimore, Maryland: "that's a cinch," as they say "out there."

GEORGE MEREDITH

LET us premise, at the outset of this essay, that we are inclined to demur of late years when we find critic after critic taking upon himself gratuitously the task of elucidating the "philosophy" of this, that, or the other novelist. "The elemental laughter of the true Comic Spirit" may vibrate again and again through Mr. Meredith's writings—doubtless it does—we shall have more to say regarding that point later on; Mr. Hardy may shadow his stories with the upas tree of cynicism; views may vary as infinitely as the angles contained in the circle; but we prefer to consider those writers of fiction who have worthily gained the laurels of fame as leaders of literature, in its best sense, rather than as exponents of any particular creed or outlook. We are well aware, while taking up this position, that in more than one of Mr. Meredith's books the "Philosopher" plays the part of an invisible, wise, and humorous commentator on the behaviour of the characters; that in "Sandra Belloni" the author declares in parenthesis "I have all the difficulty in the world to keep him back and let me pursue my course," and that in the same enthralling volume there is a whole chapter "In which the Philosopher has a Short Spell." But to philosophise wittily, even to the extent of allowing yourself an impersonated wiseacre in the background who shall fling in his trenchant remarks from time to time, is by no means the same thing as expounding a belief or forcing into the reader's unwilling hand a lesson-sheet for his embarrassment. This "garrulous, super-subtle Philosopher" (on another page he is "outrageous") . . . "maintains that a story should not always flow, or, at least, not to a given measure." He pretends to interrupt the movement, like some broad-shouldered policeman with arm extended, but in reality he is assisting matters, uniting little threads of motive, keeping clear the ways; having had his say, he steps back and lets the traffic pass on. It is a device as delightful as it is happily-chosen, and none but Mr. Meredith could use it with such fitness, or with such a twinkle in his eye. The occupation of pointing elaborate morals may be safely relegated to the pens of those who compose sermons or books with a definite purpose.

Omitting these latter people, who occasionally cross the dividing line by embodying some pet idea in the guise of fiction, it is to be supposed that a man writes a novel primarily because he has a story to tell. The methods of telling a story, again, are numberless; between the cobblestones and ruts of Mr. Kipling's uneven roads, where the reader is sometimes bumped into acquiescence, and the shining tessellated pavement of language over which Mr. Henry James's characters softly move, there are gradations for which the attempt at clear definition would be useless, but which, at the same time, present to the observant student distinct impressions of the force behind the pen in a way which perhaps no other art can excel.

It has been said repeatedly that the appreciation of Mr. Meredith's work is an acquired taste; and there is some truth in the remark. It is a poor compliment to a writer if he does not encourage thought; and, reversing the medal, it is not altogether creditable if his sentences are granitic, so that the shapely keystone of meaning has to be chipped out by desperate, indefatigable hammer-blows of attention from the reader's brain. We can well imagine a neophyte who had departed from some library with a copy of "The Egoist" under his arm settling down for a lazy hour by the fire, becoming alarmed at that extraordinary opening chapter, and, after giving up in despair, informing his friends that he "couldn't get on with Meredith." Lazy hours, however, are of no use for beginners—for whom Mr. Meredith has small consideration; they must struggle through, climb the pallisade or twist between the fences, when, thus striving, sure will be their reward.

The book just mentioned is thought by many to be Mr. Meredith's finest. We should be disposed to bracket with it "Diana of the Crossways" for sheer splendour of characterisation and intensity of human detail. If Sir Willoughby Patterne is a superb delineation of a selfish man, Diana Warwick, in her exuberance, her brilliant, imperious beauty, her nervous quest for the joy of life, is one of the perfectly portrayed women of English romance:

She was the very radiant Diana of her earliest opening day, both in look and speech, a queenly comrade, and a spirit leaping and shining like a mountain water. She did not seduce, she ravished. The judgment was taken captive and flowed with her. . . . None else on earth so sweetly laughed, none so spontaneously, victoriously provoked the healthful openness. Her delicious chatter, and her museful sparkle in listening, equally quickened every sense of life.

Sir Lukin Dunstane, the husband of her dearest friend, lost his head to her, if not his heart, poor fellow; we will quote a part of the scene in chapter iv., where she is taken utterly by surprise:

She told him not to think it necessary to pay her compliments. "And here, of all places!" They were in the heart of the woods. She found her hand seized—her waist. Even then, so impossible is it to conceive the unimaginable, even when the apparition of it smites us, she expected some protesting absurdity, or that he had seen something in her path. What did she hear? And from her friend's husband!

If stricken idiotic, he was a gentleman; the tigress she had detected in her composition did not require to be called forth; half a dozen words, direct, sharp as fangs and teeth, with the eyes burning over them, sufficed for the work of defence—"The man who swore loyalty to Emma!" Her reproachful repulsion of eyes was unmistakable, withering; as masterful as a superior force on his muscles. What thing had he been taking her for? She asked it within; and he of himself, in a reflective gasp. Those eyes of hers appeared as in a cloud, with the wrath above; she had the look of a goddess in anger. He stammered, pleaded across her flying shoulder. Oh! horrible, loathsome, pitiable to hear. . . . "A momentary aberration . . . her beauty . . . he deserved to be shot! . . . could not help admiring . . . quite lost his head . . . on his honour! never again!"

Once in the roadway, and Copsley visible, she checked her arrowy pace for breath, and almost commiserated the dejected wretch in her thankfulness to him for silence. Nothing exonerated him, but at least he had the grace not to beg secrecy. That would have been an intolerable whine of a poltroon, adding to her humiliation. He abstained; he stood at her mercy without appealing.

One would like to read at Mr. Meredith's hand of an encounter between Sir Willoughby Patterne and Diana!

The Hon. Percy Dacier, with whom, but for the merest hair's breadth of a chance, she would have run away from her deadening incubus of a husband, is a wonderfully faithful picture of a young politician, torn between his passion and his duty. Into this story, too, comes Redworth, the placid, tenacious Englishman whose heart is as a smouldering fire, whose love for Diana never falters, is never discouraged, but wins in the end as it mightily deserves to do. The book abounds in smaller but no less apt portraits, such as Mrs. Cramborne Wathin, the "lady of incisive features bound in stale parchment. Complexion she had none, but she had spotlessness of skin, and sons and daughters just resembling her, like cheaper editions of a precious quarto of a perished type."

The snap of sharp metaphor runs through Mr. Meredith's books like a rifle-volley, to the occasional bewilderment of the reader who, eager to get on with the story, is also anxious not to miss the flashes from the range, the sparkling thoughts, the running commentary on life's comedy which form so integral a part of the work. Hardly a single one but is felicitous and telling: "A mind apparently as little capable of being seated as a bladder filled with gas"; "Those famous dogs to which the navy has ever been going"; "London . . . the head of the British giant"; "Insomnia . . . is the fountain of the infinite ocean whereon the exceedingly sensitive soul is tumbled everlastingly, with the diversion of hot pincers to appease its appetite for change"; "Let her life be torn and streaming like the flag of battle, it must be forward to the end"; "They were the living eyes of a brilliant unembarrassed lady; shields flinging light rather than well-depths inviting it."

It is, however, in his famous scenes between young lovers that Mr Meredith touches the perfection of purity and passion. He has that peculiar, exultant power of sublimating the earthly desires, of pruning away the dross of fleshly motives, and presenting, sincere and luminous, the faultless golden flower of youth and love. No author has ever suffused his lovescenes with such a clear, virginal atmosphere—an atmosphere which the reader seems to breathe more sweetly as he goes on; it is expressed better than prose can avail in a stanza from one of the author's own poems:

All the girls are out with their baskets for the primrose;
Up lanes, woods through, they troop in joyful bands.
My sweet leads; she knows not why, but now she loiters,
Eyes the bent anemones, and hangs her hands.
Such a look will tell that the violets are peeping,
Coming the rose; and unaware a cry
Springs in her bosom for odours and for colour,
Covert and the nightingale; she knows not why.

Who has not thrilled at the exquisite, shy courtship of Richard and Lucy, in "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel"? For a portion of it we may spare a little space:

Away with Systems! Away with a corrupt World! Let us breathe the air of the Enchanted Island. . . . The sun is coming down to earth, and the fields and the waters shout to him golden shouts. He comes, and his heralds run before him, and touch the leaves of oaks and planes and beeches lucid green, and the pine-stems redder gold; leaving brightest footprints upon thickly-wooded banks, where the foxglove's last upper bells incline, and bramble-shoots wander amid moist rich herbage. The plumes of the woodland are alight; and beyond them, over the open, 'tis a race with the long-thrown shadows; a race across the heaths and up the hills, till, at the farthest bourne of mounted eastern cloud, the heralds of the sun lay rosy fingers and rest. . . . Here, secluded from vexed shores, the prince and princess of the island meet: here like darkling nightingales they sit, and into eyes and ears and hands pour endless ever-fresh treasure of their souls.

Roll on, grinding wheels of the world; cries of ships going down in a calm, groans of a System which will not know its rightful hour of exultation, complain to the universe. You are not heard here.

He calls her by her name, Lucy; and she, blushing at her great boldness, has called him by his, Richard. Those two names are the keynotes of the wonderful harmonies the angels sing aloft.

"Lucy! my beloved!"

"O, Richard."

Out in the world there, on the skirts of the woodland, a sheep-boy pipes to meditative eve on a penny whistle.

Love's musical instrument is as old, and as poor; it has but two stops; and yet, you see, the cunning musician does thus much with it!

Other speech have they little; light foam playing on the waves of feeling.

* * * * *

Pipe no more, Love, for a time! Pipe as you will you cannot express their first kiss; nothing of its sweetness, and of the sacredness of it nothing. St. Cecilia up aloft, before the silver organ-pipes of Paradise, pressing fingers upon all the notes of which Love is but one, from her you may hear it. . . . So Love is silent. The woods are still. There is heard but the night-jar spinning on the pine-branch, circled by moonlight.

Equally unforgettable are other scenes from the same volume, also the friendship of Evan and Rose in "Evan Harrington," and the "swimming" chapter in "Lord Ormont"; we cannot omit, either, the altogether charming chapter in "Sandra Belloni," entitled "By Wilming Weir," although the end of that love-making was spoiled by the unspeakable Wilfrid Pole. "He could pledge himself to eternity, but shrank from being bound to eleven o'clock on the morrow morning." He plays a very adequate second fiddle in selfishness to Sir Willoughby, and is Mr. Meredith's best sketch of a flirt; "it is a bad business," he remarks, "when the double-man goes about kneeling at the feet of more than one lady."

Of the multitude of other characters which spring to the mind, of Roy Richmond, the adventurer, the inimitable Dr. Middleton, the boy Crossjay, Emilia and her song, and of other great achievements, we must not stay to write; but it is hardly possible to omit mention of one or two of the amusing rustics of the novels. Andrew Hedger, "entranced and profoundly reverent, observing the dissection of a pig" just when Redworth was burning with anxiety to find Diana, will be remembered evermore for his one outburst:

Redworth jogged his arm, and the shake was ineffective until it grew in force.

"I've no time to lose; have they told you the way?" He slowly withdrew his intent fond gaze from the fair outstretched white carcase, and with drooping eyelids, he said: "Ah could eat hog a solid hower!"

Master Gammon, in the throes of supper, is another bucolic triumph; those who have read "Rhoda Fleming" will recollect his unconcern when confronted by the poser "fifty-two times twenty-one":

"Well . . . how much is that, Mas' Gammon?" the farmer asked in a bellow.

Master Gammon was laboriously and steadily engaged in tightening himself with dumpling. He relaxed his exertions sufficiently to take this new burden on his brain, and immediately cast it off.

"Ah never thinks when I feeds. Ah was al'ays a bad hand at counts. Gi'es it up."

The recurrent difficulty of which so many beginners complain occurs chiefly in the "asides" which the author frequently permits himself. He staggers the hasty reader with such a wealth of welded metaphor, such a tremendous facility in idea and concentration in expression, that to take it all in, with the ramifications of suggested meanings, is beyond one's immediate power; the eye has travelled too fast for the mind; a kind of mental gasp and blink sends the student back over the paragraph for another effort at its resolution. In support of this we shall take a disquisition on Wit and Beauty from the first pages of "Diana":

When a nation has acknowledged that it is as yet but in the fisticuff stage of the art of condensing our purest sense to golden sentences, a reader appreciation will be extended to the gift, which is to strike not the dazzled eyes, the unanticipating nose, the ribs, the sides, and stun us, twirl us, hoodwink, mystify, tickle and twitch, by dexterities of lingual sparring and shuffling, but to strike roots in the mind, the Hesperides of good things.

We shall then set a price on the "unusual combination." A witty woman is a treasure; a witty beauty is a power. Has she actual beauty, actual wit?—not simply a tidal material beauty that passes current any pretty flippancy or staggering pretentiousness? Grant the combination, she will appear a veritable queen of her period, fit for homage; at least meriting a disposition to believe the best of her, in the teeth of foul rumour; because the well of true wit is truth itself, the gathering of the precious drops of right reason, wisdom's lightning; and no soul possessing and dispensing it can justly be a target for the world, however well armed the world confronting her. Our temporary world, that Old Credulity and stone-hurling urchin in one, supposes it possible for a woman to be mentally active up to the point of spiritual clarity and also fleshly vile; a guide to life and a biter at the fruit of death; both open mind and hypocrite. It has not yet been taught to appreciate a quality certifying to sound citizenship as authoritatively as acres of land in fee simple, or coffers of bonds, shares and stocks, and a more imperishable guarantee. . . .

Most people would have to read that passage at least twice to learn its truth and delve for its greatness; and, on the whole, we are glad that not often in the middle of a story does Mr. Meredith let himself go at such length; it is generally by way of introduction that we are lectured somewhat abstrusely, though never uselessly.

Taking a survey of the novels in their entirety, their tendency is clearly to the side of comedy rather than tragedy; but they betray the vantage of one who, like Balzac, from his eyrie of observation, "the mind hovering above congregated men and women," could discern how nearly related are the sources of laughter and tears. Through book after book run the fire and fancy that search out the secret places of the lover's soul, trying him whether he be fine gold or base metal. Volcanic impatience and indignation against the idler, the dissembler, the egoist, the trifler, break out again and again in strong, ironic passages which often seem informed with the spirit of Carlyle; it is as though when a character becomes particularly despicable the author can no longer restrain his feelings, but has to take him aside and tell him—and us—what he thinks of him before the story can proceed. Immeasurable tenderness and sympathy for the woman, gentlest, most loyal comprehension of, and harmony with, the rosy dreams and desires of youth, pitiless scorn for the unworthy lover; these are some of the emotions which the student of Mr. Meredith's books comes at length to feel contagious, so that he is likely to rise from their perusal a better man with a broader mind. A certain scarcely definable quality pervades them which sets them above and apart from those of any other novelist of the nineteenth century; a nobility, a great detachment from all grossness of thought, all shameful allures; a fineness of motive, a serene, indulgent laughter for the foibles of poor, groping humanity; all these things mingle as the prismatic rays to form one decided hue. And that combination, we must admit, if we take it metaphorically, to be white. Not a shadow, not the filmiest penumbra of impurity invades any one of these volumes even when the author faces the most unpromising situation; and, in conclusion, we may confront the thousand writers of the present generation with this salient fact: that to succeed, using the word in its best sense, it is not necessary to be voluptuous in language or vicious in conception, neither is it requisite that love should be interpreted in physical terms alone. Love is not wholly of the body, nor dependent for the attraction of its portrayal on suggestions of shapely outline and charms half revealed, half mockingly hidden. "Our souls, if flame of a soul shall have come of the agony of flesh, are beyond the baser mischances; partaking of them, indeed, but sublimely." "The impure perishes, the inefficient languishes, the moderate comes to its autumn of decay"; and in the light of that saying from the works of the one whom we have endeavoured briefly to interpret, his own white flame will be steadily burning long after the fitful, luminous exhalations of the seasonal novelist have been dissipated by the winds of time.

REVIEWS

REMBRANDT AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES

The Great Masters of Dutch and Flemish Painting. By W. BODE. Translated by MARGARET L. CLARKE. (Duckworth and Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

DR. WILHELM BODE, the Director of the Royal Gallery at Berlin, is one of the few writers on art with a universal reputation as a connoisseur, who combine profound and accurate knowledge, fine taste, a comprehensive view, and a talent for illuminative criticism. The union of these qualities is rare enough. Happily, in the small band of writers which combine them, the names of two Englishmen, or more, occur at once to the mind. Dr. Bode's great work on Rembrandt is already famous among those whose interest in art is at all serious, but Rembrandt is revered, or has to be accepted as a colossus, by the vaguer public who have a sincere though general liking for pictures. Nevertheless, to a large number even of devotees of the Dutch school, Rembrandt does not actually cast much light on the class of Dutch pictures which appeal to them; while those who are sensitive to personality, but are not entirely imbued in Gothicism, limit their admiration to Rembrandt, and are disinclined to extend it to the school which is instinct with his influence, though he did not actually found any school. To these latter readers Dr. Bode's present volume will be of immense service in completing the circle of their sympathies. No one has shown more clearly how the influence of Rembrandt's unique mastery over light radiates as from its focus through the art of his century. Indeed, like most great men, he illustrates his predecessors also, for in him is focussed the power which they sought with dim consciousness. Nor must Dr. Bode's well-known skill in ascription frighten readers unattracted by that rather uncertain science. His present book has a much wider appeal, and though it contains much of great technical value, it is of a kind which is historically interesting. He increases our confidence when he notes with proper satisfaction that his own conclusions, based on intrinsic evidence, have been proved positively by documents discovered since. Of this there are several instances, notably, in the case of the Ter Borch family. Again, there is great historical interest in the transference of a vast number of important works from the name of Rubens to Anton van Dyck, also approved by documentary evidence. But Dr. Bode's clear exposition of the hand of Van Dyck evident in the pictures themselves—when Dr. Bode points it out—is still more important as an indication of the different genius of those two painters. He compares them and unfolds the characteristics of both by his masterly criticism. It is this faculty which makes his book so valuable, to those who are willing to lower their eyes for a little from the contemplation of more ideal beauty, to the wide horizon and spacious flats of Dutch painting.

Among many books on art of slight and passing import, it would be an attractive task to follow strictly the arrangement of Dr. Bode's book, by analysis, but this is impracticable here. The arrangement could not have been better for Dr. Bode's purpose. In his first chapter he writes enthusiastically on the genius of Rembrandt, distinguishing the elements which he derived from existing Dutch and Flemish art, from those which were inherent in his own personality. He is thus able to identify the Rembrandtesque elements as they appear developed or modified in Rembrandt's contemporaries, as the individual genius of each painter required, and thus gives unity to his view of each of the great masters of the Dutch school at its climax. If the form of Dr. Bode's panegyric of Rembrandt requires criticism, it is that his enthusiasm leads him to make too comprehensive statements, which his critical sense forces him to nibble down later to their just proportion. He thus reaches his final presentment successfully, but otherwise similarly to many modern painters in their method of painting. Less wise than Rembrandt's contemporaries, they try to tread step by step, in footsteps beyond their stride. Unequal to him in the draughtmanship, which his paintings often conceal, but his drawings show that he possessed, they try to mould their figures gradually out of their backgrounds, by timidly extending the latter, until sufficient contour appears to satisfy eyes insufficiently trained by the practice of line drawing. They forget that only one of Rembrandt's pupils, Maes, succeeded in carrying out his methods for a short time, and quickly deteriorated. The rest fell into feeble mannerism. Rembrandt's medium was, as it were, malleable light, and his great Dutch contemporaries, such as Seger, Terburgh, Ruisdael, and Vermeer, attained each his own eminence by developing, as their own, single elements of his material.

Dr. Bode next devotes a chapter to Franz Hals, both because he fell under Rembrandt's influence, and because he regards him as having expressed his country most decidedly and accurately by portraiture, just as Jan van Goyen did in the actual presentment of its face, in his landscapes. How admirably true this is, and how exactly just to Van Goyen! Nor could there be a surer key to Hals's peculiar merit than his "gift of establishing a lively connection between the person represented and a supposed third person." Passing to what may be regarded the main object of the book, Dr. Bode classes the most notable Dutch painters according to the subjects which occupied them most, or best define their genius: genre, landscape, and still life. In a preface to each group he briefly sketches the state in which the painters found their peculiar branch of the art. His sketch of the rise of genre painting is particularly conducive to a just appreciation of the Dutch school, of which it is so characteristic. Whether genre arose in Holland because the Dutch were freer than the Italians or no, it was certainly of Dutch origin, and its seventeenth century development within doors was natural in a bad climate, where much less intimate life is passed in the open air than in the south. Pieter Breughel, the elder, whom Dr. Bode takes as the example of the earlier styles, clearly points the differences between it and that of Rembrandt and his contemporaries. Of course, no Dutch painters of as early as the seventeenth century actually painted his pictures out of doors, but Breughel's are mostly out-of-door scenes, skirmishes, massacres, fairs, tavern-scenes, in which the populace took part; in fact, like the first national Dutch landscapes, genre was at first a frankly plebeian form of art, intended to please the populace, and sold for small sums. The genre pictures of the seventeenth century, on the contrary, become more or less interior scenes, aristocratic in feeling. The figures cease to be types of the million, and become highly characterised individuals. It is in dealing with the separate painters of this and the next class, landscapes, that Dr. Bode is so successful in giving readers unskilled in the Dutch school simple clues whereby to recognise or remember the individuality of each artist. Vermeer, of Delft, is indeed the "antipodes of Maes, instead of concentrating light as Rembrandt and Maes, his pupil, did, Vermeer transfuses his subject, as it were, with a clear flood. In place of their roughness of surface, his is smooth, and lustrous as enamel, only less so than Terburgh's. Vermeer's genre pictures are quiet and sedate, like Pieter de Hooch's and Metzu's, without Maes's element of pathos and without Hooch's strong colour, or the grace and stately elegance of Metzu's incidents. Dr. Bode's estimate of Vermeer is particularly interesting on account of the rarity of his works and the recent discovery of their masterly qualities. Dr. Bode is well qualified to judge, and he is doubtless right when he claims that Vermeer's unique masterpiece, the view of Delft, which has not long been hanging in the Hague gallery, has already strongly influenced Dutch landscape painting. This is the more remarkable, since Vermeer's time seems to have been almost entirely devoted to genre. Terburgh, again, is naturally highly esteemed by Dr. Bode, who points out that, in his perfect drawing and in his vigorous pictorial talent, he surpasses all other Dutch painters. No less sympathetic for his peculiar merits is Dr. Bode's estimate of versatile and erratic geniuses, such as Jan Steen and Adriaen Brauer. Like Franz Hals, Steen appeals directly to "unsophisticated eyes" by his humour, which in Steen's case has cast off all its quiet dignity, and broadens, as it did with Hogarth, until it slips into caricature. It is also noticeable that in all Steen's scenes of this order, there is no violence, and that he loves to depict children with charming playfulness. Adriaen Brauer, though a Fleming by birth, may be noticed here, since he has much in common with Steen. Dr. Bode dwells interestingly on Brauer's irregular and fascinating career, on which a little uncertain light has recently been cast by documentary evidence carefully weighed by Dr. Bode. It must be sufficient to repeat one note of general interest which he makes concerning Brauer, that, though he was a man of conspicuous artistic temperament, and evidently of much personal charm, no female figure offering any sign of attraction appears in any of his numerous pictures.

Landscape painting, though the more dignified and excellent branch of Dutch art, has been neglected here, because the merits of the great Dutch landscape painters, such as Jacob van Ruisdael, are better appreciated by those for whom this notice is particularly intended. Dr. Bode's brief general view of landscape painting is even more suggestive than his remarks on genre, but is more difficult to deal with briefly. One remark must be noticed, if its meaning be somewhat over-stretched. When Dr. Bode suggests it, it is clear that a strong element in all Dutch art, and in the real appreciation of it, which the Dutch man has, is the delight in the painted image of his own possessions: his land freed from the Spaniards, his ships, himself and his family in holiday or biblical attire, his house, his books, his silver-plate, his glass, his wine, his fruit and his fish, even his own mortality, recalled by the "Vanitas." This element makes Dutch art more intensely natural perhaps than any other, but it narrows its spiritual appeal. That is widest, in Dutch art, when it represents inanimate nature, after Rembrandt, wider and stronger in Hercules Segers, perhaps, than in any other Dutch master. Dr. Bode says even more: "To feel the soul of Nature is given to few artists, as Hercules Segers, and above all to Rembrandt. They describe to us her imposing power and grandeur, Jacob Ruysdael her sublime equanimity, with which he compels our submission and quiet admiration." In another place, comparing Ruysdael with Hobbema, whose "drawing and technical treatment," he judges, "are as skilful, just as true and individual, lighter, richer and more piquant," who created "masterpieces of such beauty that even Ruysdael has little to compare with them"; yet Dr. Bode pronounces Ruysdael "the greatest landscapist of all time." Long study of Dutch art as profound as Dr. Bode's might lead us to the same conclusion, but not yet. To Jan van Goyen, tender, pale, and diaphanous, so seemingly facile because he was really so faithfully dependent on Nature; to Aelbert Cuyp, flooding his grand landscapes with golden light, while all other Dutch painters produce the charm of sunlight by contrast; to Paul Potter, instilling his own patient phlegm into his domestic animals in their delicately modelled hide; to the technical mastery of Adriaen Van de Velde, equalling Hobbema and even touching the incomparable Ruysdael, speaking direct to the soul with his tender melancholy: to all these space is left only to allude. Scarcely that is left even to name the still-life painters, except Willem Kalf, recently recalled from oblivion, so brilliant in his colouring, so important for his representation of the great period of the Dutch goldsmiths' work. It is Dr. Bode's fault if this notice is inordinately long, for the great Flemish masters, Rubens and Anton van Dyck, whose work he contrasts so vividly, must be omitted altogether, and the amazing catalogue of Van Dyck's works, executed for Rubens in three short years, 1816 to 1820, must be studied in Dr. Bode's own pages.

A PRIZE NOVEL

The Faith of his Fathers. By A. E. JACOMB. (Melrose, 6s.)

WHETHER the fashion of instituting novel-writing competitions, and offering a substantial money reward for the "best" work sent in, be conducive or not to the higher interests of literature, is a point worthy of some consideration. If the tales we hear are true regarding the vast number of manuscripts received by the promoters of these contests—the wonderful length to which they would reach were their pages placed end to end (say from here to next April 1st), their appalling total of words, and so on, the amount of heart-burning and disappointment caused to owners of "rejected addresses" must be truly pathetic—a view, however, not without its consolatory side, since in a great many cases that disappointment will deter the writers from further onslaughts on their day and generation.

In the first place, it must be remembered that the novel chosen has to pay. Kind publishing gentlemen are not in the habit of walking round the town with a far-away look in their eyes and a hundred or more golden guineas in a benevolently extended hand, for nothing; that same far-away look is preoccupied with the glint of more plentiful gold in the beyond. This in itself renders one sceptical as to whether the finest story has always been selected, since it is conceivable that perfection and popularity are but distantly related. On the other hand, the winning novel is fairly sure of a good sale, freely and judiciously advertised as it is bound to be, and this fact, of course, somewhat equalises matters as between the "smartest" book and the "best" book. It is a case in which, in the nature of things, there must often be a reflection of the trouble which pervades every business, from the highest to the lowest—the conflict between integrity and the commercial spirit.

It is a pleasure to find that conflict reduced to an insignificant quantity with regard to the novel before us. "The Faith of his Fathers" has won a prize of two hundred and fifty guineas offered in a recent "competition," and has, we think, won it worthily. For there is in it no trace of the straining after effect, the meaningless, ornate paragraph, the extravagantly "clever" dialogue, and other inartistic superfluities which are indications of the passion for ephemeral distinction; it proves, on the contrary, to be rather simply written, tense, straightforward, and grimly earnest. The author has not gone far afield for his scene; he has taken one of the numerous possibilities of tragedy which life in a severely Methodist household in a provincial town can hold—the tacit, inevitable war between the children, as they grow up, and the parents for whom the groove of custom has worn too deeply for deviation. From these materials, by no means new, he has woven a strong and moving story, with scarcely a digression. Chiefly it concerns the son of the house, Stephen Atkinson, who in an hour of lapse from the strict surroundings of home gets into trouble with a barmaid at a riverside inn. His father, hearing of it through a tale-bearing elder of the meeting-house, forces him to marry the girl; and from that stern interview when the older man, rebelling all the time against the admission of such a woman into the family, compels himself to toe the line of his implacable belief, the gradual downfall of happiness begins. The senior Atkinson, with his Calvinistic inclinations, his intolerance of everybody who was not "saved," his pathetic endeavours to fathom the reason of his wife's alienation from him—she, sympathising with the younger folk, gradually found her husband less of a righteous hero—is the most striking character in the book. Stephen is weak, he is weak right through; he never knows when to put his foot down, and towards the end he becomes a jealous hanger-on of those who are better off than himself. His behaviour and his outlook are partly due to the reaction against the prudery of his up-bringing; but in his sister that reaction assumes a different form; she remains loyal, in spite of her father's thunderous denunciations, to her lover, a man "outside the fold," and a fine fellow. Thus the tragic element works itself out from mere discord to open rebellion. We could wish that Mr. Jacomb had spared us the blow which Stephen deals his wife in a moment of passion, and which kills her and sends him to prison; it is a little too melodramatic after the steady, forcible manner of the previous chapters. Far more convincing and true than this is the picture of the father, estranged from his children, with the wife who was formerly his helpmate turned against him and hopelessly wrecked in body and spirit by the stress of the two factions. We give the concluding words of the book, where Mary Wilson, Stephen's "might-have-been," is visiting Mr. Atkinson:

She said with a sudden impulse, "I hate to see you here, like this!" She looked round the room—the one sitting-room of the cottage, with its remnants of the old, substantial furniture in it, looking like the wreckage of a fine ship cast away on barrenness.

"I'm content. Have patience and courage for me as well as for yourself, my child. We both have need of them."

"No, not you. You're strong!"

"Not always. Sometimes the devil tempts me, but not for long, thank God!"

"Tempts you? To what?"

"To regret that I followed the truth when the world called it folly. But that was at first, in the great darkness after Stephen was condemned, and Fanny was struck down."

"And now, are you glad?"

"I would do it again."

"Even if you knew—" She paused.

"Yes, if I knew what would come after, for what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? I've kept mine alive."

"But others suffered," said Mary, almost in spite of herself, as she looked back on the past.

"It was the Lord's will," he answered. . . .

So she left him, for it was getting late. . . . At the door she looked back. Mr. Atkinson had taken a Bible from the shelf and was opening it. He had drawn a chair close to his wife, for he had always a hope that some day some words would reach the woman he loved: the woman whose soul still lingered in that maimed body.

As Mary waited by the door the eyes of the paralytic met hers, and they seemed to hold the mockery of the universe, malignant, hopeless, impotent, as it listens to the measured cadences of the old faiths.

The author allows himself very few comments of any length upon the issues raised in the course of events; he has chosen merely to tell the story, leaving his readers to form their own opinions. Those opinions may vary, but there is no question that he has succeeded in a vivid depiction of a corner of life full of human passion; the passionate adherence to a narrow creed, and the equally passionate rebellion against it, form his main theme. The book is not epoch-making, nor does it merit any flights of laudatory rhetoric; but it is exceptional, and well above the ordinary level. We have been pleased to observe while reading it many of those niceties of composition which betray the careful handling of language. Opinions may differ as to the qualifications of the three judges to recognise the best work, but perhaps in this instance the proverb that there is safety in numbers has been justified. We can fairly congratulate them upon their choice, and the author upon his excellent first book.

COUNTRY LIFE

The Two Goodwins. By R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.
(Milne, 6s.)

MR. MURRAY GILCHRIST'S latest story reminds us of one of those pale, comprehensive, charming pictures of rural life which are occasionally found adorning odd corners of old-fashioned houses: here and there a pair of lovers are pleading or promenading; under this tree is a child at play, under that tree a rustic jig is in full swing; at the porch of the creeped village hostel sit the ancients, quaffing their ale, or, hands folded on stick, watching the proceedings. Of novels whose atmosphere is the tainted one of the city we have plenty, and for a fine, breezy, wholesome country tale there is always a welcome from sensible readers; this book they will thoroughly enjoy, we feel sure. It abounds in the exhilaration of outdoor affairs, dealing as it does with events in a village of the lovely Peak district; and yet the author has expressed very surely and beautifully the motives of human action which lie tangled deep below the surface of his scenes. He makes us think of what Mr. Thomas Hardy might do for "Wessex" were he cheerful and less concerned with the under-world of love.

The "Two Goodwins" of the title are Charlotte, who is introduced in the first chapter as a little girl just off to school, seven years old, and William, her half-brother, a boy who is anything but prepossessing, but who steadily improves as he goes on, finally evolving into quite a good fellow. Charlotte's love affair is very lightly and delicately shown; hardly emphasised enough, perhaps, for the perfect balance of the story, considering that she is the principal character; but this slight complaint is only one we shall make. Mr. Gilchrist has the faculty of conveying a clear impression of even his supernumeraries, if we may so term them, in a few neat lines; this brief sketch of Farmer Haslam, for example, is capital:

He was a tall and corpulent gaffer, with some resemblance to the Toby of the old jug. In profile his face was singularly handsome. Shown at the full 'twas like the moon at a happy Harvest Home. He was smoking, lustily enough, shag tobacco in a briar pipe, the good wife only permitting him the use of a clay churchwarden when they sat together before going bedward. He had always been a gallant, greatly admired by women; but had never, even in thought, given his wife the least cause for jealousy. At sight of Charlotte he laid aside his pipe and caught her hand, then dropped into an armchair and pulled her to his knee, just as if she were a fondling of seven. The girl kissed him on the left cheek, a little above the beard line.

"Heigho, little Charlotte! Heigho! how the years do pass! Nay, now, wilt leave me? Proud young gipsy—too proud to sit on an old fellow's knee."

The story of William Goodwin, interwoven with that of Charlotte, is the strongest note in the book, and from it we will quote three short scenes which form a sequence. In the first, the young man is after the buxom girl whom afterwards he woos more honourably, and the lady's mother gives him his congé with a snap like a rifle-shot:

"Nay, lad, but I'm proud o' Sarah—prouder o' her nor o' any o' t'others." William emptied his glass and rose. "Then you'll not mind me coming to see her?" he said thickly. "I've never seen one I fancied so."

"You may come as often as you please, Mr. William, the offer the merrier. And if so be as she promises to be your wife—"

"My wife—egad! I like that!" he stuttered. "As if she'd have the chance."

Mrs. Govier stared for a moment, laughed shortly, then rose, and stood, tall and threatening, pointing to the door. Her face was livid, a sudden spasm of rage brought the foam to her lips. "To hell wi' you!" she said.

In the second, having discovered that he loves the girl and must have her, he discusses the matter with his old grandmother, upon whose good graces he is to a great extent dependent:

"'Tis the last time I'm a-going to ask you. William, will you give her up?"

"I won't, Gran," he said loudly. "I won't for all as anybody living could offer!" She left her chair and tremblingly rolled up the crochet-work. "So that's settled," she said. "There'll be no need for you to work. I'll settle two pounds a week on you. I thought to cut you off altogether; but I can't for shame. You've lost thirty odd thousand pound; to-morrow I make a fresh will. . . . Thirty odd thousand pound and this land—"

"You'll please yourself, Gran. I'm not going to give Sarah up."

She left William alone with his perturbed thoughts. As she went upstairs she said, "Eigh, love makes a man a fool!" As a very fond grandmother she was not able to understand that love may make a fool a man.

Lastly, having married Sarah secretly, though to his credit as a man, the news is broken to the relenting old lady at a country dance given in honour of a friend's wedding.

William took his grandmother's arm and tried to draw her forward. "Be good, Gran," he murmured, "be good. It's my wife—we married the day before I left you." Poor Grandmother Smithard was dazed for a few moments, then she let him lead her to Sarah's side. There she stood, gazing, unconscious of all watchers, and at last put her hands almost fiercely on the soft, white shoulders. Some of the folk half-fearing that the dame was about to administer a good shaking, but, instead, she gazed into the eyes that met hers frankly and not unkindly.

"Lass," she said, "I don't know how I could stand against you. You're my lad's mate, there's no gainsaying it!"

Someone shouted "Hurrah!" and although so few knew the meaning of the scene, the place rang loud with merry voices. Grandmother swayed a little. Sarah's arms went round her waist, and with William and Charlotte they passed back to the house. There she rested and listened to their story, but soon would go back to the threshing-barn, since—God ha' mercy!—she must see how they danced together.

This last chapter is a dainty little picture indeed, and could in no way be bettered. Throughout the whole story Mr. Gilchrist has a delicacy of touch which never degenerates into mere "prettiness," and we recommend the book with the certainty that the excellent style, no less than the pleasant theme, will give our readers the best of impressions.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Stormy Petrel. By L. T. MEADE. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

MRS. L. T. MEADE goes for the materials of her latest book to Ireland, and from the terribly sad happenings of the "Black Year"—the period of the potato famine—she has constructed a story the interest of which is not wholly dependent on the misery and starvation which form, as it were, the background. A good portion of it, in fact, is bright and full of liveliness, and by a slight wrenching of the screw of probability the author avoids finishing in the minor key. The "Stormy Petrel" of the tale is a man who had been wrecked on the Irish coast, rescued, the sole survivor, and treated kindly by Squire O'Hara and his neighbours. Returning to America, he makes a fresh fortune, and hearing of the dreaded "blight" that was attacking the potato-fields and unnerving the people in this corner of the island, he sends over his son to assist with money and brains the almost demented peasants. This son falls in love with Kathleen O'Hara, and the romance of these two forms the chief interest of the book. Into the details of the plot we need not enter; there are many characters, all neatly drawn, although Kathleen takes the centre of the picture undoubtedly. Mrs. Meade has been very successful with her; the brother Patrick, whose alliance with the rough instigators of bloodshed causes considerable anxiety, is not so convincing. The large circle of readers upon whose attention Mrs. Meade can always rely will find that she has given good measure, and that the quality of interest which she invariably manages to impart to her books remains, despite many verbal infelicities, at its usual high level.

One Immortality. By H. FIELDING HALL. (Macmillan, 6s.)

We have had occasion to praise Mr. Fielding Hall's work before now in these columns, and his new novel, if such we can term it, attains a high level in a style which he has previously used with good effect. The short, crisp sentences give a peculiar impression of strength, especially in the pages here and there which are devoted to descriptive matter. But as to story, there is very little of it; the book is to all intents and purposes a philosophical disquisition on the themes of love and marriage, and the characters introduced are mere figures through whose lips, as by ventriloquism, certain views are set forth. We hasten to add that there is nothing irrational or displeasing about these views. At the same time, with all due respect to the author, it must be admitted that they become a trifle prosy and boring, these worthy people of his who toss the ball of intellectual conversation to and fro so neatly. They meet at Venice, and by the time the steamer on which they depart has reached Bombay, the story is finished. A girl who seeks for the meaning of her existence, of life, of love, is drawn sympathetically to one of the other passengers, a young man who is also somewhat misty as to the reason of his being and his ultimate destiny; our readers can easily guess the natural conclusion of such a situation.

It is in the descriptive passages that we like the author best. One or two brief extracts will show his power:

One day they came on deck to find the ship was motionless. Her engines had broken down, and so she lay like some great wounded thing upon the sea. A light wind blew, and the little waves came racing up to see her, wondering what was this black and ugly thing that lay so still. . . . They raised their heads to look at her; they laughed, they splashed their spray upon her in derision. And then they danced away gaily joyfully, singing their ocean song, and glancing back in mockery over their lucent shoulders at the uncanny monster.

Above the northern horizon hung a peak suspended in the heavens. You could not see its base. The purple haze was folded over it and hid it; but in the clear sky above, the sharp rock-summit stood revealed in clearest outline. The golden sunlight fell upon it like a glory, and upon its shoulders fields of purest snow shone like a woman's skin gleaming through openings of her drapery.

The ship passed very slowly through the narrow water. Before her it stretched, a ghastly, greenish strip lit by her searchlight. The buoys that marked the deeper water swam suddenly into being when the light touched them, and disappeared behind her into the night. On either side there was a wave that followed the ship, washing against the banks with a dull murmur, and beyond the banks of the desert.

It seemed to stretch into illimitable distances, mysterious, wonderful in the dim light of a half moon. Strange noises came from it; a jackal barked with mournful cadence, a camel bubbled. And there were sounds born of the night alone, whispers and sighs that drifted up on the night wind. It seemed as if they were the desert's thoughts that passed, her dreams, her fancies, her remembrances. They were the ghosts of all the things that she had seen through all the ages.

Such choosing of words is excellent, and reminds us of some of the strikingly effective language in a previous book of Mr. Hall's, "The Soul of a People." Our readers who do not mind pleasant discursions on a well-worn theme, often very pertinent and stimulating to thought, may enjoy this novel; but those who anticipate a story will be, we fear, a little disappointed.

RUSTIC RELIGION

A DULL enough folk we seem in our remote East-country village—remote though but thirty miles from London—uninterested in ourselves and uninteresting to the ordinary town dweller, who limits his rare visits to us to Bank holidays and seasons when our surroundings of field and garden and hedge-row are green and gay, and recoils with horror at the idea of spending any length of time with us in our winter mud and darkness, and suspects not anything remarkable in us. Yet under the dull surface lies ore worth the seeking. We value it not ourselves. Our queer old-fashioned words and ways pass among ourselves without comment, and if our attention is drawn to them we are only bored, and even contemptuous of their mention. We think not and care not how ancient and curious many of them are, how they carry us back into the dim past, back, it may be, to pagan, pre-historic times. Trivial they may be, but dull they are not. Our words, many that we commonly use, words long passed out of use by the literary world, have a history of eight or more centuries, and an existence of how many centuries we know not: and many of our queer customs are as old.

Our religion, for instance, which is the special subject of these notes, what a strange mixture it is, compact, like the parish church, only with ignobler results, of the work of every period. Churchmanship, a small ingredient in a mixture of modern indifference, eighteenth-century torpor, primitive puritanism, medieval superstition and paganism. All of us who are not definitely Dissenters style ourselves Churchmen, though what churchmanship means we mostly neither have, nor want to have, the vaguest idea, though we never go to church, and even live openly godless and evil lives; and we resent any hint to the contrary. About a quarter of us go to church, some, of course, for genuine devotion, but many of superstition, of custom, for respectability's sake, or out of compliment to the parson. "Well, thank ye, sir, for comin' to see us," is a common type of remark; "p'raps one o' these times I'll put the pony in the cart and run down and hear ye." "M—m," says the parson, "you don't ever go to church nowadays." "Wh' yes, I was there tother day, and helped carry in the new organ." Any Sunday you may see the sorry sight of ringers stolidly slouching out of church just before the service, and of groups of men and lads assembled in their Sunday clothes at the church gate, and there abiding. One has known a church-cleaner who was seldom at church, except for funerals, which she attended regularly. "I'd go to church," says a woman, "only I have to clean the chapel." Strange reasoning as it seems, it is perhaps explained by the fact that, with us, churchmanship and Nonconformity are inextricably mixed by intermarriage, and that religion is a marketable thing. "I am not chapel-cleaner," she seems to mean, "because I prefer chapel, but if I clean the chapel I must go to chapel." Church people must deal with church tradesmen; else they get abuse. "You want me to support you," says the tradesman, "and I expect you to support me, though" (he might add) "I charge you more and give you a worse article than you can get elsewhere." The parson is even told, within a little, how much custom will retain the tradesman as a supporter.

In church we are decorous in outward appearance, but many of us never kneel. We crouch forward, as though the benches screened us from divine, as they do from human, observation. Many of us have no idea of the meaning of much of the service, and we do not want to understand. What we appreciate is the sound of the words. Explanation of the meaning is superfluous. The comparative accuracy of the Revised Version is almost impious. We are something like the Boer farmer who, his family Bible being in tatters, replied to the offer by a visitor of a new English Bible, "What do you mean? There's no Bible besides ours." We listen complacently to sermons, but the chief lesson we carry away is "that's meant for neighbour So-and-so." Our manners on Sunday are odd. We may be on quite good terms with the parson, and genial in our greetings, on week-days, but on Sunday many of us pretend not to see him, or pointedly ignore him. Why? We have often wondered. It is partly shyness. We are in company with our mates, and our politeness will not stand ridicule. Partly, perhaps, it is a survival of the Sunday mistrust of early conventicle days. Though we have in the week past sat and eaten and drunk in the parson's garden, or the night before have asked and been allowed to net the sparrows in the vicarage ivy, yet when we meet him on the Sunday we may be moved to cut him dead.

Our mothers are mostly careful to come to be church-ed, and to bring the children for baptism, many for proper reasons, but often of superstition. It is not correct to go abroad until the churching is performed. "When will you be able to give me my liberty?" is sometimes the form of application. The children must be baptised, else calamity lies in the future. The old nurses of the Gamp type, we believe, for this reason usually kept the mothers up to their duty. Confirmation is another matter. Apparently it lacks the charm with which the above-mentioned rites are credited. We are suspicious of it. It is too solemn and holy a rite. Many of us parents were not confirmed; or, if we were, we have put it and its obligations aside long ago. And to the young people the fear of ridicule is a strong and real deterrent. An unflinching religious parent, of course, values it, and makes a point of presenting his children. A strict pagan parent may insist upon it, for odd reasons. "G— says he will have 'em done," says a wife; "they was all vaccinated, and he likes to have all them things done." We have known a good parent, careful in his own religious practice, yield to the common prejudice when it came to the point of decision. "Father says he's goin' to have me made a Christian of," said a damsel of fifteen or so; but other counsels prevailed, and when the final word had to be spoken, it was, "Father says he shan't have me done over this time."

We attend weddings and funerals and harvest thanksgivings, but as spectacles mostly. There are women who will walk miles to any funeral, but otherwise never appear in church. "Well, are you going to your cousin's wedding?" was said to a woman. "I don't know; p'raps I shall go and have a look." With very few exceptions we take no part in the service, and we like to sit all through it, if we are allowed. We flock to harvest thanksgivings and shout the popular hymns. We feel it our duty to give thanks, but we think we have also an idea that we propitiate the Deity and score up a credit account for the next harvest; for many of us do not appear again at church for twelve months.

When the end comes, we die in peace, if the minister has "said a prayer over us" in peace, though our last act be deliberately to leave an aged husband's support unsecured, or to direct that we be buried as far from our dead wife as possible. "I beg and pray you," said a dying man, lately, "not to bury me with her. I couldn't rest. I should come back and ha'nt the very ground you tread on." Here surely is superstition of the aboriginal savage type. We do not know among us the humorous materialism of Mrs. Barnes in Adderley's "Behold the Days Come," who remarks, "Now I say religion's all very well, but it ought to be forgotten, and by-gones be by-gones when we're a-dying." We value religious ministrations at the last, but many of us value them chiefly as a charm.

We know of no local witches at present, but certainly their disturbing presence has been noted within recent

A Special Offer to Smokers

OUR JAMAICA CIGARS are equal in aroma and taste to those from Havane, whilst the cost is half that of the latter.

A sample box, containing 25 of the following brands of Cigars, will be sent post free to anyone filling in the coupon below and enclosing P.O., cheque or stamps for 10/6 to us:—

Flor ...	80/- per 100	Bouquet Fines ...	35/- per 100
Celestiales ...	65/- per 100	Caribas ...	33/- per 100
Favoritas ...	65/- per 100	Conchas Especiales ...	30/- per 100
Ideales ...	45/- per 100	Exquisitos ...	27/6 per 100
Perfectos ...	45/- per 100	Excelentos ...	27/6 per 100
Governor ...	42/- per 100	J. T. C. ...	25/- per 100
Reina Victoria ...	38/- per 100	Operas ...	22/6 per 100
Londres Imperiales ...	37/6 per 100	Young Ladies ...	20/- per 100

IMPORTED EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES:

The "Seymour" ...	6/6 per 100
Lord Rothschild, Gold Tipped ...	9/6 per 100

TURKISH CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 1 ...	6/6 per 100
-------------------	-------------

VIRGINIA CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 2 ...	5/6 per 100
-------------------	-------------

RUSSIAN, BRAZILIAN, AND LEAF-COVERED CIGARETTES...

... from 8/- per 100

TOBACCO MIXTURE:

Medium... 10/- per lb. Mild ... 12/- per lb.
--

JAMRACH & CO.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS
199 PICCADILLY, LONDON
Suppliers to the Nobility. Established 1871.

Please forward me, post paid,
for which I enclose
Name.....
Academy, Address.....

years. Thus at least we have advanced a step beyond the East Anglican marsh folk of fiction.

We are scrupulously neighbourly. We spare neither time nor toil nor our small means to help our sick and needy neighbours, mostly out of true kindness; but we are not forgetful of the fact, which we sometimes baldly state, "that there's no sayin' when we shall need it ourselves." And, if we are not called upon to help, we flock in and out of the house of sickness when death seems to be close at hand, and still more when death has come, like busy flies.

This is, of course, only one side of our rustic life. It may seem a pessimistic statement, but our purpose is only to present one side. There are plenty of decent, pleasant people amongst us, and much simple piety, and some devoted churchmanship. One's life is agreeable by association with many agreeable neighbours. But there is this other side, from which it seems that the coating of Christianity has worn off, and stark paganism shows through. We have already, alas, among our rustic folk, that miscreant who with jeers deters his women-folk from their religion: "You ain't so silly, I should think, as to believe the Bible and that." Enough, perhaps, has been said to show that our religion deserves observation and reflection. One wonders whether in our remote regions religion is increasing or lessening. Religious people are nowadays with us, as elsewhere, we suppose, more intelligently religious, but fewer. One would like to think that narrow and inert as we are, prejudiced, ignorant, yet satisfied, "independent," self-assertive, and touchy to the last degree, we are yet as a community after our fashion groping after God. May we hope that as an improving educational system works in the rustic mind, intelligent religion will grow too? We wish we could think so. But the evidence of towns points the other way.

CORRESPONDENCE

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I am not at all shaken in my opinion that Mr. Cook's views are extraordinary by the fact that he makes one letter do duty in four different journals, nor am I much impressed in their favour because their publication in the "Victoria Memorial Number of the Times" sent up the circulation of that gay and sparkling little journal to such an extent that it reached "the largest circulation in the world."

Mr. Cook need not worry about the part the nations are to play in the discovery of John Martin; suffice it that he, E. Wade Cook, has discovered him, and let him rest assured that he will be left to play with his new-found treasure entirely alone so far as discriminating people are concerned.

"Du sublime au ridicule il n'y a qu'un pas." Quite so, and when you "topple" from the sublime you usually achieve the ultra-ridiculous; but, in spite of Mr. Cook's assertion, Milton did not "topple" over. There is absolutely no reason at all why Milton should not make use of a park of artillery if Milton so willed, or any other.

"Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds."

Why not say the above line embraces a ridiculous anachronism because it describes events that took place prior to Tubal Cain? Our greatest artists do not care one jot for historical accuracy; their work is done in the lacunæ of time. It is the work of the hour which worries about historical accuracy—and dies—in its own length. If historical accuracy were the accepted criterion, we should have to put Alma Tadema above Rembrandt, remembering Pontius Pilate's turban, and purge our galleries of nearly all the Madonnas and Holy Families of the world's greatest geniuses. Has Mr. Cook ever seen William Orpen's "Samson and Delilah"? He will hardly deny its phenomenal genius (by the bye, genius nearly always is phenomenal), and yet the lamp on the table is undoubtedly from Goudge Street, one and tenpence-hapenny, and the table from Tottenham Court Road, adjoining, on the hire system. But "if the two young people really love each other, what does it matter?"

What is Mr. Cook's grudge against crinolines? Angels are just as good in crinolines as anything else, if you're going to commit the anachronism of clothing them at all. And though I have never been able to restrain a shudder at the thought of the French artist who painted a crucifixion with the central figure in a bowler hat, yet I do sincerely recognise the fact that the artist, from one point of view—and that an important one—is more likely to be right than I.

As for "the utter chaos of Tintoretto's 'Paradise,'" tut! tut! Mr. Cook should write for Punch. "Tintoret . . . works in the consciousness of supreme strength. . . . He knows precisely all that art can accomplish under given conditions; determines absolutely how much of what can be done, he will himself for the moment choose to do; and fulfils his purpose with as much ease as if, through his human body, were working the great forces of Nature."

"And that 'Paradise,' though it is the largest picture in the world, without any question, is also the thoughtfulness and most precious. . . . I have no hesitation in asserting this picture to be by far the most precious work of art of any kind whatsoever now existing in the world."

Now comes a perverted description of one of Martin's pictures, a description that gives one the idea of a rather drunken evening at "The White City," amplified from the reporter's notes by Miss Marie Corelli; but perhaps Mr. Martin is as much to blame for this as Mr. Cook. What a pity Mr. Cook was not at hand to write a puff or two when one of Martin's clap-trap performances was touting for public favour as a transparency in a Strand raree-show!

We must, however, remember that Mr. Cook "simply hates" great work, and yet, despite this, I should like him to re-read Charles Lamb's essay entitled "Barrenness of the Imaginative Faculty in the Productions of Modern Art," a large portion of which is taken up by censure of the "Feast of Belshazzar." He should read Chesneau, too, who found much of Martin's work "ugly, vulgar, tame."

What does Mr. Cook mean by the "misdirected energy of the Press" depreciating "modern art by millions of pounds in value"? It would seem to be an interesting process, "if philosophy could find it out." It seems to go so well with the description of the Royal Academy Exhibition given in a recent well-known pasquinade—namely, "Thousands of square yards of canvas all covered over with art."

CALBE PORTER.

January 26th, 1909.

I WOULD LIKE (IN "THE KING'S ENGLISH").

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Writers upon the King's English cannot fairly complain if any statement they make is pressed to the utmost. But for the irresistible temptation to do this, "A French Linguist" (in your issue of January 16th), instead of occupying a column and a half of your space in proving the obvious—namely, that I would like is in certain rare contexts English—might have been indulgent enough to refer our condemnation to the very common abuse, and almost only use, of the words, fully discussed and illustrated four pages later (pp. 141-2). It is true that our meaning should have been guarded by a neglectis negligendis in the preliminary remark on p. 137. No doubt it is possible, as your correspondent suggests, to imagine a person saying "I would (i.e., used to) like sweets when I was a boy"; but the extreme difficulty of imagining it (though more plausible examples could be constructed) is a measure of the rarity and negligibility of this idiom with the verb like. His other type ("I would like him if I could") is equally correct, and equally negligible. We ask "A French Linguist's" pardon for omitting the reservation; but we have considerable hopes that no one else has been deceived.

In an editorial note you invite "A French Linguist" to "take it from you that the book to which he refers ('The King's English') is not always a reliable guide." If he is one of your regular readers, he would probably take it with less surprise from anyone else. For, whereas the words can scarcely be interpreted as anything but a general disparagement, it is to be feared that he may have been seduced into buying so unreliable a book by passages like the following, one of which is from an editorial paragraph in your issue of May 19th, 1906, the other from Mr. A. L. Mayhew's review of the second edition in your columns six months later:—

"We may give some idea of how good and valuable a book it is, by stating that it has made us so nervous that we doubt the correctness of every sentence we have written."

"The book under consideration is an admirable monitor on a very difficult subject. It is the work of men who are thorough scholars, and who are endowed with excellent judgment—a book free from pedantry, and abounding in good, sound common sense. It is a thoroughly useful, practical book, and may be heartily recommended to every one who wishes to write good English."

THE AUTHORS OF "THE KING'S ENGLISH"
(Clarendon Press).

[Our correspondents refer to the "extreme difficulty of imagining a person saying," "I would like sweets when a boy." We are unable to see any difficulty in imagining it. In the same way they sweep contemptuously aside the other type, "I would like him if I could," describing it as "equally correct and equally negligible." So that as grammarians they take up the position of stating that, "I would like" is not English," and then admitting that there are exceptions, but they are not worth mentioning. This is not our view of the way in which the rules of grammar should be made clear to students, and the fact that our correspondents' book was favourably reviewed in THE ACADEMY at a period when the paper was under another editorship does not give us the least inclination to alter that view.—ED.]

THE DAILY NEWS AND THE DAILY MAIL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I am one of those unfortunates who read a hapenny paper, and I take the Daily News for choice. It cost more when I first took it forty years ago. Please do not think too hardly of me; it is not easy to pull up old roots.

But last Saturday I had a surfeit. Perhaps you do not know that the Daily News supplies its readers with a daily instalment of a novel—which I do not always read. But on this particular day I found that a whole page was devoted to the opening chapters of one of these wonderful productions, and I read it right through. Again I ask you to think charitably of me. I found in the closing paragraphs that the hero, with "a changed, livid face whiter than the immaculate shirt-front," lay dead in an arm-chair, and that the unconscious body of the heroine "was lying across the threshold of the small smoking-room."

Then came the following announcement:—

"The continuation of this powerful story will be found in the London Daily Mail on Monday, January 25th, price 3d. everywhere. The Daily Mail is the great home newspaper, containing not only all the news of the day, but also special articles by leading writers, and a daily magazine page for the family circle. See that your newspaper agent sends you the London Daily Mail regularly on and after Monday, January 25th."

Now, sir, I have endured Mr. Chesterton from day to day for a considerable period in the Daily News. I have tried hard not to see its displayed "ads." describing cures for the incurable diseases. But when it comes to be the hand-maiden of the Daily Mail, the cup runneth over. I immediately paid a visit to my newsagent and ordered that another hapenny paper should be substituted for the Daily News, but it was not the Daily Mail.

Greenwich, January 25th.

R. T.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- The Thunder of the Hoofs.* William Henry Lang. Long, 6s.
The Combat. Arthur Campbell. Long, 6s.
The Quenchless Flame. Violet Tweedale. Long, 6s.
The Craven Image. Mrs. Coulson Kernahan. Milne, 6s.
Little Dinners with the Sphinx. Richard le Gallienne. Lane, 6s.
The Unloved. Ethel Hill. Greening, 6s.
Little France. Cyrus T. Brady. Greening, 6s.
A Crime on Canvas. Fred M. White. Ward, Lock, 6s.
Julian Revelstone. Justin McCarthy. Chatto and Windus, 6s.
The Greater Love. Anna McClure Sholl. Unwin, 6s.
The Love that Kills. Coralie Stanton and Heath Hosken. Milne, 6s.
Traitor and True. J. Bloundelle-Burton. Long, 6d.

POETRY

- Songs of a Sunlit Land.* Colonel Kenneth Mackay. Angus and Robertson, 3s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

- Church Principles for Christians.* Joseph Hammond. Skeffington, 2s.
Your Confirmation. Rev. T. H. Passmore. Mowbray, 9d. net.
Our Companion By the Way. W. F. la Trobe-Bateman, Mowbray, 2s. net.

BIOGRAPHY

- The Fool of Quality; or, The History of Henry, Earl of Moreland.* Henry Brooke. With introduction by Francis Coutts. In two volumes. Lane, 2s. net, cloth.

REPRINTS

- The Works of Jane Austen, in ten volumes. Vol. V., Northanger Abbey, with a note by R. B. Johnson. Vol. VI., Persuasion, with a note by R. B. Johnson. Vol. VII., Emma (Vol. I.), with a note by R. B. Johnson. Vol. VIII., Emma (Vol. I.), with a note by R. B. Johnson. Vol. IX., Mansfield Park (Vol. I.), with a note by R. B. Johnson. Vol. X., Mansfield Park (Vol. II.), with a note by R. B. Johnson. Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d. net each.

MISCELLANEOUS

- The Policy of Licensing Justices.* Edwin A. Pratt. King, 1s. net.
The County Lieutenancies and the Army. Hon. J. W. Fortescue. Macmillan, 10s. net.
Stephens' Book of the Farm. Revised and largely written by James Macdonald, F.R.S.E. Blackwood, 10s. 6d.
Under Patraia, with Some Saunterings. By the author of "In a Tuscan Garden." Lane, 5s. net.
The Cloud Upon the Sanctuary. Karl von Eckartshausen. Rider, 3s. 6d. net.
Dublin Castle and the Irish People. R. Barry O'Brien. Kegan Paul 7s. 6d. net.
A British Officer in the Balkans. Major Percy Henderson. Seeley, 16s. net.

Macmillan's New Books

The Ancient Greek Historians

(Harvard Lectures). By J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

EVERSLEY SERIES.—New Vol.

Shakespeare. By Professor WALTER RALEIGH. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

William Morris.

By ALFRED NOYES. [English Men of Letters.] Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

Notes of a Botanist on the Amazon and Andes.

Being Records of Travel during the Years 1849-1864. By RICHARD SPRUCE, Ph.D. Edited and Condensed by ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M., F.R.S. With Illustrations and Maps. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

Earthwork of England.

Prehistoric, Roman, Saxon, Danish, Norman, and Mediæval. By A. HADRIAN ALLCROFT, M.A. Illustrated with Plans, Sections, &c. 8vo, 18s. net.

The Religion of the Common Man

By Sir HENRY WRIXON, K.C. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

One Immortality.

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Inward Light," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.
 "There are three loves that make and keep the world—the love that binds man and woman into one flesh and soul, the love that draws families into nations, the love that holds the world to God. . . . This book is about the first."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Tuesday next, February 2, at Five o'clock, Professor A. A. MACDONELL, M.A., Ph.D., F.B.A., first of Three Lectures on "THE ARCHITECTURAL AND SCULPTURAL ANTIQUITIES OF INDIA." Half-a-Guinea the Course.

Thursday, February 4, at Three o'clock, WILLIAM ARCHER, Esq., M.A., first of Two Lectures on "THE REVIVAL OF MODERN DRAMA." Half-a-Guinea.

Saturday, February 6, at Three o'clock, Sir ALEXANDER C. MACKENZIE, Mus.Doc., D.C.L., LL.D., first of Three Lectures on (1, 2) "MENDELSSOHN," (3) "CHAMBER MUSIC." Half-a-Guinea. (1) With Musical Illustrations. (2, 3) With the kind assistance of the members of the Hans Wessely Quartette.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS, &c.
32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.
NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.
AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
DIRECTORIES.

Books for Sale

A SMALL COLLECTION OF BOOKS.—ENGLISH LITERATURE, many First and Early Editions. To be Sold at great sacrifice, single volumes or the lot.—List on application to "Q." c/o DAWSON'S, 121 Cannon Street, E.C.

AINSWORTH (WILLIAM HARRISON), THE NOVELS OF; 20 vols., fcp. 8vo, cloth, gilt tops. Title design by Brangwyn, and each vol. contains 4 Plates after Cruikshank and other artists. Gibbons, 1901-2. Pub. 50/- net, for 30/-, new.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY OF FAMOUS LITERATURE, Plates, 20 vols., cloth; new; 50s. (cost £7). Another copy in half-morocco, 70s. (cost £10).—W. E. GOULDEN, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d. Rhoad's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND. BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

EARLY BRITISH SCHOOL.—SHEPHERD'S WINTER EXHIBITION of PORTRAITS and LANDSCAPES by Early British Masters is NOW OPEN.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY, 27 King Street, St. James's.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne Dorset.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

Now Ready, completing the record of the Book Year, the January BOOK MONTHLY, 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR.—Small Talk on some Large Literary Matters, with Illustrations to Brighten the Way.

WHAT BOYS READ.—A Talk with the Editor of "The Boys' Own Paper."

"SKIED!"—Conquest of the Air a Literary Necessity.

"PUNCH" POETRY.—And a Quarrel between Tennyson and Lytton.

MISSES WINKWORTH.—And their Gossip about Some Great Victorians.

A LONDON LETTER.—Do "Grown-Ups" read Books Written for Young Folk?

THE GENERAL READER.—Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best Selling Books.

LIGHT AND LEADING.—New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.—Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH.—A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of December.

THE PERIODICALS.—Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

LORD ROSEBERY MR. BENJAMIN KIDD AND PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Warders, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

IMPERIAL INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION

:: 1909 ::

Held at the GREAT WHITE CITY
SHEPHERD'S BUSH, LONDON, W.

MAY TO OCTOBER

Demonstrating the Special Products and Resources of all Nations, including Displays of the Famous Health and Pleasure Resorts of the World—Historical Exhibit showing the progress of Aerial Navigation—Automobile—Light—Mechanical Engineering—Palace of Latest Inventions.

CONCERTS BY FIVE MILITARY BANDS
(BRITISH AND FOREIGN)

SUPERB ILLUMINATIONS. FIREWORK DISPLAY

THE GREAT STADIUM

(SEATING 80,000 PERSONS)

INTERNATIONAL SPORTS and ATHLETIC MEETINGS

Application for Exhibit Space, Concessions, &c., to be made to THE SECRETARY, Imperial International Exhibition,
Shepherd's Bush, London, W.

NOW READY.

THE PRIZE NOVEL OF 1909
250 GUINEAS AWARD.

THE FAITH OF HIS FATHERS

By A. E. JACOMB. Price 6s.

Out of 156 MSS. submitted in the great
First Novel Competition of last year,

Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. W. L. Courtney, and Mr. Clement K. Shorter

have selected the above as winner of the prize.

EXTRACT FROM FIRST REVIEW
THE DAILY CHRONICLE SAYS:

"The knowledge of human nature it displays, the craft of the characterisation, the tragic force increasing as it goes along and culminating in the terrible irony of the last few lines, are exceptional. There is no other word for it. . . Mr. Jacomb has written a notable book."

ANDREW MELROSE
3 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community. Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net. A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 22 2s. net. [Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

PUBLICATIONS OF

THE OPEN COURT PUBLISHING CO.

CHRISTIANITY OF TO-DAY SERIES.

NOW READY.

GOD. An Enquiry into the Nature of Man's Highest Ideal, and a Solution of the Problem from the Standpoint of Science. By PAUL CARUS. 239 pp., cloth, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

JESUS AND MODERN RELIGION. By EDWIN A. RUMBALL. 160 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

WHAT WE KNOW ABOUT JESUS. By CHARLES F. DOLE, D.D. 89 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

PARALIPOMENA. Remains of Gospels and Sayings of Christ. By BERNHARD PICK, Ph.D., D.D. 158 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND MINISTRY OF JESUS. According to the Historical Method. Being a Course of Lectures by RUDOLPH OTTO. Translated from the Third Unaltered Edition by W. J. WHITBY, D.D. Circa 85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

SCRAPBOOK OF ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS. By WM. F. WHITE, State Normal School, New Paltz, N.Y. Cloth, 248 pp., 5s. net.

A few of the seventy sections of this attractive book have the following suggestive titles:—Familiar Tricks, Algebraic Fallacies, Geometric Puzzles, Linkages, A Few Surprising Facts, Labyrinths, The Nature of Mathematical Reasoning, Alice in the Wonderland of Mathematics. The book is supplied with Bibliographic Notes, Bibliographic Index, and a copious General Index.

MAGIC SQUARES AND CUBES. By W. S. ANDREWS. With Chapters by PAUL CARUS, L. S. FRIERSON, and C. A. BROWNE, jun., and Introduction by PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 206 pp., cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

THE SCOPE AND CONTENT OF THE SCIENCE OF ANTHROPOLOGY. By JULIUS DIESERUD, A.M. 200 pp., cloth, gilt top, 8s. 6d. net.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S MARTYRDOM, "A Satire." By PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 67 pp., boards with cloth back, 4s. 6d. net.

BEL, THE CHRIST OF ANCIENT TIMES. By Dr. HUGO RADAU. 60 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

AVESTA ESCHATOLOGY. Compared with the Books of Daniel and Revelation. By Dr. LAWRENCE H. MILLS. 8vo, viii.-85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. DAVID P. ABBOTT, widely known as the Author of "Behind the Scenes with the Mediums," feels that a star of first magnitude has arisen on the magical horizon, and accordingly has written a pamphlet describing in glowing colours

THE MARVELLOUS CREATIONS OF JOSEFFY. 25 pp., 15 Illustrations, 9d. net.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE HISTORY OF A STRANGE CASE: a Study in Occultism. 50 pp., paper, 9d. net.

Please write for Illustrated Catalogue.

THE

PEOPLE OF THE POLAR NORTH.

A Record by KNUD RASMUSSEN.

Being a presentment of the life, character, customs, legends, and religious belief of the Polar Eskimos, collected during a stay with them, together with some actual experiences narrated by members of the almost extinct race of the East Greenlanders, and a collection of East Greenlandic legends and fables, and also containing sketches of life among the Christianised West Greenlanders of the present day.

Compiled from the Danish Originals and Edited by G. HERRING.

With 150 Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by COUNT HARALD MOLTKE. Royal 8vo, £1 1s. net.

THE STORY OF A LIFETIME. By Lady PRIESTLEY. With numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

ANNE SEYMOUR DAMER. By PERCY NOBLE. With 35 Illustrations and a Frontispiece in Coloured Photogravure, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE CARDINAL DEMOCRAT. Being the Life and Work of the late Cardinal Manning. By I. A. TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA. By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD. Edition de Luxe, printed on specially made hand-made paper, watermarked "Light of Asia," and illustrated with Pictures of Indian Scenes from Photographs by MABEL EARDLEY WILMOT. Demy 8vo, handsomely bound in Roman vellum, 15s. net.

THE PRIVATE PALACES OF LONDON. By E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR, Author of "The Squares of London." With over 40 Illustrations, crown 4to, £1 1s. net.

DUBLIN CASTLE AND THE IRISH PEOPLE. By BARRY O'BRIEN. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF THE KINGS OF EGYPT. By Dr. WALLIS BUDGE. In 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s. net.

FATHER TYRRELL'S MODERNISM: An Expository Criticism of "Through Scylla and Charybdis," in an Open Letter to Mr. Athelstan Riley. By HAKLUYT EGERTON. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH. With a Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. net.

This edition has been revised, and contains an Appendix on the sale of "The Vicar of Wakefield."

THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD. By CHARLOTTE M. MASON. Vol. I. THE HOLY INFANCY. F'cap 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net. Vol. II. HIS DOMINION. F'cap 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ÆNEID OF VIRGIL. BOOKS VII-XII. Translated into blank verse by HENRY SMITH WRIGHT, B.A. Vol. II. completing the Æneid. F'cap 8vo, net, 5s.

FATHER PAUL. By JAMES CASSIDY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It has a certain charm as potent as it is hard to analyse. It would probably bear even the test of reading a second time."—Birmingham Post.

A PROLOGUE, AND OTHER POEMS. By WILLIAM GERARD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Mr. Gerard shows real poetic talent. His poetry is really thoughtful, and while not difficult to read, compels the reader's attention."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Please write for our Illustrated Autumn List.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & CO., Dryden House, 43 Gerrard St., London, W.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BELOVED VAGABOND"

SEPTIMUS

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. 6s. SECOND IMPRESSION

"Light-hearted, whimsical, a thing of infinite laughter, which is nevertheless continually on the verge of tears, Mr. W. J. Locke's new novel has a tone altogether its own, a tone deliciously elusive and enchanting."—Daily Telegraph.

"All the elements that most delight the admirer of Mr. W. J. Locke's novels are present in his new one 'Septimus.'"—Morning Post.

"Unquestionably Mr. Locke's 'Septimus' is one of the most original and most entirely delightful novels of recent years. It is written with fresh humour and rare sympathy; its analysis of character is masterly."—Birmingham Post.

"... a lively, jolly, entertaining book, written in high spirits and eminently adapted to raise the reader's spirits as high as the writer's."—The Daily Chronicle.

"The light and charming humour which has been Mr. Locke's key of success is at its best in 'Septimus.' It sparkles over every page."—The Outlook.

"'Septimus' is the beloved vagabond born under a happier star. ... he is wholly delightful."—Glasgow Herald.

"Through the pages of 'Septimus' laughter and tears chase one another after the fashion of an April day. There are only four principals in the book, but we get to know them through and through, to sympathise with their joys and sorrows, to love them for their faults as well as their good points."—The Daily Mail.

"... 'Septimus' is without doubt the most delightful story that has appeared for many months, and its success should be as remarkable as it is deserved. ... will enable many warm-hearted ladies to enjoy the luxury of a 'good cry,' for the pathos which is so close to Mr. Locke's humour is always tender, unforced, and affecting."—Country Life.

"Evidently Mr. Locke was in the gayest spirits when he dashed off his new story ... at any rate, there is about the whole book a feeling of light-hearted irresponsibility. Even behind its tears laughter smiles, under its very pathos there lurks a sense of humour, and throughout its chapters the novelist gives full reins to a freakish imagination."—The Sunday Times.

THE ARCHDEACON'S FAMILY

A New Novel by MAUD EGERTON KING. 6s.

THE TERRITORIAL FORCE

A Manual of its Law, Organization, and Administration. By HAROLD BAKER. With an Introduction by the Right Honble. R. B. HALDANE, K.C., M.P. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NELSON'S HARDY

HIS LIFE, LETTERS, AND FRIENDS

By A. M. BROADLEY and Rev. R. G. BARTELOT. Many Illustrations and Portraits. 10s. 6d. net.

JOHANNES BRAHMS

THE HERZOGENBERG CORRESPONDENCE

Edited by MAX KALBECK, and Translated by HANNAH BRYANT (Mrs. ATKINSON). With Portrait. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

This collection will be the first series of Brahms' letters presented to English readers. It is an account of a friendship maintained under almost ideal conditions during the period of the Composer's greatest activity (1876—1897), and gives a vivid picture of his personality and of musical circles in the three great centres.

BEYOND THE SKYLINE

A new novel by ROBERT AITKEN. 6s.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES

Their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE RACES COMMITTEE. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

LIFE OF LORD NORTON

(Rt. Honble. Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, K.C.M.G.), 1814—1905. Statesman and Philanthropist. By WILLIAM S. CHILDE-PEMBERTON. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

DOURIS AND THE PAINTERS OF GREEK VASES

Translated from the French of EDMOND POTTIER, of the Musée du Louvre, Paris, by BETTINA KAHNWEILER. With a Preface by JANE ELLEN HARRISON, of Newnham College, Cambridge. With Coloured and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Romance of the East Series TALES OF THE CALIPHS

By CLAUD FIELD, Author of "The Confessions of Al Ghazzali." Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each.

In this series the great store-houses of Oriental romance will be opened for the first time to the public. Tales from the Sanscrit, from the Chinese, from every language of the East possessing a great literature will appear in due course. From these vivid narratives of old-world romance it will be possible for the reader to glean much information concerning the lives and manners and customs of vanished races, and the greatness of Empires that have passed away. Mr. Claud Field, in "Tales of the Caliphs," gives us the genuine romance of history, authentic anecdotes of Caliphs of Bagdad and Cordova, and marvellous adventures of Haroun-al-Raschid concerning which even "The Arabian Nights" is silent.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

Printed for the Proprietors, THE WILSFORD PRESS, LTD., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., by W. H. SMITH & SON, 95 Fetter Lane, London, E.C., and Arden Press, Letchworth, and Published at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1918

FEBRUARY 6, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hater. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonier believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonier goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.'

We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—
'A second night for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly hags and matrons fair!
His votareesses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice.'

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonier to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonier steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each. 2/6

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, ROBERT WYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

EVERETT & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS

THE LIFE OF COL. FRED BURNABY

By THOMAS WRIGHT, Author of "The Life of Sir Richard Burton," etc.

One Vol. Demy 8vo, with 60 Plates, 12s. net.

"All the stirring incidents in Burnaby's meteoric career are related with force and fidelity, and the many anecdotes of his deeds of prowess make delightful reading."—Sunday Times.

"A Cœur de Lion in physique, strength, bravery, and magnanimity. . . . The author has told the story of his life right well."—Daily Graphic.

"Admirable amongst biographies."—Army and Navy Gazette.

LONDON IN THE SIXTIES

By "One of the Old Brigade"

With Illustrations by HAROLD PIFFARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A Book of interesting Recollections and many anecdotes of London as it was nearly two generations ago. The greater part of them are sporting and dramatic, but for the social historian there is much that is interesting in connection with old streets, inns, and clubs.

MY LIFE AND DANCING

By MAUD ALLAN

Illustrated from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

(SECOND EDITION NOW READY.)

"Gives some delightful stories of her youth in California, her student days, her début in Berlin, and of her triumphs at the Palace."—Outlook.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

ENGLISH BIRD LIFE

By H. KNIGHT HORSFIELD

With 100 Photographs from Nature specially taken for this Book. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"An admirable book."—Country Life.

"The text combines in an unusual degree familiar description with scientific knowledge. . . . The book is one that will be eagerly welcomed."—Glasgow Herald.

"A wholly delightful book, as conspicuous for its close and sympathetic observation as for its graceful and scholarly style."—The Bulwark.

"Splendidly illustrated."—Scotsman.

"Among the many excellent books on ornithology which have been recently produced a conspicuous place must be given to this delightful volume."—Outlook.

SPORT INDEED

By THOMAS MARTINDALE

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt extra, 6s. net. Illustrated from Photographs.

CONTENTS:—A Caribou Hunt; Calling the Moose; The Fun of Hunting; A Day in the Big Woods; A Close Call; etc., etc.

THE SCOTTISH TERRIER

By O. J. DAVIES

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Illustrated from Photographs.

"Mr. Davies is a master of his subject, and to all who are interested in terriers his book should appeal."—Badminton Magazine.

HORSES

THEIR POINTS AND MANAGEMENT IN HEALTH AND DISEASE.

By F. T. BARTON M.R.O.V.S.

Demy 4to, 15s. net. Fully illustrated from Photographs.

"A handsome volume, and as a present to a beginner in horse-lore likely to prove acceptable. The illustrations are excellent."—The Field.

THE PRACTICE OF EQUINE MEDICINE

By FRANK T. BARTON, M.R.O.V.S.

Author of "The Veterinary Manual," etc., etc.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON

Author of "The Call of the Wild," "Love of Life," etc.

"There is no sign in 'The Iron Heel' of any falling-off from the strong virile style to which Mr. London has accustomed us. . . . It is a remarkable book."—Daily Mail.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM

Author of "Ezra the Mormon," etc., etc.

"In these days of ænemic fiction a novel inspired with such passionate indignation is something of a rarity, and, alike for its matter and its manner, deserves the attention which it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

"A justifiable attack on those who think to honour God by dishonouring His methods."—Daily Telegraph.

"The novel is ably written. It should find favour with all except the peculiar sect to whom it is frankly and fearlessly antagonistic."—Scotsman.

A ROYAL HOAX

By FRED WHISHAW

Author of "The Great Green God," etc.

"A good story, chock-full of adventure."—Times.

"We will leave Mr. Whishaw to tell in his crisp and humorous fashion the tale of the imbroglis and complications which ensue. They are so dramatic that the novel would undoubtedly make an admirable and very modern play."—Yorkshire Post.

ROSALIND AT REDGATE

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Author of "The House of a Thousand Candles," etc.

"Mr. Nicholson has invented a new style of romance. . . . The reader is kept stimulated and enthralled to the end."—Morning Post.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM

Author of "The King's Scarlet," etc., etc.

London: EVERETT & CO., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page.		Page.
Life and Letters . . .	747	Pro Ecclesia . . .	756
Hush—on This One		Lord Haliburton . . .	757
Evening	749	Shorter Reviews . . .	758
Coffin-side Verses . . .	749	A Rustic Memoir . . .	759
"T. P." the Monopolist	750	Awning	760
George Meredith—Poet	752	Correspondence . . .	761
Pius Æneas	755	Books Received . . .	763

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

ONE of our correspondents, a Mr. Beard, asks us what is our authority for stating that our Lord and His disciples ate meat, and where we find the sanction given by the New Testament to killing animals. In reply, we refer him to the sixth chapter of St. Mark, where he will find the account of the miracle of the five loaves and the two fishes; also to the eighth chapter of St. Mark, where is recounted the second miracle of loaves and fishes. In both these cases our Lord distributed fishes killed for food to His disciples and apostles, and presumably partook of them Himself. Again, in the twenty-first chapter of St. John, in verses 12 and 13, he will find the words: "Jesus said unto them, come and dine. . . . Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread and giveth them, and fish likewise." Again, in the fourteenth chapter of St. Mark, in the twelfth verse, the words occur: "And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, his disciples said unto him, Where wilt thou that we go and prepare that thou mayest eat the passover?" (The italics are ours.) The reference, of course, is to the lamb which was killed and eaten at the feast of the Passover according to Jewish Law. Again, in the Acts of the Apostles, in the tenth chapter, in verses 10 to 13, there is a most direct and sweeping reply to those who pretend that the teaching of Christianity is opposed to killing animals of all kinds for food. The verses mentioned record the vision of St. Peter, and the "sheet knit at the four corners and let down to the earth": "Wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. And there came a voice to him, Rise, Peter; kill, and eat." These extracts should be sufficient to convince any reasonable being that our Lord did not prohibit or reprehend the practice of killing animals for food.

On the question of the morality of field sports, we are, of course, on less sure ground. We do not claim that there is sanction for them to be found in the New Testament, and we expressly qualified our approval of them last week by stating that, in our opinion, they would probably be avoided by high saints. But we can, at any rate, say that they are nowhere prohibited, and, consequently, we are at liberty to believe, taking into consideration the sanction to kill animals for food, and the fact that animals killed in field sports are either used for food or killed in self-protection on account of their destructiveness (as in the case of the fox), that it is not unlawful or wrong to indulge in the said field sports. We quite admit that this is a matter of opinion, and we have every respect for a man who has a genuine love of field sports, and yet refrains from them because he thinks them wrong. Our experience, however, inclines us to believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred of those who fulminate against field sports are people who are either incapable of indulging in them, or who, having lost the power to enjoy them, proceed to make a virtue of necessity. We do not for a moment suggest that our correspondent, Mr. Forbes, is one of these persons, and when he says that taking life for mere sport is brutalising and degrading, we are distinctly inclined to agree with him. For instance, we strongly disapprove of pigeon shooting from traps, but, of course, such pigeon shooting is not a field sport, and those who go in for it are usually not real sportsmen.

It has been observed that actors off the stage are too prone to resemble fish out of water. Of course, there are brilliant exceptions, but Mr. Forbes Robertson is not one of them. At an "At Home" given by the Women's Social and Political Union at the Queen's Hall on Monday, he distinguished himself by making some of the most foolish and drivelling remarks which have ever proceeded even from the mouth of a male Suffragette. He said that "he felt it to be utterly impossible for him to say anything new, or put any fresh light on this great vital reform, but he felt it to be his duty to make a public statement of his faith." Why, being in this state of dumb incoherence on the subject at issue, he should have felt it necessary to make a confession of faith is not clear. Later on Mr. Forbes Robertson remarked that "although much had been written, and well written, in favour of the suffrage for women, nothing had been written against it." This is about the most astonishing statement that we have had the pleasure of reading for some time, in view of the enormous mass of writing on the subject which has appeared in various papers, books, and pamphlets during the past two years.

We will not say anything about our own humble remarks in THE ACADEMY, still less shall we allude to the well-known and frequently-expressed opinions on the subject of the Spectator and the Saturday Review; but considering that only a week or two ago Professor Dicey published a long, able, and exhaustive enquiry into the Women's Suffrage question in the Quarterly Review, the conclusions of which were overwhelmingly against it, and that scarcely a reputable paper, and no single man or woman of intellectual weight, in England has been found to support the movement, Mr. Forbes Robertson's statement is one which it is difficult to characterise in terms of politeness. Mr. Forbes Robertson is a good actor in certain parts, although the memory of his performance as Romeo in "Romeo and Juliet" is a never-ending nightmare. But if he is unable to talk more sensibly than he did last Monday, we should strongly advise him in his own interest to confine himself to the comparative obscurity of the stage limelight. Mr. Forbes Robertson said, among other things, that "he could quite understand man's objection to 'Votes for Women.' They did not like giving up their thrones. At one time of his life he did not like giving up his throne, but, thank heaven, he had lived that failing down." In view of the fact that Mr. Forbes Robertson never possessed a throne of any kind, we can quite understand his lavish generosity in the matter of giving them away. What Mr. Forbes Robertson fails to see is that, while indulging in this kind of bleating, the only thing he is giving away is himself.

The current issue of Vanity Fair has given us a great deal of pleasure. A poem by Mr. Aleister Crowley is deprived of that gentleman's signature, if not of his usual "poetical" characteristics. And, thank goodness, there is not a single "comment by Frank Harris." In the following sparkling review, however, we seem to recognise the noble Harris touch:

POST OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY, 1909 (110th Edition).—Although for many years past the Post Office London Directory has been bound in two volumes, this form of publication was so little in demand that it was obvious that the convenience of having all the information within two covers exceeded the discomfort of excessive bulk. With a view to consulting the convenience of the majority of their customers, the publishers have increased the width of the pages by adding another column, thereby reducing the number of pages of the complete volume (with county suburbs) to 3,440, while not curtailing any of the contents of the various divisions. No addition having been made to its height, the Directory can still occupy its accustomed place on the bookshelf. The publishers have been reluctant to alter the old familiar form in which the Directory has appeared for so many years, but the change is one that must commend itself to every user of this admirable publication. Messrs. Kelly have been publishing the London Directory for nearly a century, and it would be difficult to suggest an improvement.

This is a fine piece of writing, and, furthermore, it will be noticed that in the whole paragraph Anarchy is not so much as hinted at, while the fact that The Bomb is still in its second edition is skilfully suppressed. We are glad to be able to congratulate Mr. Harris on his artistic reticence. On the other hand, we have Mr. Edwin Pugh in an article called "The Silence of Women," delivering himself as follows:

All women of experience in their hearts think of men as beasts, as silly, helpless beasts; for there is this peculiarity in the nature of even the best women that their love for a man can exist side by side with a feeling that is akin to contempt for him.

It is characteristic of a paper which is infected with the mania of Suffragitis to give publicity to such mawkish opinions. Mr. Pugh can speak for himself. The feeling that women have for male Suffragettes is no kind of criterion of the feeling they have for normal men. In the ignorance it reveals of the real psychology of woman the sentence we have quoted is worthy of Mr. Shaw or his friend the "Sheeny," whose views of life, regarded from the "Old Clo'" standpoint, have recently been reported at quite unnecessary length in the Evening Standard.

In the Author Miss Cecily Sidgwick ventilates one of those innumerable small grievances of authorship which, taken together, render the lot of the average worker with the pen less enviable than that of a dustman. It seems that Miss Sidgwick wrote a novel called "The Inner Shrine," and that in 1900 it was published in volume form by Messrs. Harper.

Accounts relating to its sales have passed between Miss Sidgwick and Messrs. Harper ever since, and the book is now out of print. Messrs. Harper, however, are publishing in their magazine a novel called "The Inner Shrine," by a new author; and Miss Sidgwick is informed, not only that she has no redress, but that if her novel, "The Inner Shrine," comes out in a cheap reprint she will have to find a new title. It seems a little remarkable that Messrs. Harper should be involved in such a matter. Of course, there is no copyright in titles, and it would be quite competent for any author or publisher to christen twenty novels "The Inner Shrine" if they were so minded. We think that the law on the subject would bear revision. At the same time, duplication of title really occurs but seldom, for the very simple reason that the booksellers are not in love with new books which bear old titles. We believe that Miss Sidgwick is misinformed as to her rights in the title of "The Inner Shrine" for a cheap edition of the book. If she desires to bring out a cheap edition we should advise her to publish it under her original title and leave Messrs. Harper to get an injunction against her if they could. The fact that a book is out of print does not destroy an author's equity rights in everything that appertains to it. For example, it does not destroy his interest in the copyright, and we will never believe that it will ever destroy his indubitable right to the use of the title. Of course, Messrs. Harper may well have used "The Inner Shrine" as a title by inadvertence. But now that the affair has presumably been brought to their notice we hope that they will request their new author to find a fresh title, and leave Miss Sidgwick in possession of what is morally her own. Or perhaps they will arrange with her for the purchase of the title.

We note that the amusing Mr. Shorter has been lifting up his voice once more about matters which he is determined never to understand. He asserts in the Sphere that there is no lack of poetry in England just now, and that Mr. J. M. Barrie is a poet, because he has written "Peter Pan." We have always understood that Mr. Barrie was a fairy, but doubtless Mr. Shorter knows better than Dr. Robertson Nicoll. We suppose that if Mr. Shorter were asked to make a list of living poets it would turn out as follows:

J. M. Barrie.
J. M. Bulloch.
W. R. Nicoll (author of Sunday Afternoon Verses).
William Heinemann ("the famous publisher").
Max Pemberton.
O. O. O. (late V. V. V.)
Sidney Pawling (cricketer).
— Webster (of "The Methuens.")

A man with a poet on his hearthstone ought to know better. Mr. Shorter is undoubtedly the most amiable person in Europe, and the fact that he should allow the little critical faculty he possesses to be utterly swamped by his desire to speak soft nothings about everybody is creditable to his heart, if not to his head.

Here are the headlines of the front page of a London dappenny morning paper: "Tariff Reform means no Navy cheeseparings"; "Juggling with the Navy—Serious Position Created by the Cabinet—Budget 'Economy'—Two-Power Standard in Danger"; "Anarchists' Victims—Criminal's Rights"; "Voluntary Martyrs to Science"; "Bride Drugged and Robbed—Honeymoon Drama in a London Hotel—Husband's Flight—Jewellery and Money Stolen"; "10,000 Men out of Work—Feud Between Railways and Colliery Owners—War of the Wagons"; "Rubbish Worth a Fortune—Deserted Mine to be Worked for Radium"; "Why Women Drink"; "No Room for Wobblers"; "Miniature General Election." What a world!

The Incorporated Society of Authors has a distinguished President in the person of Mr. George Meredith. It also boasts a council consisting of such men as Mr. Thomas Hardy, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, Mr. Gosse, and Mr. Pinero. There are various committees and sub-committees, all of them composed of practical literary persons. Furthermore, the Author, a journal published by the Society, is a great stickler for authors' rights and a great censor of publishers' methods. And on the cover of the current issue we find the following advertisements:

MSS. Authors should forward MSS. of any description (Novels, Stories, Poems, Essays, &c.) direct to Mr. —, who will immediately advise, free of charge, as to its publication.

BREEZY WRITING PAYS.

AMBITIOUS AUTHORS, anxious to diverge from the beaten track, should read the following new guides:—

1. What Shall I Write About?

New Plots, and How to Find Them.

2. Tale-Writing for Money.

Bright Stories: How to Write and Where to Sell Them at Best Prices.

3. 101 Money-making Recipes for Authors.

From the Private Papers of Eminent Writers.

Sevenpence Each.

Two for 1s. 1d., or three for 1s. 6d., post free.

We wonder what Mr. Meredith and Mr. Kipling think about this species of advertisement. Of the gentleman who advertises for MSS. we have already said our say in these columns. Of the publications of the firm of the hundred-and-one receipts for breezy writing we may shortly express some opinions. Then we learn from the same issue of the Author that Mr. William Archer undertakes to criticise, read and advise about plays entrusted to a firm of agents, for fees ranging from thirty shillings to two-pounds-ten. And "if, in addition to the opinion, the author should desire a personal interview with Mr. Archer a further fee of two guineas will be charged." Here again we have a neat little arrangement, the which, we take it, Mr. Meredith and Mr. Kipling and Lord Curzon of Kedleston and Mr. Gosse and Mr. Pinero heartily approve. For ourselves, we heartily disapprove. But so long as the Authors' Society continues to lend itself to such departments of enterprise, so long must it remain the laughing-stock of people who know what authorship means. We cannot conceive that Mr. Meredith reads the Author's advertisements.

We understand that Mrs. E. Grant Richards is editing a paper called The Englishwoman. And we understand that The Englishwoman is more or less of a suffragist organ, and that Mrs. Richards herself desires the vote. We can well believe it.

HUSH—ON THIS ONE EVENING

HUSH—on this one evening, of this, my February,
While the moon is hanging and the night-star gleams,
Listen, for the courtship of all the earth's beginning,
Night will close with passion and end with endless dreams.

In the thousand copses muffled birds are stirring,
Last year's wings are passing, last year's hearts are fledged;

In a bower of bare twigs waits a breathless robin,
Waits her scarlet master, songless, secret-hedged.

There're no bugs about her, but the sap is stirring
Thro' the miles of hedgerows like a hidden fire,
Down the lane a great bee swooning with the twilight
Seeks a budding primrose in which to wake desire.

Love, on this one evening, of this, my February,
While the moon is hanging and the night star gleams,
Listen, for the courtship of all the earth's beginning,
Night will close with passion and end with endless dreams.

COFFIN-SIDE VERSES

WHILE Mr. Massingham has been away delivering lectures on journalism at the University of Dublin his paper has continued to distinguish itself. Last Saturday it reviewed a batch of poets under the caption of "A Mixed Quire." It reviewed the "tousy tyke's" blasphemous "Testament" with that kindly touch for which the Nation will some day perhaps become notorious. It assures us that the kind of creed which the "tousy tyke" holds is of small moment compared with the kind of poetry which he makes out of it. We believe in poetry, and we believe that a poet's creed is of small moment—to the world—compared with the kind of poetry which he makes out of it. But we believe, further, that if a poet's creed is a foul creed, and he sets himself deliberately to endeavour to make poetry out of it, his poetry will suffer. We believe that the "tousy tyke's" creed is a foul material creed, and that his poetry has suffered accordingly, and we believe also that when the Nation describes the "tousy tyke's" "Testament" as a "noble and stirring poem" it fails in its duty to whatever public it may happen to possess. The "tousy tyke's" "Testament" is an ignoble and stupid poem if ever there was one, and it seems to us a thousand pities that money honestly earned in cocoa by a benevolent, God-fearing Quaker should be expended on the purchase of writing which is intended to cram that poem down the throat of "Liberalism." Of course, taken in the main, the Nation's notice of the "tousy tyke's" "Testament" is an unfavourable notice, and, in a sense, it is calculated to acquaint the reader with what he may expect if he purchases the book. At the same time, it does not really so acquaint him and it leaves him to discover the impertinent silliness and rank blasphemies of this "noble and stirring poem" for himself. We do not expect such reviewing from the roller-top desk and fountain pen of Nonconformity. In the Freethinker the Nation's review might have shone; in the Nation it is so much furtive compromise. The reviewer is careful not to quote, and we are open to mark for Mr. Massingham lengthy passages in the "tousy tyke's" booklet which he simply dare not quote with approval; and which he dare not approve even without quoting. It is all very well to call the "tousy tyke" a "monist," which is a nice soft adaptation from the Greek, and to assert with the same breath that he has made a noble and stirring poem out of his monism. We should have imagined that the Nation would be aware that there are occasions when it is necessary to say "spade" when you mean "spade"; but possibly it is afraid of the "tousy tyke's" rapier, and it would rather induce Nonconformity to gasp over indifferent prose and monotonous blank verse which might have done duty in the Freethinker than run the risk of the "tousy tyke's" displeasure. Further on in its wonderful article the Nation offers us the following quaint notice:

Recently Mr. Frederic Harrison has drawn attention to an elegy, in the form of a sonnet-sequence, called "Thysia." It is a husband's lamentation for the death of his wife, and is unquestionably a fine poem. The sonnets are on the Shakespearean model, and sometimes end with an Alexandrine, which is, we think, a mistake; otherwise they show little trace of the amateur. We hardly believe, indeed, that the anonymous author is an amateur, so unerringly does he achieve that pinnacle of poetic art, simplicity. In every one of the sonnets grief is expressed with almost intolerable directness, a grief not mixed with desperation, but with a noble faith and courage. Mr. Harrison speaks of some of these poems as having been composed in the very presence of the coffin, which, we hope, is no more than a figure of speech. But in whatever manner they were composed, they are wonderful moving poetry. We may almost say of them that their sorrow has made "sorrow more beautiful than beauty's self." Such pure, unaffected music, made out of such a terrible affliction, will surely not be "alms for oblivion."

It seems to us somewhat extraordinary that the Nation should base its review of a little book of verses so diffidently upon an opinion expressed by Mr. Frederic Harrison, whom we suppose nobody would have the temerity to charge with being a critic of poetry. However, we live and learn, and it seems that, as Mr. Harrison has drawn attention to "Thysia," "Thysia" is "unquestionably a fine poem." Furthermore, the anonymous poet is not an amateur, and, according to the Nation, he achieves unerringly that pinnacle of poetic art, simplicity. And the Nation may almost say of the sonnets that their sorrow has made sorrow more beautiful than beauty itself. They are also pure, unaffected music. We happen ourselves to have looked into this same "Thysia." It is a thin booklet of forty-six pages, and, as the Nation very truly observes, "it is a husband's lamentation for the death of his wife." As there is neither credit nor discredit in a husband's lamentations for such a bereavement we must consider "Thysia" from the standpoint of poetry. However much we may sympathise with a human creature's loss, the bare fact that he has suffered a loss which has been common to very large numbers of husbands must not be allowed to send us off into pæans about his poetry. For our own part, if we had been reviewing "Thysia" in the ordinary course and in the absence of the puffs of Mr. Frederic Harrison and the Nation we should have dismissed it as a sonnet-sequence of no particular moment to anybody but the author and his friends. There is nothing universal about it in the poetical sense, and, in spite of the very proper faith and devotion to which it gives expression, it contains nothing which has not been before expressed, and better expressed, in other poetry. The Nation's claim for it that it is a fine poem, and that it unerringly achieves the pinnacle of poetic art, is so much fudge. By chance we take Sonnet nineteen from its place in the sheaf:

I would not live without you in high heaven,
And therefore on this dreary earth I keep
All that was yours around me still: the riven
Comb, when you fell, and were too brave to weep,
The mantle with the crimson stain—ah, me!
The folded pile of daily clothes, so dear,
So sacred; and within the glass I see
The faded flowers that watched beside your bier;
And there upon the floor the one poor glove,
And there the little shoes, dearest of all,
One by the faltering foot worn through above,
And over this my silent tears still fall,
And ere I leave the room with weary brain
I lingering turn to look at it again.

And here is Sonnet number ten:

Alone I wander back at early morn,
Back to the city drear, from death to death,
Back to the little home I left forlorn,
Where no life is, nor one that lingereth.
I watch within your silent room once more;
Without, the dead leaf shivers in the blast.
Your broken comb, your gloves are on the floor,
The cold clouds see them, and they shudder past;
Startled they look upon the empty bed,
The vacant chair, the couch left desolate,
The dying flowers that saw you lying dead,
And me, who bow beneath my sorrow's weight,
Who only hear that bell's sad monotone—
"Alone, alone, for evermore alone."

While one may indulge every respect for this kind of writing as sentiment, one certainly ought not to imagine that it is "fine" poetry or that it "achieves the pinnacle of poetic art." We say that there are lines in these sonnets which border perilously on the somebody's darling order of verse. And at the risk of being called callous and brutal we shall assert that the somebody's darling kind of verse, although very touching and very tearful, is not fine poetry and does not achieve the pinnacle of poetic art. The author of "Thysia" wraps himself round with anonymity. Even the photogravure picture of his late wife's grave does not help us to his name; but it helps us surely and unerringly to his mind, which, with all respect to his sufferings, is not the mind of a fine poet. Our animadversions are not for this mind at all, but for the Nation, which, in setting up "Thysia" as a fine poem, even at the behest of Mr. Frederic Harrison, oversteps scandalously the limits of what is tolerable from a critical journal.

Mr. Massingham must look to his reviewer. The proper appraisal of poetry is almost as difficult a work as the actual writing of it. Of course, "experts" in journalism are really contemptuous of poetry. They deal with it in their reviews in pretty much the same manner as they deal with "gardening," and "motoring," and "finance," and "Bridge." The difference is, of course, that if one's contributors get wrong about finance or about Bridge it is a serious affair, whereas if they go wrong about poetry nobody cares.

"T. P." THE MONOPOLIST

LIFE is a gentle progressing from illusion to illusion. To-day we believe, to-morrow we no longer believe. The bubble which delighted us and imbued us with childlike faith and hope succumbs before the needle, or of its own lack of substance, and we are left desolate. It would not be right of us to assert that we have laboured under many illusions as to a certain Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., an impudent Irishman, who edits M. A. P. and T. P.'s Weekly. His journalistic vagaries have never astonished us, and in good times and bad we have known him for pretty well what he is worth. Over his Literary Help Column in T. P.'s Weekly we have had occasion to reprove him in good set paragraphs, and last week we dealt at length with his fine new Correspondence College, which is to lend a helping hand to the poor and the needy and the ambitious—on terms. To our strictures Mr. O'Connor very naturally makes no reply; the reason being that he is in no position to reply, at any rate with advantage to himself. He will doubtless cause it to be known among his friends that his silence is a worthy and noble affair, and that he is one of those mighty intellects who is not to be deterred from benevolent and altruistic courses by mere criticism. The only power, indeed, that could abate or divert "T. P." is failure. When he met failure in the shape of his deceased property, P. T. O., he was deterred from publishing that paper any more. We do not say that there is anything wicked in this; we mention it rather in order to indicate that "T. P." is what we have always supposed him to be—namely, a man whom nothing but failure will stop. There are men in the world for whom failure is without terrors. But "T. P." is not of them. And, for the purpose of insuring the success of the aforesaid T. P.'s Correspondence College, Mr. T. P. O'Connor has had recourse to a most brilliant and compelling idea. Great men do have ideas occasionally, and "T. P.'s" idea in the matter of the Correspondence College is simply epoch-making. It amounts to this: T. P.'s Correspondence College is to be advertised in at least one other journal besides T. P.'s Weekly—that other journal being none other than the British Weekly. We have been told at some length how the "idea" of T. P.'s Correspondence College flashed across Mr. O'Connor's mammoth Hibernian intellect when he was at supper or otherwise beautifully engaged. But as to the origin of this later and more wonderful and exclusive idea of advertising in a neighbourly way with Dr. Robertson Nicoll we are as yet without information. Probably "T. P." thought of it at breakfast and cried "Eureka!" in the excellent accent of Athlone. Some day perhaps we shall know all about it. Meanwhile, the sufficing fact is with us: that is to say, the idea is there in all its glittering gaudiness; or, in other words, "No matter, he's got it." The inevitable result is that we are able to read in the current issue of our British Weekly the following Socratic enquiries:

Do you feel the need of a helping hand?
Have you learnt the art of Thinking and Reasoning?
Can you express your thoughts on paper and in good English?
Do you wish that you had been taught at school to speak and write fluently in simple French?
Are you handicapped for lack of Business Training?
Have you the necessary initiative, and do you know how to specialise and to qualify for advancement?

Of course, everybody who reads the British Weekly needs a helping hand, and everybody who reads the British Weekly wishes that he had been taught at school to speak and write fluently in simple French. And particularly does everybody who reads the British Weekly desire to learn the art of thinking and reasoning. So that the "replies" to "T. P.'s" advertisement will be fairly numerous, and, as a result, "T. P." will, of a surety, reap a golden harvest of silver, as one might say in Athlone.

Having given Mr. T. P. O'Connor a further free advertisement, we shall now endeavour, as it were, to plant a tiny seed of love in the garden of his heart. "T. P." is a great and powerful "literary" gentleman and a Member of Parliament to boot. What is more, he is a Liberal Member of Parliament and an Irishman. It is "T. P." too, who has the large intellect and the wonderful gift to hit upon new ideas like Correspondence Colleges and half-page advertisements in the British Weekly. This being so, he should be, in a measure, above all smallness and pettiness, whether of method or intention. He should hold fiercely and loyally to that great principle of Liberalism,

"Live and let live," and to that excellent Liberal shibboleth, "Down with monopoly!" We hope that he is so holding; though the facts, so far as we have been able to discover them, point rather to the contrary. It seems that there were Correspondence Colleges long before "T. P." was taken with his brilliant idea. And it seems, too, that some of these Correspondence Colleges were actually advertised in T. P.'s Weekly. One of them, at any rate, has been advertised in T. P.'s Weekly for some years past, and on writing for further space the proprietor of this college has received the following letter:

5, Tavistock Street, London.

January, 1909.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to yours (sic) of the 23rd inst., I have to say that T. P.'s Weekly Correspondence College has placed a large advertising contract with T. P.'s Weekly, one of the conditions of which is that we are not able to accept competitive advertisements until it expires.

Yours faithfully,

W. GRIERSON,

Manager.

From which elegant piece of English it is obvious that in making his arrangements for advertising in his own paper Mr. O'Connor has had a careful eye for the squeezing out of all rivals in the correspondence line. And we may conclude from his caution in the matter that he has been reading the life of Mr. Rockefeller, whose commercial motto appears to be "Waltz right in yourself and be careful to smash the little men." Well, Mr. O'Connor has a perfect right to do as he wills with his own. If the advertisement of the "rival" Correspondence College in question is no longer of use to him he is legally right to turn it out. And he is legally right to use T. P.'s Weekly for the advertising of his own particular venture in the same department of enterprise. At the same time, we should hold that by so doing he goes as far as it is possible for him to go towards the creation of a monopoly; and we have always understood that monopolies were peculiarly repellant to the Liberal mind. The Correspondence College, which is thus deprived of its advertisement in T. P.'s Weekly, has, singularly enough, however, had a similar experience with the British Weekly. On January 21st the Secretary of the College wrote to Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton as follows:

DEAR SIRS,—I received a visit this morning from your representative, Mr. Smith, who informed me that he was instructed by you to say that no further advertisements from me could be inserted in the British Weekly. . . . Being an old advertiser in your columns, I would be obliged if you would extend to me the courtesy of an explanation of your reasons for the step you have decided to take towards me.

Yours faithfully,

And on January 22nd Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton replied in the following terms:

DEAR MR. — We are in receipt of your letter, and are afraid there must be some little misunderstanding. We asked Mr. Smith to call and explain that as we had accepted a big contract for T. P.'s Correspondence College, we could not, as a consequence, accept other advertisements of Courses of a similar or competitive nature. We certainly never intended for one moment that you should have the impression that no further advertisements of yours could be inserted in the British Weekly.

Yours very faithfully,

HODDER & STOUGHTON.

This is your excellent publishing firm all over. There has been a misunderstanding. We cannot continue your advertisement because we have just accepted a big contract from T. P.'s Correspondence College, but far be it from us to say that we will have no further advertisements from you. T. P.'s Correspondence College may "bust" or it may cease to advertise with us, in which case, of course, we shall be glad to accept the favours of our old advertisers! Meanwhile, please do not be deceived. Apart from the admirable attitude of Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, which, as the simplest will recognise, is an entirely beautiful, gracious and benevolent attitude, it is quite evident that in the case of the British Weekly again Mr. T. P. O'Connor has remembered the advisability of monopoly. Although Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton do not say so, we may take it that one of the conditions of their "big contract" for advertising T. P.'s Correspondence College is that other Correspondence Colleges, offering similar courses, must be turned out of the British Weekly. Depend upon it Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton are not stopping the advertisements of an old customer out of politeness or kindness to T. P. O'Connor, but simply out of what they consider to be commercial necessity. We are not at all surprised that T.P.'s Weekly should have taken up the line of monopoly, because T.P.'s Weekly is capable of pretty well any course of conduct that will bring it a safe shilling. But that Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, who are the proprietors of the British Weekly, and the employers of that pious Christian gentleman, Dr. Robertson Nicoll, should accept a big contract on the condition that the little advertiser in the same department should be ruthlessly swept away, appears to us somewhat more than a joke. Parliament will be meeting very shortly. Mr. T. P. O'Connor, we presume, will be in his place as usual. He sits on the Liberal side of the House as representative of one of the divisions of Liverpool. Perhaps on some evening when there "is little doing" he will favour the House with his views about monopoly. Perhaps he will explain upon what grounds of high principle and noble morality it is necessary that in newspapers where T. P.'s Correspondence College is advertised no other Correspondence College, howsoever old-established or howsoever competently conducted, should be allowed to enter its modest appeal. We do not approve particularly of Correspondence Colleges no matter who runs them. We have refused the advertisements of more than one such college, and if "T. P." were to offer us a thousand pounds a page for advertising his literary course we should refuse him. We are of opinion that the British Weekly ought to have refused him. And that the least they could have done would have been to reject his impertinent condition with regard to other advertisers. Meanwhile other advertisers in the British Weekly should take note of the affair, and endeavour not to live in fear and trembling of what will happen to them when the next genial, highly-cultivated, highly-moral, keenly-commercial Liberal comes along with some money. We suppose that even the British Weekly's pathetic advertisement about "The Broken-hearted; Addicted to Inebriety—apply now for Terms!" will have to go by the board the moment the "big contract" is toward. And it seems only yesterday that Dr. Robertson Nicoll was in Edinburgh assuring the booksellers of the grey metropolis that there were no unscrupulous journals in England.

GEORGE MEREDITH—POET

"LANGUAGE," said Walter Savage Landor, under the guise of Demosthenes, "is part of a man's character," and the statement forms a convenient touchstone for preliminary judgment of a novelist or a poet. A writer stands or falls, from a literary point of view, as his choice of language is good or bad, suitable or unsuitable. The finest story, the most exalted idea, may be irretrievably weakened and spoiled by too poor or too rich a setting. The jewel's the thing; but if the jewel be unfairly mounted, either held shakily in paltry metal or overwhelmed by distracting gold, its charm is imperilled instead of becoming intensified, and the beholder remains unmoved.

Especially does this analogy hold with regard to poetry. Dependent for its expression and influence upon the selection and arrangement of language, it might be described broadly as emotion and feeling indissolubly wedded to art: the art alone—a poem manufactured—sometimes beautiful, but of little worth, the emotion inexpressible and incommunicable without the golden word. We can easily observe to-day the reaction from the time when prolixity was considered an almost indispensable attribute of a "great" poem; we know now that as a rule the setting dwarfed the jewel, that the multiplicity of words was often disproportionate to the idea enshrined—certain famous epics, of course, forming exceptions. The fashion of pouring out rhymed couplets in prodigious numbers—as did Pope, Swift, Gay, and other satirical versifiers of the Caroline period—possesses little fascination for the poets of the present age; the tendency is quite in the contrary direction, to the crystallisation of a tiny thought in words as nearly perfect as possible. We may be anything but tedious. Between these two styles come a few—a very few—poets, whose work is neither diffuse nor heartlessly dainty, who are neither careless nor fastidious, yet for whom their glorious calling takes precedence of riches or adulation; and therefore the better part is theirs—honour. Among these the name of Mr. George Meredith must be placed.

It is a particular pleasure to discuss Mr. Meredith's poems, for this reason—that although his fame has reached to the ends of the earth as a novelist and poet among those who believe that "man needs must love the highest when he sees it," we cannot call to mind a single phrase of his which has become stale or hackneyed. He gives us no familiar, mellifluous lines such as Tennyson left in abundance, some of which misguided pedagogues used to quote as exercises for parsing in the school grammar-books of twenty-five years ago: "I steal by lawns and grassy plots"; "Tears, idle tears"; "It is the miller's daughter"; nor does any well-known couplet leap to the mind when he is mentioned. When the name of Browning chances upon an evening's talk, one present will find echoing in his brain, "Oh, to be in England, Now that April's here"; another, perhaps, will think of the song from "Pippa Passes"; to a third will come, "Beautiful Evelyn Hope is dead," or "Hamelin Town's in Brunswick." But Mr. Meredith has suffered little at the hands of intrusive anthologists, and that fact should cause us heartily to give thanks; for in his best lyrical work there is an essence so rare and so entrancing that we dare assert confidently no other poet has imprisoned the like in simple, sometimes almost ordinary, language. Take for a first example the little-known "Marian":

She can be as wise as we,
And wiser when she wishes;
She can knit with cunning wit,
And dress the homely dishes.
She can flourish staff or pen,
And deal a wound that lingers;
She can talk the talk of men,
And touch with thrilling fingers. . . .
Such a she who'll match with me?
In flying or pursuing,
Subtle wiles are in her smiles
To set the world a-wooing.
She is steadfast as a star,
And yet the maddest maiden;
She can wage a gallant war
And give the peace of Eden.

In two or three of the poems this peculiar charm is due, in a large measure, to the special and at first baffling rhythm with which the author evidently fell in love, so happily does he manage it—and it is a rhythm which has to be “managed” carefully in reading, or the beauty of it is completely lost. We may illustrate its effect by two stanzas from “Love in the Valley”:

Under yonder beech-tree single on the green sward,
Couched with her arms behind her golden head,
Knees and tresses folded to slip and ripple idly,
Lies my young love sleeping in the shade.
Had I the heart to slide an arm beneath her,
Press her parting lips as her waist I gather slow,
Waking in amazement she could not but embrace me;
Then would she hold me and never let me go? . . .

Happy, happy time, when the white star hovers
Low over dim fields fresh with bloomy dew,
Near the face of dawn, that draws athwart the darkness,
Threading it with colour, like yewberries the yew.
Thicker crowd the shades as the grave East deepens
Glowing, and with crimson a long cloud swells.
Maiden still the morn is; and strange she is, and secret;
Strange her eyes; her cheeks are cold as cold sea-shells.

To hear a grave voice reading this poem slowly—not sadly—is to experience a new thrill in the mere accent of the verses; but the reader must be a cautious one, acquainted with his subject. To enter into the question of the technique of the poem does not come within the scope of this article, but it may be noted that a person reading it for the first time will invariably slur the fourth verse (“Lies my young love sleeping in the shade”), accenting only the syllables, “Lies,” “sleep,” and “shade.” The more pleasing stress, as he reads on, he discovers to be:

Liés my | yóung love | sléeping in the | sháde,

making of the words “young love” almost a spondee.
The whole poem, with its stateliness, purity, and serenity, is a sheer delight.

The beauty of “Phœbus with Admetus” depends, too, a great deal upon the exceptional measure, to which must be added the unexpected effect of the reiterated four-line refrain:

God! of whom music
And song and blood are pure,
The day is never darkened
That had thee here obscure.

And while we are treating of the group of nature-poems, it is impossible to omit giving one more extract, this time from the admirable “Melampus”:

With love exceeding a simple love of the things
That glide in grasses and rubble of woody wreck;
Or change their perch on a beat of quivering wings
From branch to branch, only restful to pipe and peck;
Or, bristled, curl at a touch their snouts in a ball;
Or cast their web between bramble and thorny hook,
The good physician Melampus, loving them all,
Among them walked, as a scholar who reads a book.

Having differed in our previous article from those who hold that Mr. Meredith wrote fiction mainly to expound any particular philosophy—a man may be a philosopher and allow himself the luxury of philosophical digressions without promulgating a thesis—we must admit that to the poems he does impart a considerable amount of his personal convictions, quite naturally; indeed, it is almost inconceivable that such should not be the case, since a man who wrote nothing but purely narrative or descriptive poems would fail entirely to justify his divine right to the title of poet; whether he essayed lyric, sonnet, or ballad he could rise not much higher than an accomplished rhymster.

And at a second point we find coincidence with other critics; there appears, time after time, a similarity to the poetry of Robert Browning. The same brusque, vivid manner is there, and, we fear we must add, occasionally the same elusiveness of meaning.
Many have said, and will continue to say, that the “difficulty” of the two poets (which must be acknowledged to exist) is analagous; but it may be traced, we think, to different and entirely separable causes. Mr.
Meredith is as careful of his language as the prophets of their sacred fire—he is unhurried, though sometimes crowded by words; Browning’s method, on the other hand, led him into such an abnormal activity and swiftness that grammar and rules of syntax were often set spinning—a noun expands to a sentence, the burden of a sentence is crammed into a single word, with merely a note of exclamation to suggest all that has been omitted; a line is curtailed, a verb discarded; inversions, particles dropped—nothing matters. The fourth stanza of “Rabbi Ben Ezra” will show one or two of his idiosyncrasies. Not until the reader “gets inside” the mood and style of the poet can Browning be appreciated and admired. The verse of Mr. Meredith exhibits little or none of this exasperating haste, but possesses in places a wealth of meta-phorical embellishment which thwarts the student with much the same effect.

This superabundance of metaphor, allusion, and simile, while the very source of elasticity and liveliness in our author’s prose, shows to disadvantage in some of his poetical work through being cramped by the mould of form, and insufficiently controlled. Particularly is this the case in the longer poems. Let us take a few lines from “The Sage Enamoured and the Honest Lady”:

How shall a cause to Nature be appealed,
When, under pressure of their common foe,
Her sisters shun the Mother and disown,
On pain of his intolerable crow
Above the fiction, built for him, o’erthrown?
Irrational he is, irrational
Must they be, though not Reason’s light shall wane
In them with ever Nature at close call,
Behind the fiction torturing to sustain;
Who hear her in the milk, and sometimes make
A tongueless answer, shivered on a sigh:
Whereat men dread their lofty structure’s quake
Once more, and in their hosts for tocsin ply
The crazy roar of peril, leonine
For injured majesty.

And, again, from the same poem:

He learnt how much we gain who make no claims.
A nightcap on his flicker of grey fire,
Was thought of her sharp shudder in the flames,
Confessing; and its conjured image dire,
Of love, the torrent on the valley dashed;
The whirlwind swathing tremulous peaks; young force
Visioned to hold corrected and abashed
Our senile emulous; which rolls its course
Proud to the shattering end; with these few last
Hot quintessential drops of bryony juice,
Squeezed out in anguish: all of that once vast!

Here the stream of true poesy has ebbed, and left the rough boulders exposed to the cold light of day, boulders which seem to have been thrown down with Cyclopean fervour. To elicit the definite meaning of passages such as these, crushed and crowded with heterogeneous metaphors as they are, is a task to dampen the reader’s brow with unkindly dews; and if it be objected that they should not be torn from their context, we fear we must protest that the context accomplishes little in the way of explanation.

But for whatever faults may be, Mr. Meredith amply atones in his shorter lyrical poems, and in that magnificent group collectively entitled “Modern Love”— the latter, often termed a sonnet-sequence, universally admitted to be his finest poetical achievement. Into the question as to whether these separated sixteen-line poems can be legitimately called sonnets, we do not propose to enter; some well qualified to judge allow the term, pleading for the spirit of the law rather than the letter. It seems to us that a sonnet is a sonnet, and there's an end of it, although we have often wondered if the total effect would not have been enhanced had the author adhered to the accepted form. However that may be, we can safely rank the complete work as worthy of a place among the great love-poems of modern times.

It is quite impossible to do justice to this in the space at our disposal, but to pass it over with a mere allusion would be equally impossible. The theme is explained by the opening verses:

By this he knew she wept with waking eyes:
That, at his hand's light quiver by her head,
The strange low sobs that shook their common bed
Were called into her with a sharp surprise,
And strangled mute, like little gaping snakes,
Dreadfully venomous to him. She lay
Stone-still, and the long darkness flowed away
With muffled pulses. Then, as midnight makes
Her giant heart of Memory and Tears
Drink the pale drug of silence, and so beat
Sleep's heavy measure, they from head to feet
Were moveless, looking through their dead black years,
By vain regret scrawled over the blank wall.
Like sculptured effigies they might be seen
Upon their marriage-tomb, the sword between;
Each wishing for the sword that severs all.

The mind of the man, his musings and questionings as to his wife's unfaith, through which the little flame of hope constantly flickers only to fade, is revealed in passages of masterly insight:

Lord God, who mad'st the thing so fair,
See that I am drawn to her even now!
It cannot be such harm on her cool brow
To put a kiss? Yet if I meet him there!

O bitter, barren woman! what's the name?
The name, the name, the new name thou hast won?
Beneath the surface this, while by the fire
They sat, she laughing at a quiet joke.

We are two reed-pipes, coarsely stopped;
The God once filled them with his mellow breath;
And they were music till he flung them down,
Used, used!

Once, "Have you no fear?"
He said: 'twas dusk; she in his grasp, none near.
She laughed: "No, surely; am I not with you?"
And uttering that soft starry "you," she leaned
Her gentle body near him, looking up;
And from her eyes, as from a poison-cup,
He drank until the fluttering eyelids screened.

Oh, our human rose is fair
Surpassingly! Lose calmly Love's great bliss,
When the renewed for ever of a kiss
Whirls life within the shower of loosened hair!

With a passion of longing the man recalls the old days of love's protestations and companionship:

In our old shipwrecked days there was an hour
When in the firelight steadily aglow,
Joined slackly, we beheld the red chasm grow
Among the clicking coals. . . .

"Ah, yes!
Love dies!" I said; I never thought it less.
She yearned to me that sentence to unsay.
Then when the fire domed blackening, I found
Her cheek was salt against my kiss, and swift
Up the sharp scale of sobs her breast did lift—
Now am I haunted by that taste! that sound!

"Thy mouth to mine?" he cries. "Never! though I die thirsting. Go thy ways":

A kiss is but a kiss now! and no wave
Of a great flood that whirls me to the sea.

Only once in the poem does the lover definitely appear:

What two come here to mar this heavenly tune?
A man is one; the woman bears my name,
And honour. Their hands touch! Am I still tame?
God, what a dancing spectre seems the moon!

The poignant opening lines of the forty-fourth stanza form perhaps the best known passage of this heart-tragedy:

They say, that Pity in Love's service dwells,
A porter at the rosy temple's gate.
I missed him going; but it is my fate
To come before him now beside his wells;
Whereby I know that I Love's temple leave,
And that the purple doors have closed behind.

And then comes the end. Roaming, despairing, in a wood whither in the old happy times they had often strayed together, he finds her, "not alone," and leads her unresisting away. Some deep-seated, mysterious sympathy is still alive between them:

Love that had robbed us of immortal things,
This little moment mercifully gave.

But it is too late. She leaves him for a while, and then:

He found her by the ocean's moaning verge,
Nor any wicked change in her discerned;
And she believed his old love had returned,
Which was her exultation, and her scourge. . . .
About the middle of the night her call
Was heard, and he came wondering to the bed.
"Now kiss me, dear! it may be, now!" she said.
Lethe had passed those lips, and he knew all.

And the poet concludes with a summing-up of the mystery of love despoiled:

Thus piteously Love closed what he begat:
The union of this ever-diverse pair!
These two were rapid falcons in a snare,
Condemned to do the fitting of the bat.
Lovers beneath the singing sky of May
They wandered once; clear as the dew on flowers;
But they fed not on the advancing hours;
Their hearts held cravings for the buried day.
Then each applied to each that fatal knife,
Deep questioning, which probes to endless dole.
Ah, what a dusty answer gets the soul
When hot for certainties in this our life!
In tragic hints here see what evermore
Moves dark as yonder midnight ocean's force,
Thundering like ramping hosts of warrior horse,
To throw that faint thin line upon the shore!

If this brief outline of a noble poem leads any reader to study it, to appreciate the loneliness, the pride striving not to be broken, the blind hope and the relentless memories, the terrible heartache, that seem to live in its very fibre, we shall not have written in vain.

From the vague prettiness and fruitless fancies of so much of the poetry of to-day we turn with relief to the strong unfaltering note which dominates the poems of Mr. Meredith. He sounds the deeps of life in them as he does in his prose. Nature to him seems almost a personality to be questioned and listened to and loved; the flutes of Pan are rarely out of earshot; they sound for him innumerable sweet miraculous melodies for which he is impelled to write the harmony. The beauty and power of earth is ever appealing to him, finding expression again and again: "He must be good," says one of his peerless women, "who loves to lie and sleep beneath the branches of this tree!" "Let him be drenched, his heart will sing." And in those words we might not inaptly epitomise the general tone of the poems, interfered with here and there, perhaps, by notes which seem to introduce a discord; yet the dominant theme is that of defiance of evil, love of earth and earth's passions, faith that the mysteries of pain and death will some day disclose the immanent God. We shall take no harm if we share this defiance, this love, this faith. There be many worse creeds, not many better, than this of the great author and poet. His work is nearly done—the present month will see the eighty-first anniversary of his birth—but for him are the unspoken, grateful words, and the secret, affectionate thoughts, of a thousand who have never seen him, and whom he has never seen.

REVIEWS

PIUS ÆNEAS.

Æneas Silvius (Enea Silvio de' Piccolomini—Pius II.). Orator, Man of Letters, Statesman, and Pope. By WILLIAM BOULTING. (Constable and Co., 12s. 6d. net.)

THE familiar name of Æneas Silvius connotes little to a large number of even intellectual people, who have passed beyond the medium degrees of education. Yet he was highly distinguished on a conspicuous stage in all the parts enumerated in the descriptive title of this volume. To these it must be added that he was a wide and observant traveller, and a writer of private letters, at once more interesting, more charming, and more candid than any other before or since, who had so much experience of the public and private life of his own times.

By the year of his birth, 1405, his family, expelled from Siena with the other gentilomini, had fallen into positive indigence. His career therefore depended on his own capacity. Since he was not inclined to Arms, the only courses open to an intellectual youth without influence were the Church and the Law. Law remained entirely repugnant to him throughout his life, and he did not enter the Church until some twenty years after the usual age. He attained the Papacy solely by his consummate diplomatic ability, rarely combined with a tolerant nature and good temper, aided by his attainments as a secular man of letters. His literary career began with poetry and private letters while he was still a student of profane literature at Siena, and continued uninterruptedly until just before his death. His diplomatic career began with his journey to Basle in 1432, the second year of the Council. Round the Council of Basle his activity centred during the following ten years, first as private secretary to various Italian prelates attending the Council, then as a professional orator at the service of any client, later as a conciliar official, and finally as secretary to the Anti-Pope, whom the Council elected, Felix V. It was early in this period that he visited many places in the north-west of Europe, notably the Court of James I. of Scotland, returning in disguise through many towns of England. From 1442 onwards he repeated at Vienna a similar course to the one which he had followed at Basle. Having accepted a secretaryship in the Imperial Chancery, he soon became valuable to the Emperor Frederick III. Towards the year 1444 two changes were taking place in Æneas's life. Hitherto his private conduct had been such as has always been, and still is, common among other young laymen engaged in public affairs. He had consorted freely with women, and as a writer had not eschewed amorous subjects, while he maintained the reserve in such matters customary in his position. Though only about forty, he was already prematurely aged by the hardships of his long travels, and by an attack of the plague which had raged at Basle the year before.

By this time he had, as he says, "conquered that levity of mind which kept him among the laity." His sagacity led him to modify his political course also. The differences between Pope Eugenius IV. and the Council of Basle were not religious, much less theological; they were fundamentally questions of finance. Italian prelates devoted to the idea of the centralisation of power in the Holy See, but personally antagonistic to Eugenius IV., had attended the Council as long as its actions were compatible with the unity of the Church. On the election of a Conciliar Anti-Pope, even the Council's main lay supporters, the Emperor and the Kings of France and Aragon, refused to recognise him, and adopted a policy of neutrality. Their ecclesiastical ideal was Nationalism, and not Schism. By renouncing the service of Felix V. for that of Frederick III., Æneas had already passed from the Conciliar to the Neutral party. The Italian prelates, his early patrons, were constantly endeavouring to reconcile these Neutrals to the Holy See. In accordance with the present English custom, which is so much admired, Æneas and his friends did not allow divergence in political opinion to interrupt their friendly and even affectionate intercourse. His own experiences of the Council's violent futility, and of the German Neutrals' stupid quarrels, had decided him to reconcile himself with Eugenius, and to use his influence in Germany, and especially over the Emperor, to bring both the Neutrals and the Conciliar to the same mind. His keen political foresight also warned him of two dangers threatening European civilisation itself: the victories of the Turks, and the fanaticism of whichever of the Bohemian factions might succeed in exterminating the other. In 1445, therefore, when he went to Rome as Imperial Ambassador, he made his submission to the Pope. The following year he was ordained sub-deacon, and in 1447 was ordained priest and consecrated Bishop of Trieste. Two years later Eugenius's successor, Nicholas V., promoted him to the See of Siena. By the end of March, 1452, the schism of Basle had disappeared in the submission of Felix, the Neutrals had also been reconciled, and Frederick III. had been crowned Emperor in Rome. In May, Æneas was free to start as Papal Legate for Bohemia, where he gained valuable experience of the extravagant communism of the Taborites, and of the moral tyranny exercised by the Hussites. Four years later Calixtus V. raised him to the Cardinalate, and he was elected to the Papacy on the death of Calixtus in 1458. His cardinalate and his papacy were mainly devoted to organising a crusade against the Turks.

The chief grounds of attack on the character of Æneas are his private life and his writings before ordination, his desertion of the Conciliar and Neutral parties, and in particular his conduct of the Imperial Embassy of 1445. The attacks have been made mainly by German and English historians attached to the idea of tribal religion, or instinctively inclined to sympathise alike with Horah or the Shias on the common ground of Separatism. Mr. Boulting is far from agreeing with these critics. The human and humane character of Æneas attracts him, and he sketches his life with quite affectionate sympathy. But, like his predecessors, he loses his sense of perspective, even in defending him. He is not, like them, shocked at the wisdom of the serpent, and oblivious of the craft of the elephant, but he allows himself to appear shocked, as they are evidently irritated, by Æneas's total disregard of make-believe. The English and German detractors make it quite plain that they could have pardoned crimes in him if he had but cloaked his delinquencies before his friends. With regard to his withdrawal from the Conciliar and Neutral parties, Mr. Boulting points out well that, though his changes of policy coincided with his own interests, he only made them when his associates had rendered co-operation impossible to a man of any foresight, and he was careful to procure them the best possible terms. Felix V. was allowed to retain his Cardinalate with rank inferior only to the Pope, and his partisans were similarly treated, according to their grades. Frederick III. achieved his coronation in Rome and a desirable marriage, and showed himself content by frequently employing Æneas after he had left his service.

The matter of the Imperial Embassy requires more detailed notice. The Diet had communicated to the Imperial Council, under an oath of secrecy, a certain resolution which was to be kept from the knowledge of the Pope. Æneas was not present at the Council, and the dignity of the Emperor, who was present, precluded the oath being offered to him. He communicated the secret to Æneas, who headed the separate Imperial Embassy which accompanied the Diet's. Knowing the obstinacy of Eugenius, Æneas diplomatically conveyed the Diet's secret to him, as the only means of extorting from him the reconciliation which all desired. He at most preferred the interests which he represented officially to the Diet's, to which he owed no allegiance. Perspective is lost in considering this question when it is judged by modern standards, however fictitious, without being converted into modern terms. We have to consider whether English gentlemen are justified in misrepresenting departmental reports, in the interest of their political party, while the continued receipt of their official salaries depends on the continuance of their party in power, or whether, as ambassadors, they are justified in misleading the foreign Governments to which they are accredited. Æneas's success and the British Empire are founded on methods exactly similar in kind. His advice that where evil courses are alone possible the less evil should be chosen, and his remark that "right action almost always carries a wrong with it," have still much justification in politics. It must be remembered that Æneas was contemporaneous with the burning of Joan of Arc, with the Wars of the Roses, with Louis II., with the betrayal of Huss, and with the massacre of the Adamites. It was the conscientious Bedford who burnt the woman whom he could not vanquish in arms; the simple German, Sigismund, who betrayed Huss, and the nationalistic Council of Constance that burnt him; it was also the moral Hussites, champions of religious liberty, who massacred the Adamites, just as later Calvin burnt Servetus. Against the wily, immoral Italian, Æneas, no single instance of severity even, nor sign of avarice, can be brought throughout his life, nor are any acts or words unbecoming an ecclesiastic alleged against him after his ordination as sub-deacon. The idea of religious liberty was scarcely yet on the horizon; such as there was resided in Æneas and in the Italian prelates in accord with him. The safe attendance of the Hussites at the Council of Basle was due to the Papalist, Cardinal Cesarini, and it was the frivolous Æneas who, when he was Pius II., protected the natural rights of Jews by forbidding the baptism of their children before they reached the age of reason.

Where Mr. Boulting shows least sense of perspective is in questions of private morality and of good taste. He seems to regard Æneas's letter to his father, requesting protection for his illegitimate child, as monumentally audacious. Æneas, rather, was too humane to desert a child whom he could not support, and too confiding in his friends to simulate to them a standard of morality by which, while still a young layman, he was indisposed to live. Mr. Boulting also thinks that the naive delight of Pius II. in display is rather "vulgar." He forgets that every age and State has its proper æsthetic expression. The splendour of Pius II. was no more vulgar than the bright colours of an Egyptian mummy-case, than Solomon's ivory, apes, and peacocks, or than the moderate ornament admitted by modern Puritanism. Vulgarity depends on subtle questions of taste, and lies in a peculiar defect of the sense of proportion. Vulgarity existed in Italy no doubt in the Middle Ages, for the satirists ridicule it, but not in the pageantries of Pius II., as Pinturicchio's frescoes bear witness. In Pius the delight in splendour was another sign of that æsthetic perception which also found expression in his love of nature, on which Mr. Boulting dwells so pleasantly. The gorgeous street processions added joy to the lives of the poor townsmen, just as the unexpected masques did to those of the peasants, who assisted in them to please the kindly Pope. In personal luxury he was sparing, for the household expenses of no Pope, even the most ascetic, were so low.

Mr. Boulting deserves congratulation on the chastening of his own style observable since the publication of his former book. A little more would not detract from the agreeable qualities of his writing, and a good deal more care in arrangement would greatly improve his biographical sketches. Since it is the development of character with which the biographer deals, letters should be quoted at the period at which they were written. However, his sympathetic account of his hero should do much in a popular way to attract study to the life of the most human and modern of mediæval statesmen.

PRO ECCLESIA

Church Principles for Christians. By JOSEPH HAMMOND, LL.B. (Skeffington and Son, 2s.)

IN these days when the national endowment of "undenominationalism" is being clamorously demanded by a considerable section of the British public, and when many of the official leaders of the English Church are coquetting with Dissent, this book will serve as a timely reminder of the principles for which Anglicanism really stands, and the truths which it is sworn to guard.

Canon Hammond does not mince his words. Courteous and urbane as he invariably is, he is yet entirely free from that flabby and invertebrate amiability which is the bane of present-day religious controversy, and which has done more than anything else to hinder any effective movement in the direction of religious unity. To minimise, or pretend to ignore, vital differences is, after all, but to forfeit one's self-respect and to incur at the same time the merited contempt of opponents. So that it is just as well that we should know precisely where we stand, and what are the real points of issue between ourselves and our antagonists.

Certainly Canon Hammond cannot be accused of any ambiguity in this matter. He proclaims boldly that Dissenters are "schismatics," and that to wilfully separate from the Church is to be guilty of mortal sin. Nothing could be plainer than this, and, on the whole, nothing could be more satisfactory. For it raises a perfectly definite issue in perfectly plain terms. Nor is Canon Hammond unaware of the objections which can be, and are, urged against this point of view. The many corruptions of the Church are frequently put forward by Nonconformists as a legitimate ground for separation. These corruptions are admitted—it would be, indeed, the height of folly to deny them—yet it is shown that the Church, in its later developments, can hardly have been as corrupt as when Christ joined it. Primitive Christianity, to which we are adjured to return—discarding the accretions and perversions of a later time—was notorious for its gross and open immorality. Again and again in the Pauline epistles we are reminded of the envyings and dissimulations which had already sprung up in the infant community. The very Eucharist itself was made the occasion of degrading vices, while fornication and incest are freely mentioned as characteristic of many of the early Christians. The truth is that the Church, so far as it is a human institution, must necessarily be subject to the limitations of humanity. Or, as Canon Hammond puts it, with admirable lucidity and directness: "The Church of God always is, and in the nature of things must be, more or less corrupt."

It may be admitted, however, that the Separatist argument would have something to recommend it if it could be proved that those bodies which have abandoned traditional Christianity could show a cleaner record, since "a tree is known by its fruits." This is not so, however. We are tempted to say, on the contrary, that the precise opposite is the case. The melancholy history of Puritanism, with its witch-burnings, Quaker-huntings, and legalised profanities, affords sufficient proof that Dissent, whatever may be said in its favour, can claim no immunity from human error or imperfection. And, while we have no wish to plume ourselves on our superiority in the matter of taste or reverence, we may venture to doubt whether such an incident as that recorded below could ever have taken place in an Anglican church:

The British Weekly naively informs us of "a pleasant but rather a startling incident" which took place at a meeting of the Progressives in Tolmer's Square Congregational Church—viz., the singing of "For he's a Jolly Good Fellow"—this was for Lord Rosebery—to the accompaniment of the church organ.

We need not labour the point, however. Churchmen and Nonconformists alike have small reason for self-gratulation on many matters. But impeccability is not one of the marks of the Church; unity is. The prayer of its Founder for His disciples was "that they all might be one." He spoke of "My Church," never of "My Churches," and the responsibility for the unspeakable mischief which has been wrought by our unhappy divisions rests entirely with those who, through pride or ignorance, have broken away from the parent fold.

Canon Hammond is less happy in his concluding chapter, which deals with the attitude of the Anglican Church to the Roman claim. We are surprised to encounter such a sentence as the following:

For the Pope's claim, be it remembered, challenges and impugns the use of one faculty at least which the Creator has given to us, and given for our guidance; given to be a light to our feet and a lamp to our path, namely, our private judgment, our reason.

But surely it is the exercise of this very faculty of "private judgment" that has been responsible for all the errors of Protestantism. If I am to reject Papal Infallibility, using my "private judgment" in the matter, it is equally open to Dr. Horton or the Bishop of Hereford to reject, on similar grounds, the Catholic dogma of Apostolical Succession. The argument, indeed, appears to vitiate everything for which Canon Hammond has been contending. If there is in the world a revealed body of Truth, which has been entrusted to the Church, then, in matters of faith, I am precluded from the exercise of any "private judgment." If not, the whole case for Protestantism has been triumphantly established. For, though Canon Hammond may believe that the spirit of sectarianism is opposed to the spirit of the Gospel, it is quite conceivable that "Dr." Clifford may think otherwise. Nor is it of the slightest assistance to appeal to the letter of Scripture, since the Bible is notoriously capable of a variety of discordant interpretations. As Canon Hammond himself points out in an earlier chapter, the Church preceded the Bible both in point of time and of authority, and it is, therefore, to the Church, and to the Church alone, that we must look for guidance.

With this reservation, however—and it is one of considerable magnitude—we can heartily commend Canon Hammond's little book. It is written in a simple and popular style, and should be read by all who are interested in the present development of religious controversy.

LORD HALIBURTON

Lord Haliburton: A Memoir of His Public Service.
By J. B. ATLAY. (Smith, Elder and Co., 8s. 6d. net.)

ARTHUR LAWRENCE HALIBURTON was born at Windsor in Nova Scotia on December 26th, 1832. He was the son of Thomas Chandler Haliburton, better known as "Sam Slick," named by Artemus Ward "the inventor of American humour." He claimed to have descended from a famous Border family, the Haliburtons of Merton and Newmains. Arthur Haliburton was educated at King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, which had originated in New York, but had migrated at the great disruption in 1775 to Nova Scotia, and had retained the Tory and classical traditions of Oxford. It had sent out into the world two distinguished soldiers of an earlier generation, Sir John Eardley Inglis, the defender of Lucknow, and Sir William Fenwick Williams, the defender of Kars. In 1899 the University conferred upon Lord Haliburton the degree of D.C.L.

His original vocation was for the law, and he was called to the Nova Scotian Bar in 1855. But the outbreak of the Crimean War turned his attention into a different channel. He was unable to purchase a commission in the line, but an opening was found for him, and in that year he received a commission in the newly-recreated Commissariat Department, and the close connection with the Army which lasted for the rest of his life was formed. It can hardly be credited now that a few years before the Crimean War broke out an eminent military authority had declared to a Parliamentary Committee that a commissariat department was a useless extravagance, because "no training in time of peace will fit a commissary for his duties in time of war." But this was said by Lord Fitzroy Somerset, then Military Secretary at the Horse Guards, who (in Mr. Atlay's words) "as Lord Raglan, was destined within four years' time to see a British Army rotting in the Crimean winter for the very want of that peace-trained staff, the utility of which he had decried." It was as one of the untrained recruits in a newly-formed department, with all the difficulties of a great campaign on their hands, that Haliburton began his very strenuous career. After some colonial service in 1860 he was brought to the central office of the Commissariat Department, and his assiduity and administrative capacity attracted the attention of Sir William Tyrone Power, the Commissary General-in-Chief (a veteran who still survives at the age of eighty-nine), and so his connection with Army Headquarters began, which only terminated on his retirement in 1897, having held the high appointment of Permanent Under-Secretary for War for nearly three years.

Such a career is an unequalled record of the history of the War Office and of Army control up to the present day. Mr. Atlay tells us what, however, was very generally known before, how exceptionally Lord Haliburton earned and held the confidence of the greatest of our military administrators and soldiers. The question with which his name will be for ever connected and revered is his steadfast defence of the system of short service instituted by Lord Cardwell. It has been bitterly attacked by the "drill-ground" school of officer at all times since its most beneficent institution. It was for Haliburton, before Government Commissions, in the Press, and in many able pamphlets, to champion the only system which can give a country an army with a real reserve and with any power of expansion without an absolutely ruinous cost—and probably at no cost could an army of even the minimum strength which is wanted for the defence of the British Empire be efficiently recruited on a long-service principle. The letters from Lord Wolseley to Haliburton alone are enough evidence to prove the value of his championship of this and other great questions of Army reform and Army life—for there are few soldiers now who will deny that Lord Wolseley has been the greatest of our Army Chiefs since the middle of the nineteenth century. A greater organiser than a great leader—a greater leader than the General whom we count as our greatest military administrator—Lord Haliburton was savagely attacked in the columns of the Times and waged a protracted duel with Mr. Arnold Forster before the latter took office as Secretary of State for War. That he was at issue with Mr. Arnold Forster on most important points of military policy will not dim his memory in the minds of most soldiers, and the letters published from statesmen of such divergent views as Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Lord Lansdowne (two of his Chiefs at the War Office), and of Sir William Vernon Harcourt and Lord Cromer, are sufficient evidence to the value of Lord Haliburton's services to the Army and to the State. His death on April 21st, 1907, was a great loss to both.

We wish, though, that Mr. Atlay would have told us a little of the private life of that genial, strong and well-bred-looking gentleman, whose portrait forms the frontispiece.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Old London. By WALTER L. McNAY. (De la More Press, 3s. 6d.)

OUR descendants, it is clear, will have no cause to complain that we left the first city in the world unhonoured and unsung, for of the making of books about London there is no end. The subject is, of course, practically inexhaustible, and to do these tireless compilers justice, their work is never uninteresting—it would be difficult to write a dull book about such a city. They are protected by the greatness of their theme. From whatever point of view the student considers it—that of architecture, history, social life, business customs, traffic—he is well repaid, and learns, the more he reads, that to pursue even one of the labyrinths of research to its origin in past centuries is the task of a lifetime.

Mr. McNay has chosen well in electing to present in book-form these pictures of vanished London; he gives just sufficient letterpress opposite each to supply the connecting thread of history. The plates, apparently reproduced by photography in the half-tone process, from old engravings, etchings, and a few old prints, are of remarkable clearness, and succeed admirably in preserving the quaint appeal so characteristic of the eighteenth century artist—an appeal which is in part due to the tremendous attention then given to form and detail rather than, as nowadays, to quality, tone, and general effect. The anxiety of the artist of to-day is to import into his pictures some significance, some portion of his own personality, so that we shall see as he sees, not necessarily as the thing represented actually is; and often to secure this impression he, consciously or unconsciously, sacrifices accuracy. In these illustrations we have the thing seen simply, unadorned by "feeling," and, if we except the occasionally exaggerated perspective, the result is perfectly satisfactory from the standpoint of those who wish to know precisely what these old buildings—theatres, churches, bridges, etc.—looked like in years gone by.

We need select but a few of the plates for special mention when all are of such uniform interest. The first, a view of the City as it was in 1770 exhibits well the astonishing number of church-spires that clustered round St. Paul's Cathedral, and emphasises our debt to Wren's magnificent capacity for seeing "sermons in stones." Old London Bridge, Blackfriars Bridge, the Marshalsea Prison, immortalised in "Little Dorrit," East India House, Temple Bar, and some ancient, ornamented houses which stood at the Fleet Street corner of Chancery Lane, are among the best features of the book; and the Regent Street Quadrant, designed by Nash, will appeal particularly to many in view of the sharp contrasts which that quarter of the city is showing at the present moment.

The reader will find the text concise and reliable in its information, with a copious index which adds considerably to the value of the book. While London is changing so rapidly under our eyes, it is well to be reminded that doubtless we only echo the complaints of our forefathers, who, when these antiquities were pulled down, sometimes grumbled that the city was being spoiled. The day for her spoiling, however, is not yet; as long as the Strand leads "from London to Westminster," and the Thames ebbs and flows like the systole and diastole of her mighty heart, London will be all that she ever was to those who love her.

The Love that Kills. By CORALIE STANTON AND HEATH HOSKEN. (John Milne, 6s.)

WHEN we read in the first chapter of this romance that Lady Queste "flung out her arms, and went hastily to the bureau on to which she had dropped the withered red rose, and, snatching it up, pressed her lips to it with a strangled sob," we felt that we were on familiar ground, especially as she had just smiled icily, made a curious gasping noise and spoken to her husband with concentrated calm. We have met that strangled sob before. Consequently the fact that one of the ladies concerned possesses an "oval face of creamy pallor" disconcerted us not a whit; when Lord Queste, the "strong, powerful man," was "shaken with emotion," we remained unmoved; and when a few minutes later he was discovered sitting "stiffly upright, as if he were staring into vacancy," we could have wagered that when his hand was taken it would "fall back limply," and were confident that Scotland Yard was in for a high old time. For Lord Queste was a Prime Minister, and had a Past, with a capital P, so that his lady, who was a minx in love with an Italian tenor, discovered No, it would hardly be fair to tell all that she discovered: at any rate, we blaze our way cautiously through a forest of mysteries, and only find out "who did it" on the last page but one. Coincidences extraordinary and events the most improbable follow each other with amazing rapidity, and if there be one of our readers to whom the feuilletons of the halfpenny papers are of absorbing interest, we recommend him to obtain this book without delay.

The Greater Love. By ANNA McCLURE SHOLL. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THIS story, told very delicately, and at times beautifully, elaborates a subject which writers of fiction rarely touch upon in any adequate manner—the passionate love of a woman for her girl-child. Other interests, other loves, which occur in the course of events, are subordinated to this fine theme, and the author has spent an amount of care on the exposition of the two principal characters which renders very real and charming the account of their devotion to one another. The lonely mother's renunciation in favour of the man who woos her daughter strikes a mournful note towards the end of the book, and the tendency of affairs in the direction of that climax necessitates the grave tones rather than the light, but here and there some short, inoffensively humorous passages secure the general impression from any danger of heaviness. Little Wilhelmina, who "with perfect politeness of manner had criticised the grand-maternal French accent" after the governess had gone, and John, who "carefully explained that contemporary research was undermining the character of Washington," are quite delightful children.

Mrs. Mangan had more than once retreated from this depressing dismemberment of heroes by modern babes and sucklings into the only narratives one could be sure of—such as the Siege of Troy and the exploits of King Arthur. If these gave way she could, in extremis, cling to Jack-the-Giant-Killer and Puss-in-Boots. She left the Higher Criticism to Wilhelmina and John.

These mischievous, up-to-date little ones make very brief appearances, and we should have enjoyed a longer acquaintance with them. The book, as a whole, will give our readers many thoughtful moments, and leave behind it the pleasantest of recollections.

Julian Revelstone. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

TO the novel-reader whose tastes lie somewhat above the ordinary level, Mr. Justin McCarthy is a tried friend. His calm flow of mellifluous English, his gentle, inferential chidings of the people who do wrong, his evident affection for his heroines, render most of his books peculiarly attractive; we might almost term this particular one "restful," were it not that the word would carry suggestions of somnolence and possible boredom. No such hints, however, apply to the career of the pertinacious Julian Revelstone. He began by wooing the daughter of a titled Englishman, in the character of Theodore Duncan, paid secretary to an American millionaire; he continues his efforts to win her, undaunted by the repulses of her parents, meanwhile endearing himself to the village of Evorgale, the "castle" of which he has really purchased; he finishes by marrying the lady of his heart, and returns, having prepared his way by various letters and telegrams, disclosing himself, to the utter surprise of her parents, as not only the American millionaire in propria persona, but Julian Revelstone, actual descendant of the castle's previous lords! The reader is in the secret all the time, and is therefore the better able to note the amusing situations, and appreciate the complete mystification of those chiefly concerned.

There exists one curious characteristic of this story, and that is an occasional feeling that the action is taking place on a stage. The dialogue is at times a little stilted, as a couple of brief paragraphs taken haphazard will illustrate:

"My dear son-in-law, I accept most thoroughly your appeal. Let the past be all forgotten. We now are of one family, and I can answer in that sense for Clarice's mother as well as for myself. In her name and in mine I give you both our blessing."

"I must send at once for my wife," said Sir Francis, who now regarded himself again as the master of the ceremonies; "she must be present with me at this, our welcome to the wedded pair."

"Let me go for her myself," Clarice said eagerly; "I want to be the first to bring the good news to her."

"You are quite right, Clarice," her father said; "you are indeed the fitting messenger. Go round and bring her here."

This almost mediæval style of talk in a thoroughly modern story seems to clash with the action unnecessarily. However, it is no very serious matter, and in no way mars the interest of a most original and delicate romance. The ending is in the good old-fashioned way, with marriage bells, reconciliations, and prosperity all round.

A RUSTIC MEMOIR

OUR mid-Essex village life is the poorer by the death of one of our oldest people, a fine old labourer, full of rustic wisdom and quaint sayings, a mine of information on ancient village matters. Unspoilt by modern scrupulosity and political trickery, to him a spade was a spade, and even a louse a louse. Let an ambitious public house take, if it would, the sign of "The Butcher's Arms"; to him it was still "The Knife and Cleaver." The modern Isolation Hospital was still to him the Pest'us.

The old man was eighty-five, and had been bed-ridden for nearly three years and a half. He died painlessly of sheer senile failure. "There ain't nothin' the matter a me," was his usual reply to one's enquiry; "cep as I ain't got no stren'th in my legs." "Don't you bring me none o' them fancy things," I heard him say lately to his daughter; "gimme a bit o' bread and cheese and a oinon." Though his legs refused to support him, they were of use in one way. He maintained that by their aches he could always tell when rain was coming. I asked him once if he had foretold a recent rain. "Yes," he said, "my leg ached for a week more'n that ever did afore." I suggested that he might advertise it as a barometer. "Ah," he said, "count that wouldn't do it then."

He was full of old memories of the parish seventy and more years ago. The village workhouse (the building still stands, and is now a four-tenement cottage) "that was looked after by a woman." "The matron, I suppose," I said. "No, she warn't called that; 'twas a woman." In answer to a later question he referred to this lady as "What you called the pomatum." The inmates lived in a big room downstairs. "Sleepin'? I suppose there was chambers upstairs. I never was upstairs. Cookin'? There warn't much o' that; bread and cheese was all they had, and a basin o' broth once a week. There was room for twelve, and I rec'lect once seven young men in the same time. Work? There warn't none to do, 'ceppin' a job now and then in the garden. How were they admitted? Why, the overseers done all that and let 'em out."

Talking about the difficulty of travel and of getting provisions in those days, he would allow no grumbling at modern roads. "Why," he said, "I remember when Muster F— used to ride his donkey here from Tumborough, he could touch the quarters anywhere with his fit. What are the quarters? Why, the quarters o' the roads, alongside the rakes. The rakes? Why, the places where the wheels go; ruts you call 'em. Carriers? There warn't none, 'ceppin' J— used to go to Lunnon and come back Sad'days with things for the shop. Sometimes when he come late Sad'day night, they used to open the shop Sunday mornin' to store the things, till the parish stopped 'em." I could not get much explanation of this drastic discipline, but he added, "Why, if a man was drivin' here Sad'day night, and didn't get here afore eight Sunday mornin', he dussn't come into the parish."

I made a remark one day on a recent flood. Mention of floods always brought out this story. "Floods! I rec'lect when Muster M— sent me with some hogs to Aleford—I only got sixpence for the job—when I got to Fish's Green, I thought I never should a got through; the water was over the hoss's back, so's he had to swim. I'll never do it n'more." (He was eighty-five when he last told me this story.) "I thought I never should a got out, till I felt his fit a-scrappin' on the bottom. I'll never do it n'more. When I got to Aleford my tooth did ache. I went to the doctor to have it out. That never did come out. I had to stop him pullin'. That hu't me so." Talking of teeth, I told him once that I had had a visit from a man who wanted a will drawn and had told me some stories of the local doctor of sixty years ago, who once "drewed a tooth for him, and there was a wunnerful gret maggot in it." "Ah," said old M—, "that's right enough; I've sin 'em, and plenty; not gret uns, y'know, little tiddy-mites." "What do you think I used to do when my fit was cowed?" he said one day. "Cut 'em with a knife till the blood ran." On further questioning it was explained that this was "to let the chill blood out."

How did he learn to read? "Why, at Sunday-school in the chu'ch in the forenoon afore service. There was a master and mistress, William A— and his wife, what lived down agin the public. The boys was under the gallery and the girls in the vestry. Were they paid? Yes, think they was; eight'npence a Sunday. What did they larn? Why, readin'; just their A B C and that."

The food he got as a child and long after was much the same as labourers' big families get now, but it lacked the few refinements which modern cheapness allows. "Bread mostly and 'taters, and toppin's dummplin's sometimes. Milk? Couldn't get none. Cheese? P'r'aps half a pound a week atween six. A scrap o' pork now and then." His early wages were, of course, the usual wage of the time: as a boy, a penny a day and a little food; his work "only arrants mostly," but he had to work all day for his penny; as a man, a shilling to eighteenpence a day.

His politics were simple. A Churchman, he held all Dissenters Liberals, and all Liberals Dissenters. "What, the Dissenters got in?" was his question at the last general election.

As may be supposed, he had many archaic and curious words. Reaped was rep. and beat and heated were bet and het; holly was hull; an unmarried lady was missus; freeze was frize, past tense friz. "That friz up in this room properly last night," he would say. "I remember one winter that was mild up to New Christmas, and then at Old Christmas that set in frizin' wunnerful." Of course, houses was housen. A picture was a gay. "Bring me my 'Pilgrim's Progress,'" he said one day; "I think I could read a bit." He was past reading for lack of sight, but the book was brought, a large quarto. "Why, some o' you've bin and tore out some of the gays," was his first remark. Nor was he satisfied though a full-page picture of Moses, after which he most hungered, was shown him. He was a regular churchgoer while he could go, and read his Bible devoutly till sight failed. Afterwards he delighted to hear it read, especially the last discourses of St. John's Gospel. For the Old Testament he had slight regard, except for the Psalms.

Such are a few memories of the old man, a type which I fear is passing away; and a sore loss it will be to our rustic community if it does pass—a brave, tough type, strong and healthy for all its early privations and a hard, trying life, and a good type, hearty, honest, friendly, courteous. A tough type, indeed. One day last February, a sickly time hereabouts, I made a special round of visits to most of our oldest people. Of fifteen, whose ages ranged from seventy-nine to eighty-six, ten were out and about after their usual jobs or walks. One couple was eating with vigour and enjoyment a dinner of "pig's pluck." They die hard, but, alas they die! E. G.

AWNING

THIS interesting word is first recorded by the N.E.D. for 1624, "Wee did hang an awning (which is an old saile) to . . ." (Captain John Smith), with two other quotations of about the same date, "A trarpawling (sic) or yawning" (1626), "An awning . . . is but the bots saile . . . brought over the yard and stay, and bouned out with the boat hooke" (1627). The word is probably somewhat older, as it is in Skinner (1671), but, as the earliest quotation is explanatory (v.s.), it is probably of foreign origin. The -ing is no doubt E. (N.E.D.). For the awn-, both the N.E.D. and Prof. Skeat are inclined to accept Wedgwood's conjecture. F. auvent, "a pent-house of cloth before a shop window" (Cotg.). Auvent is a corruption by folk etymology (vent) of Prov. anvan, a term of fortification, the origin of which is quite unknown. The derivation of awn-ing from auvent encounters phonetic difficulties, though, of course, much phonetic latitude may be allowed in the case of a nautical term. It seems to be rendered inadmissible by the fact that auvent is nowhere recorded as a nautical expression in any sense whatever. I venture to put forward another conjecture. It is very possible that awning, "velum, puta cannabinum, quod coeli vel umbellae instar, in calidis regionibus foris navis ad arcendum solem praetenditur" (Skinner, 1671), partly owes its form to tarparawling, "pannus cannabinus pice liquida illitus" (ibid.), and it may, like tarparawling, have been originally the name of a material. An awning is in Mod. F. tente (Jal), formerly also tendelct and tende (v. Jal and Lescallier). Jal, s.v. tente, gives the equivalent terms used in the European languages, including awning, none of which suggest any connection with auvent. He also mentions a kind of sailcloth called cotonninc, commonly used for awnings. Lescallier (1777) has cotonninc double, ". . . employed . . . for awnings of ships"; and cotonninc à carreaux, ". . . which . . . serves for awnings and curtains of boats." Jal quotes, from a work on ship-building (1622), a description of two kinds of awnings, viz., tente de cottonninc, "qui sert toute seule pour éviter l'ardeur du soleil ou le serein," and tente d'herbage, "qui est d'un gros et fort drap de couleur de bure pour défendre de la pluie, du froid et des autres injures de l'air." V. also Lescallier, s.v. tente. I do not propose to derive awning from cotonninc (via cot-awning!), but only to show that particular kinds of sailcloth were associated with awnings early in the seventeenth century and probably much further back. Brittany has furnished our language with the names of several textiles connected with special places, e.g., dowlas, lockram, poldavy (for these v. N.E.D.), but the most famous Breton sailcloth, olonne, does not appear to be recorded in E., though it has passed into all the Romance languages. It is not in the D.G., but in Littré (toile à voile) and in most of the older dictionaries. Jal, s.v. toile, says "Autrefois la ville d'Olonne (département de la Vendée) eut une manufacture de toiles qui eut assez de célébrité pour que, dans plusieurs pays, la toile à voile ait gardé le nom de cette ville." He gives (ibid.), as ordinary words for sailcloth, It. olona, Sp. lona, lonella, lonilla, olona, Port. lona. Thus olonne, as a loan-word, has suffered some corruption. Cotgrave has olonne, "canvas for the sayle of a ship (as in aulonnes) and sometimes also the sayle itself." For aulonnes he gives the terrifying gloss "ouldernes, medrinacks, pouledavies," mercifully explained by "the canvas whereof sayles for ships are made." These words occur constantly together, in various forms, in the seventeenth and eighteenth century dictionaries (Blount, Phillips, Coles, Bailey, etc.), and medrinacks (origin obscure) and pouledavies (from a village in Brittany) are fully dealt with by the N.E.D. For ouldernes (ouldernes in Sherwood, oulderness in Blount), I can find nothing. Is it also a place-name, e.g., Audierne in Brittany or Holderness in Yorkshire? To return to aulonne, this form, instead of olonne, may have been influenced by aulne, ell, which would constantly occur in connection with sailcloth, or it may have been mixed up with another aulonne, aulomuc, which, according to Godefroy, is a woollen cloth named from Alonne in Beauce. I suggest, as a pure conjecture, that it is the origin of the awn-in awning, and that the latter is a sailor's corruption of an unrecorded aulonning*.

ERNEST WEEKLEY.

CORRESPONDENCE

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I fear that Mr. Caleb Porter is like the gentleman of whom the poet sings:—

"'e don't know where 'e are," as his arguments so far as they have any meaning or relevancy tend to justify John Martin on the only two points on which I criticised him. That my views are not ordinary is my justification for sending them to THE ACADEMY; but that they are extraordinary in the sense of being unsound or peculiar to myself, I flatly deny, as they are those of every one who has any real knowledge of art. I appealed to artists and challenged their judgment. As for anachronisms, if Milton did not topple over the perilous line, neither did Martin.

As for my "perfidious" description of Martin's picture, that may safely be left to the judgment of the readers of THE ACADEMY; but I would point out to Mr. Porter that whatever his knowledge of "drunken evenings at the White City" he ought not to impute such knowledge to his opponent. To do so is a breach of good manners, for which I feel sure he will hasten to apologise.

I yield to no man in my admiration of Tintoretto when at his best, but he was manifestly overweighted in the "Last Judgment," and I calmly repeat that the general result is chaos. There are hundreds of splendidly painted figures, but all have equal emphasis, and unless one isolates the groups and sees them separately the result is bewildering. Martin in his "Last Judgment" represents thousands of figures, but they are ordered with such consummate artistry that the unity which is strength is achieved. This shows his wonderful mastery of composition which is at once the foundation and the last refinement of Art. In my last I said "I simply hate Dante's 'Inferno,' at the same time I recognise the greatness of the work." Mr. Porter translates this into, "We must . . . remember that Mr. Cook 'simply hates' great work." Throughout my crusade nothing has more clearly demonstrated the strength of my position than the fact that no opponent has yet ventured to state my position fairly and then attack it; they do as Mr. Porter does, present a gross travesty of it, and then attack that—it is easier. It is surely not necessary to point out to Mr. Porter that Dante's masterpiece consists of three parts, Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven; and while I delight in the two latter parts I am not at home in the former. Dante revels in the gruesome horrors of individual torture inflicted on the suffering sinners, these being portrayed with wondrous art. I admire the art, but hate the horrors. Is this beyond Mr. Porter's comprehension? I am proud to think that our great Englishmen, Milton and Martin, treated such subjects with a grandeur, a sublimity, that never descended to petty and horrible details. They also gave the pomp and pageantry of war, treating them with elemental grandeur, but they never gave gruesome and belittling incidents.

But high above all these matters in national interest is the treatment of Modern Art by our Press. The "New Criticism" was one long libellous campaign of defamation of all our best art and artists, with a few odd exceptions. All Royal Societies were to be overthrown, and Academicians were to be hunted like rats out of their holes; everything that lifts art above craft was denounced as a "vice"; and all criteria were inverted in the interests of pretentious incompetence. It was under the editorship of a certain "Anarchist" that the most deadly stab was made at the critical conscience; he allowed his "critic," a member of a small exhibiting Society of artists of the decadent "Modernity" variety, to cynically throw over all pretence of critical fairness, and to boldly boom his own little Society and its friends in season and out, and to belittle and defame all the rest of our art. This little Society was lauded by another of the new critics for having gone "like rag-pickers, with basket on back and stick in hand, to pick up crumbs of art" from the garbage of Parisian studios! This anarchism brought general demoralisation; the dealers in decadents and dead men's works got undue influence on the Press, and were able to inspire critiques when they did not actually write them. Certain little Galleries were boomed as if they were the supreme centres of art; all their bantams were boomed as peacocks, and all their pigs as elephants! All the occult influences which cause artificial booms and slumps in stocks and shares are at work in the art world. The whole trend of these operations has been to depreciate all that is best in our art, in the interests of doubtful old masters and freaks about which a noise may be made. One result is seen in the mean and despicable reception given to the magnificent collection of modern art got together by the late Mr. McCulloch, forming the winter exhibition of the Academy. The vicious spirit animating the modernity critics is shown in the grudging praise, the sneers, the but half-veiled hostility to any efforts to assert the claims of sane modern art; and the taking the Academy to task for daring to do anything that does not play into the hands of dealers in decadents and old masters.

This Little Englandism is deplorable; the Press is virtually our chief ruler, and the power should bring a sense of responsibility. And while pecuniary considerations must dominate all others, they are surely compatible with patriotism, national interests, higher intelligence, and the British love of fair-play.

E. WAKE COOK.

A Special Offer to Smokers

OUR JAMAICA CIGARS are equal in aroma and taste to those from Havana, whilst the cost is half that of the latter.

A sample box, containing 25 of the following brands of Cigars, will be sent post free to anyone filling in the coupon below and enclosing P.O., cheque or stamps for 10/6 to us:—

Flor	80/- per 100	Bouquet Fines ...	35/- per 100
Celestiales	65/- per 100	Caribas	33/- per 100
Favoritas	65/- per 100	Conchas Especiales	30/- per 100
Ideales	45/- per 100	Exquisitos	27/6 per 100
Perfectos	45/- per 100	Excelentos	27/6 per 100
Governor	42/- per 100	J. T. C.	25/- per 100
Reina Victoria ...	38/- per 100	Operas	22/6 per 100
Londres Imperiales	37/6 per 100	Young Ladies ...	20/- per 100

IMPORTED EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES:

The "Seymour"	6/6 per 100
Lord Rothschild, Gold Tipped	9/6 per 100

TURKISH CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 1	6/6 per 100
----------------------	-------------

VIRGINIA CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 2	5/6 per 100
----------------------	-------------

RUSSIAN, BRAZILIAN, AND LEAF-COVERED CIGARETTES...

... ..	from 8/- per 100
--------	------------------

TOBACCO MIXTURE:

Medium... ..	10/- per lb.	Mild	12/- per lb.
--------------	--------------	-------------	--------------

JAMRACH & CO.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS
199 PICCADILLY, LONDON
Suppliers to the Nobility. Established 1871.

Please forward me, post paid,.....
for which I enclose.....
Name.....
Academy. Address.....

THE CHRISTIAN APOSTLES AND FLESH EATING.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Will you permit me to lodge a courteous protest concerning the assumption contained in your editorial note of January 30th, in which you use the following words:—

As for the sanction to kill animals, that question is settled once and for all in the New Testament. Our Lord and His disciples and apostles ate meat.

I would respectfully ask what evidence you have to justify these statements, for the matter is one of great importance to many Christian people who have become abstainers from flesh-food for humane reasons.

I have failed to find any positive evidence whatever that our Lord partook of flesh-meat on any occasion, whereas there is a large amount of assumptive evidence to the contrary, and also direct evidence to the effect that some of the twelve apostles were strict abstainers from it.

The Church historians, Eusebius, Clement of Alexandria, Hegesippus, and Augustine clearly record that Matthew, James the Apostle, and James the brother of Jesus were strict abstainers from flesh-food; and further, that there is ground for believing that Thomas was also a non-flesh eater. We have the personal confession of the Apostle Peter to the same effect, and it is hardly conceivable that the Master Himself came behind His own disciples in ethical perception and in the living of a pure and merciful life.

Many traditions exist that Jesus was the leader of the Essenian community, and there is corroborative evidence to justify this belief. If so, He would have looked upon flesh-eating with abhorrence.

The early Fathers, Tertullian, Basil, Clemens, Chrysostom, Jerome, Origen, and others declaimed against the carnivorous habit, and taught that a bloodless dietary was essential for, and characteristic of, a true follower of Christ.

In Homily 79, Chrysostom, speaking of the men who were fitting themselves for the Christian ministry, wrote as follows:—

"No streams of blood are among them; no butchering and cutting up of flesh; no dainty cookery; no heaviness of head. Nor are there horrible smells of flesh-meats among them, or disagreeable fumes from the kitchen. No tumult or disturbance and wearisome clamours, but bread and water. . . . If, however, they may desire to feast more sumptuously, the sumptuousness consists in fruits, and their pleasure in these is greater than at royal tables."

It is also a fact that the early Christians were conspicuous on account of their humane diet, and thus emphasised how great was the humane influence of Him who said: "Go ye and learn what this meaneth. I desire mercy and not sacrifice"; and who was instrumental in abolishing the holocaust of victims offered up on Jewish altars.

Those who, like myself, recognise, and have experienced the advantages of a humane and fruitarian dietary, and who know what benefits the general adoption of such a system will bring to our race, feel that we can safely appeal to the teaching and example of Christ and His first disciples to justify our protest against the barbarism and inhumanity of our modern civilisation.

SIDNEY H. BEARD.
President of the O.G.A.

Paignton, England.

FIELD SPORTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Your remarks on the above (30th ult.) seem to me to obscure the issue, especially when you cite our Lord and His disciples as eating meat.

The question is not whether animals may be killed for food, but whether they may be killed for sport. Taking life in any form for mere sport has always seemed to me brutalising and degrading. I care not that priests, parsons—some of the best of men and the salt of the earth—have indulged in it. It is entirely against the spirit and teaching of the New Testament. Certain animals may have been made for us to kill and eat—and then the killing should be as humane as possible, but to maintain that they were made for us to kill for amusement I utterly deny; and I cannot for a moment imagine that our Lord would countenance such a thing.

AVARY H. FORBES.

Royal Institution, W., February 2nd.

[Our comments on these two letters will be found in "Life and Letters."—EDITOR.]

THE NEW CRITICISM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—A new era of criticism has dawned. The halfpenny daily newspapers are our teachers and the establishers of new canons of criticism. Poetry is to be relegated to the limbo of obsolete and useless things. A writer in the Daily Chronicle of January 25th says:—"Altogether, perhaps, one is tempted to be glad that probably never again will a genius like that of Burns be sacrificed to ballads and to songs. The people have their real power now. The age of the "useful plan" has come at last. The poetry of to-day and of the future must be of deeds, not words. Has it not happened that a namesake—or possibly, as is whispered, an actual descendant!—of the ploughman poet himself has risen in these present years from a home just as lowly as Alloway Cottage to preside over a great Government Department? Doubtless a century and a half ago John, like Robbie, would have had to write ballads for a hearing."

Is it not pathetic? Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, Scott, had to be immolated on that altar of necessity. Now, the "whispered descendant" of Robbie "who presides over a great Government Department" needs not be sacrificed to "Adventurous song,

That with no middle flight intends to soar
Above the Aonian mount, while it pursues
Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme."

The "useful plan" (whatever that may be) it seems is outside the province of the poet. What fairy tales, then, were those old useless avowals of consecration! and how futile the willingness to be "a dedicated spirit"; to "learn in suffering what they teach in song."

Furthermore the oracle:—"To tell the truth, there is a touch of tragedy in the fact of Robbie Burns having been a poet at all." Hence, the artful dissembling of "wild poetic rage," or of such a "ballad" as the "Vision" "for a hearing," in which he reports the counsels of his native muse.

"Some fire the soldier on to dare;
Some rouse the patriot up to bare
Corruption's heart;
Some teach the bard, a darling care,
The tuneful art.

"Then never murmur nor repine,
Strive in thy humble sphere to shine;
And trust me, not Potosi's mine,
Nor kings' regard,
Can give a bliss o'ermatching thine,
A rustic Bard.

"To give my counsels all in one,
Thy tuneful flame still careful fan;
Preserve the dignity of man
With soul erect;
And trust, the Universal Plan
Will all protect."

E. K.

THE KING'S ENGLISH—AND OTHER THINGS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I take a good many weekly papers, some of them costing double the price of THE ACADEMY, but I can truthfully say that not from one of them do I get as much pleasure and entertainment as from the lively, original, piquant pages of THE ACADEMY under its present editorship. Sometimes it seems to me to be mistaken, sometimes fantastic in its ideas, sometimes even unjust, but its wit, its humour, its abounding vitality, its sound and powerful literary judgment (take, for example, the fine estimate of G. Meredith in this week's number), land it week after week well in advance of its most gifted contemporaries.

The very sight of the unopened number lying on my table on Saturday mornings fills me with pleasurable anticipations, for I feel that I am going to be intellectually stimulated and made to think. No paper known to me shoots folly as it flies with the same deadly, unerring aim.

But I did not set out to write an éloge, though I have been led into something approaching it, merely out of gratitude for the boon of such a delightful weekly feast of literature. My real object in writing was a little fault-finding, so may I ask, with due regard to the graces of the present management, if it may not be within the bounds of possibility, that even in pre-reformation days, THE ACADEMY may have been occasionally sound in its criticism?

I well remember reading the review of "The King's English" in 1906, and moved by what it said, I bought the book, and never in my life have I invested 5s. that brought me in a better return. It has been a well-spring of delight to me ever since. I don't suppose its authors claim infallibility for it, but it is an eminently thought-provoking book, and for the ordinary amateur dabbler in literature its reading is little short of a liberal education. W. M. COOPER.

Broadfield, Boston, Lincolnshire.

Feb. 1st, 1909.

THE POETRY OF OSCAR WILDE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—May I trespass on your space to correct what may be a misleading impression created by the writer of the article on the "Poetry of Oscar Wilde," which appeared in THE ACADEMY of January 23rd?

I am one of the many, sir, who agree with the writer of the article in question in thinking that "The Picture of Dorian Gray" to be one of Wilde's very finest works. I hold no brief for Messrs. Methuen, who did not include the volume in their edition of 1908; still less do I hold one for the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University, upon whose advice, as I understand, the volume was omitted, and who must now, surely, be branded as a meddlesome literary critic of the worst type; but I think it a pity that the readers of the article referred to should suppose that by purchasing Messrs. Methuen's edition they are not able to obtain a uniform edition of all of Wilde's works.

Mr. Charles Carrington, publisher and bookseller, of 15 Faubourg Montmartre, Paris, in 1908, allowed an edition of "The Picture of Dorian Gray"—of which, I understand, he is the owner—to "appear as a volume in the uniform edition of Oscar Wilde's authentic works" (Messrs. Methuen's edition of 1908)—"an edition which would otherwise have been incomplete." I quote Mr. Robert Ross, who writes an editorial note to the book. The edition of this volume, I may say, is like the set to which it belongs, limited to 1,000 copies, and may be obtained either from the publisher direct, or through any high-class bookseller, at a cost of 12s. 6d.

I feel that the gratitude of the book-loving public is due to Mr. Carrington for allowing the issue of this book uniformly with Messrs. Methuen's edition.

BASIL HALLWARD.

BOOKS RECEIVED

EDUCATIONAL

Bell's Literature Readers.

Parables from Nature. Mrs. Gatty. George Bell, 1s.

The Water Babies. Charles Kingsley. George Bell, 1s.

Six to Sixteen. Mrs. Ewing. George Bell, 1s.

FICTION

Bruised Lilies. Lucas Cleeve. White, 6s.

Tono-Bungay. H. C. Wells. Macmillan, 6s.

The Devil and the Crusader. Alice and Claude Askew. White, 1s.

The Silent Ones. Mary Gaunt and J. Ridgwell Essex. Laurie, 6s.

Confessions of Cleodora. Carlton Dawe. Long, 1s. net.

The Buckjumper. Nat Gould. Long, 2s.

With Powder Puff and Dagger. May Isabel Fisk. Sisley, 6s.

Araminta. J. C. Snaith. Smith, Elder, 6s.

The Fault. C. T. Podmore. Long, 6s.

Links in the Chain. Headon Hill. Long, 6s.

The Last of the Mohicans. J. Fenimore Cooper. George Bell, 1s.

Faets on the Fiord. Harriet Martineau. George Bell, 1s.

HISTORY

A Sister of Prince Rupert. Elizabeth Godfrey. Lane, 12s. 6d. net.

JUVENILE

Bede's History of the Church of England. Blackie, 6d. net.

The Crown of Wild Olive. John Ruskin. 6d. net.

Sindbad the Sailor. From Lane's "Arabian Nights." Blackie, 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Comparative Prose. William Macpherson. Blackie, 1s. net.

Comparative Poetry. William Macpherson. Blackie, 1s. net.

A Short History of the English Stage. R. Farquharson Sharp. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 5s. net.

Professions for Girls. T. W. Berry. With an Introduction by Lady Grove. Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.

The Rogue of Pye. W. Willmott-Dixon. Chatto and Windus, 6s.

The Lone Shieling. G. M. Fraser. (Aberdeen-Smith.)

A Treatise on Zoology. Edited by Sir E. Ray Lankester. Black, 15s. net.

The Primary Curriculum. F. H. Hayward. Ralph Holland, 4s. net.

Peace and Happiness. Right Hon. Lord Avebury. Macmillan, 6s.

On the Track of Life. The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of Leo G. Lera, by J. M. Kennedy, with an introduction by Dr. Oscar Levy. Lane, 7s. 6d. net.

University Administration. Charles W. Eliot. Constable, 6s. net.

Aspects of Modern Opera. Lawrence Gilman. Lane, 6s. 6d. net.

Pontifical Services. Volume IV. Illustrated from woodcuts of the XVth century, with descriptive notes by Athelstan Riley. Longmans, Green, 21s.

Letters from an American Farmer, by Hector St. John Crèvecoeur. Chatto and Windus, 6s. net.

The Charm of Paris. Compiled by Alfred Hoyatt. Chatto and Windus, cloth 2s. net, leather 3s. net.

The Characters of Theophrastus. An English translation from a revised text, with introduction and notes by R. C. Jebb. A new edition. Edited by J. E. Sandys. Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

The New Testament. J. A. Beet, D.D. Culley, 1s. 6d. net.

Faith Healing. H. J. Wilkins, D.D. Arrowsmith, 1s. net.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

Cloth extra. Large Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

THE NEW WORD

By ALLEN UPWARD,

Corresponding Member of the Parnassus Philological Society, Athens.

In view of the great circulation recently obtained by rationalist and materialist writings, the publisher believes that many persons may be glad to have their attention drawn to a book, not the work of an ordinary Christian Apologist, which meets the rationalist on his own ground and answers him out of his own mouth.

"As I turn over the leaves and re-read the passages I have marked, I utterly despair of conveying within my appointed limits any inkling of the author's fertility of thought and illustration."

—MR. WILLIAM ARCHER in MORNING LEADER.

"A spacious mansion of delight, . . . 'The New Word' is a book of rare enchantment, with something of the freshness of the world's youth about it."

—MR. HARRY JONES in DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The distinguished Philhellene, Mr. Allen Upward, now acknowledges the book in a second edition. . . . The sort of writing that means stimulus to the well grounded."—CHURCH TIMES.

"Words fail to convey the wealth of ideas, novel view points, wit, and amiable sarcasm which adorn the pages of 'The New Word.' . . . It is a most refreshing criticism of our mechanical modes of thought."

—ABERDEEN JOURNAL.

"It touches the whole gamut of knowledge. . . . The style is luminous, the matter is freshly and originally put, with the skill of a master."

—WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 44 Fleet Street, E.C.

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 59 PICCADILLY, W.

RARE BOOKS, AUTOGRAPHS, & MSS.

Speciality:—French Illustrated Books of the Eighteenth Century and Modern French EDITIONS DE LUXE.

* Gentlemen wishing to dispose of any of these will oblige by kindly reporting same to me.

Catalogue of Rare Books and MSS. now ready.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO., BOOKSELLERS, &c.

32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.

AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
DIRECTORIES.

BOOKS—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT
AND RARE BOOKS on any subject
SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop,
14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary,
7s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale

A SMALL COLLECTION OF BOOKS.
—ENGLISH LITERATURE, many
First and Early Editions. To be Sold at great sacrifice, single volumes or the lot.—List on application to "Q." c/o DAWSON'S, 121
Cannon Street, E.C.

AINSWORTH (WILLIAM HARRI-SON), THE NOVELS OF: 20 vols.,
fcp. 8vo, cloth, gilt tops. Title design by Brangwyn, and each vol. contains 4 Plates after Cruikshank and other artists. Gibbons, 1901-2. Pub. 50/- net, for 30/-, new.—
WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done, 10d. per 1,000 words.
Specimens and references.—Address Miss MSSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Sur-biton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—The WBS
KENSINGTON OFFICES. Authors'
MSS., Translations, &c. Legal and General
Copying. Private dictation room. Circulars, etc., duplicated. Usual terms. References.
Established sixteen years.—SIKES & SIKES,
223A Hammersmith Road, London, W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).

37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE FEBRUARY BOOK MONTHLY

WHICH IS NOW ON SALE, 6d. NET,
CONTAINS A SYMPOSIUM BY THE
LEADING PUBLISHERS ON WHY THE
WINTER PUBLISHING SEASON WAS
BAD. THIS IS A MATTER WHICH
INTERESTS WRITERS AND READERS
ALSO, AND THEY SHOULD MAKE A
POINT OF READING THE SYMPOSIUM.

Publishers of the "Book Monthly," SIMPKIN, MARSHALL
& CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

LORD ROSEBERY MR. BENJAMIN KIDD AND PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—
"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Warders, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32
Temple House, Talis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

A GREAT novel in GREAT demand is
PRIESTS OF PROGRESS

By G. COLMORE. (Second Edition.)

It throws a searching ray of light on a great public question.

The SPECTATOR says: "The book is powerfully written, and its subject demands attention."

DID SHE DO RIGHT?

By A. J. MACDONNELL.

A Story of Modern Rome and a Mixed Marriage.

FIRST TWO OPINIONS.

"An interesting romance. The authoress's pictures of present-day life in Rome are excellent."—BIRMINGHAM POST.

"The characterisation is on broad lines and is quite effective, while the plot runs merrily through 400 pages."—MANCHESTER COURIER.

THE BROKEN SNARE

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN.

A powerful, psychological study of the marriage relation by a new writer, portraying the struggle and ultimate surrender of a man and woman of high ideals who do not believe in the marriage ceremony. "Beautifully and brilliantly written."

TOM GALLON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN

READY NEXT WEEK at all Libraries and Booksellers.

OTHER NEW 6/- NOVELS.

THE TRICKSTER - - - G. B. Burgin.

THE LEVELLER - - - Alexander McArthur.

THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE
 E. Everett Green.

BANZAI! - - - "Parabellum."

AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE. Richard Duffy.

ANOTHER LARGE EDITION NOW READY.

THE DEVIL IN LONDON, by Geo. R. Sims. 1s. net.

London: STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.

The Prize Novel of 1909. 250 Guineas Award

THE FAITH OF HIS FATHERS

By A. E. JACOMB. Price 6s.

Out of 156 MSS. submitted in the great First Novel Competition of last year Mr. ANDREW LANG, Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, and Mr. CLEMENT K. SHORTER have selected the above as winner of the prize.

This book was subscribed well on the day of publication, and is now in brisk demand. Repeat orders from Libraries and the Trade are coming in every day.

OPINIONS OF THE DAILY PRESS.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "It is, indeed, as the publisher claims for it, an absorbing tale, holding the attention from first to last by reason of its intense human interest, and notable also for its truth and for its dissection of a very real, very dangerous, and almost invincible type of religious temperament."

THE DAILY CHRONICLE says: "The knowledge of human nature it displays, the craft of the characterisation, the tragic force, increasing as it goes along, and culminating in the terrible irony of the last few lines, are exceptional. There is no other word for it—Mr. Jacomb has written a notable book."

THE ACADEMY says: "The Faith of his Fathers" has won a prize of two hundred and fifty guineas offered in a recent 'competition,' and has, we think, won it worthily. For there is in it no trace of the straining after effect, the meaningless, ornate paragraph, the extravagantly 'clever' dialogue, and other inartistic superfluities which are indications of the passion for ephemeral distinction; it proves, on the contrary, to be rather simply written, tense, straightforward, and grimly earnest."

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHRONICLE says: "This is actual, real, and powerful work; it is painful, perhaps, but it is true."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN says: "There is nothing meretricious about it; it is hard, prosaic stuff, hammered out unflinchingly, with little of artifice, and with the appearance of detachment from the moral issues; . . . sound and faithful work."

THE LIVERPOOL DAILY POST says: "That 'The Faith of his Fathers' should be a first novel is nothing less than amazing. Mature and well-considered workmanship stands out clearly on every page. . . . Above all, the great tragic theme which is the central issue is certainly dominant, and worked out to a ruthless and convincing close. . . . Altogether, it is difficult to state in a few words how highly we think of this novel."

ANDREW MELROSE, 3 York St., Covent Garden, W.C.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community. Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net. A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price £2 2s. net. [Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

PUBLICATIONS OF
THE OPEN COURT
PUBLISHING CO.

CHRISTIANITY OF TO-DAY SERIES.NOW READY.

GOD. An Enquiry into the Nature of Man's Highest Ideal, and a Solution of the Problem from the Standpoint of Science. By PAUL CARUS. 239 pp., cloth, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

JESUS AND MODERN RELIGION. By EDWIN A. RUMBALL. 160 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

WHAT WE KNOW ABOUT JESUS. By CHARLES F. DOLLE, D.D. 89 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

PARALIPOMENA. Remains of Gospels and Sayings of Christ. By BERNHARD PICK, Ph.D., D.D. 158 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND MINISTRY OF JESUS. According to the Historical Method. Being a Course of Lectures by RUDOLPH OTTO. Translated from the Third Unaltered Edition by W. J. WHITBY, D.D. Circa 85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

SCRAPBOOK OF ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS. By WM. F. WHITE, State Normal School, New Paltz, N.Y. Cloth, 248 pp., 5s. net.

A few of the seventy sections of this attractive book have the following suggestive titles:—Familiar Tricks, Algebraic Fallacies, Geometric Puzzles, Linkages, A Few Surprising Facts, Labyrinths, The Nature of Mathematical Reasoning, Alice in the Wonderland of Mathematics. The book is supplied with Bibliographic Notes, Bibliographic Index, and a copious General Index.

MAGIC SQUARES AND CUBES. By W. S. ANDREWS. With Chapters by PAUL CARUS, L. S. FRIERSON, and C. A. BROWNE, jun., and Introduction by PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 206 pp., cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

THE SCOPE AND CONTENT OF THE SCIENCE OF ANTHROPOLOGY. By JULIUS DIESERUD, A.M. 200 pp., cloth, gilt top, 8s. 6d. net.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S MARTYRDOM, "A Satire." By PAUL CARUS. Illustrated, 67 pp., boards with cloth back, 4s. 6d. net.

BEL, THE CHRIST OF ANCIENT TIMES. By Dr. HUGO RADAU. 60 pp., boards, 3s. 6d. net.

AVESTA ESCHATOLOGY. Compared with the Books of Daniel and Revelation. By Dr. LAWRENCE H. MILLS. 8vo, viii.-85 pp., boards, 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. DAVID P. ABBOTT, widely known as the Author of "Behind the Scenes with the Mediums," feels that a star of first magnitude has arisen on the magical horizon, and accordingly has written a pamphlet describing in glowing colours

THE MARVELLOUS CREATIONS OF JOSEFFY. 25 pp., 15 Illustrations, 9d. net.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE HISTORY OF A STRANGE CASE: a Study in Occultism. 50 pp., paper, 9d. net.

Please write for Illustrated Catalogue.

THE
PEOPLE OF THE POLAR NORTH.

A Record by KNUD RASMUSSEN.

Being a presentment of the life, character, customs, legends, and religious belief of the Polar Eskimos, collected during a stay with them, together with some actual experiences narrated by members of the almost extinct race of the East Greenlanders, and a collection of East Greenlandic legends and fables, and also containing sketches of life among the Christianised West Greenlanders of the present day.

Compiled from the Danish Originals and Edited by G. HERRING.

With 150 Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by COUNT HARALD MOLTKE. Royal 8vo, £1 1s. net.

THE STORY OF A LIFETIME. By Lady PRIESTLEY. With numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

ANNE SEYMOUR DAMER. By PERCY NOBLE. With 35 Illustrations and a Frontispiece in Coloured Photogravure, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE CARDINAL DEMOCRAT. Being the Life and Work of the late Cardinal Manning. By I. A. TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA. By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD. Edition de Luxe, printed on specially made hand-made paper, watermarked "Light of Asia," and Illustrated with Pictures of Indian Scenes from Photographs by MABEL EARDLEY WILMOT. Demy 8vo, handsomely bound in Roman vellum, 15s. net.

THE PRIVATE PALACES OF LONDON. By E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR, Author of "The Squares of London." With over 40 Illustrations, crown 4to, £1 1s. net.

DUBLIN CASTLE AND THE IRISH PEOPLE. By BARRY O'BRIEN. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF THE KINGS OF EGYPT. By Dr. WALLIS BUDGE. In 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s. net.

FATHER TYRRELL'S MODERNISM: An Expository Criticism of "Through Scylla and Charybdis," in an Open Letter to Mr. Athelstan Riley. By HAKLUYT EGERTON. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH. With a Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. net.

This edition has been revised, and contains an Appendix on the sale of "The Vicar of Wakefield."

THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD. By CHARLOTTE M. MASON. Vol. I. THE HOLY INFANCY. Fcap 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 3s. 6d. net. Vol. II. HIS DOMINION. Fcap 8vo, cloth, illustrated, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ÆNEID OF VIRGIL. BOOKS VII.-XII. Translated into blank verse by HENRY SMITH WRIGHT, B.A. Vol. II. completing the Æneid. Fcap 8vo, net, 5s.

FATHER PAUL. By JAMES CASSIDY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It has a certain charm as potent as it is hard to analyse. It would probably bear even the test of reading a second time."—Birmingham Post.

A PROLOGUE, AND OTHER POEMS. By WILLIAM GERARD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Mr. Gerard shows real poetic talent. His poetry is really thoughtful, and while not difficult to read, compels the reader's attention."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Please write for our Illustrated Autumn List.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & CO., Dryden House, 43 Gerrard St., London, W.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BELOVED VAGABOND"

SEPTIMUS

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. 6s. SECOND IMPRESSION

"Light-hearted, whimsical, a thing of infinite laughter, which is nevertheless continually on the verge of tears, Mr. W. J. Locke's new novel has a tone altogether its own, a tone deliciously elusive and enchanting."—Daily Telegraph.

"All the elements that most delight the admirer of Mr. W. J. Locke's novels are present in his new one 'Septimus.'"—Morning Post.

"Unquestionably Mr. Locke's 'Septimus' is one of the most original and most entirely delightful novels of recent years. It is written with fresh humour and rare sympathy; its analysis of character is masterly."—Birmingham Post.

"... a lively, jolly, entertaining book, written in high spirits and eminently adapted to raise the reader's spirits as high as the writer's."—The Daily Chronicle.

"The light and charming humour which has been Mr. Locke's key of success is at its best in 'Septimus.' It sparkles over every page."—The Outlook.

"'Septimus' is the beloved vagabond born under a happier star... he is wholly delightful."—Glasgow Herald.

"Through the pages of 'Septimus' laughter and tears chase one another after the fashion of an April day. There are only four principals in the book, but we get to know them through and through, to sympathise with their joys and sorrows, to love them for their faults as well as their good points."—The Daily Mail.

"... 'Septimus' is without doubt the most delightful story that has appeared for many months, and its success should be as remarkable as it is deserved. ... will enable many warm-hearted ladies to enjoy the luxury of a 'good cry,' for the pathos which is so close to Mr. Locke's humour is always tender, unforced, and affecting."—Country Life.

"Evidently Mr. Locke was in the gayest spirits when he dashed off his new story... at any rate, there is about the whole book a feeling of light-hearted irresponsibility. Even behind its tears laughter smiles, under its very pathos there lurks a sense of humour, and throughout its chapters the novelist gives full reins to a freakish imagination."—The Sunday Times.

THE ARCHDEACON'S FAMILY

A New Novel by MAUD EGERTON KING. 6s.

THE TERRITORIAL FORCE

A Manual of its Law, Organization, and Administration. By HAROLD BAKER. With an Introduction by the Right Honble. R. B. HALDANE, K.C., M.P. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NELSON'S HARDY

HIS LIFE, LETTERS, AND FRIENDS

By A. M. BROADLEY and Rev. R. G. BARTELOT. Many Illustrations and Portraits. 10s. 6d. net.

JOHANNES BRAHMS

THE HERZOGENBERG CORRESPONDENCE

Edited by MAX KALBECK, and Translated by HANNAH BRYANT (Mrs. ATKINSON). With Portrait. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

This collection will be the first series of Brahms' letters presented to English readers. It is an account of a friendship maintained under almost ideal conditions during the period of the Composer's greatest activity (1876—1897), and gives a vivid picture of his personality and of musical circles in the three great centres.

BEYOND THE SKYLINE

A new novel by ROBERT AITKEN. 6s.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES

Their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE RACES COMMITTEE. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

LIFE OF LORD NORTON

(Rt. Honble. Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, K.C.M.G.), 1814—1905. Statesman and Philanthropist. By WILLIAM S. CHILDE-PEMBERTON. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

DOURIS AND THE PAINTERS OF GREEK VASES

Translated from the French of EDMOND POTTIER, of the Musée du Louvre, Paris, by BETTINA KAHNWEILER. With a Preface by JANE ELLEN HARRISON, of Newnham College, Cambridge. With Coloured and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Romance of the East Series TALES OF THE CALIPHS

By CLAUD FIELD, Author of "The Confessions of Al Ghazzali." Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each.

In this series the great store-houses of Oriental romance will be opened for the first time to the public. Tales from the Sanscrit, from the Chinese, from every language of the East possessing a great literature will appear in due course. From these vivid narratives of old-world romance it will be possible for the reader to glean much information concerning the lives and manners and customs of vanished races, and the greatness of Empires that have passed away. Mr. Claud Field, in "Tales of the Caliphs," gives us the genuine romance of history, authentic anecdotes of Caliphs of Bagdad and Cordova, and marvellous adventures of Haroun-al-Raschid concerning which even "The Arabian Nights" is silent.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

Printed for the Proprietors, THE WILSON PRESS, LTD., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., by W. H. SMITH & SON, 95 Fetter Lane, London, E.C., and Arden Press, Letchworth, and Published at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1919

FEBRUARY 13, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

"THE COUNTRY HOME"

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST

ON SALE
EVERYWHERE

Mr. GEORGE MEREDITH'S WORKS

In 18 Volumes.

Pocket Edition.—Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net each.

Library Edition.—Crown 8vo. each with a Frontispiece. 6s. per vol.

Richard Feverel
Beauchamp's Career
Sandra Belloni
Vittoria
The Egoist
Evan Harrington
One of Our Conquerors
Lord Ormont and his Aminta

The Amazing Marriage
Diana of the Crossways
Harry Richmond
Rhoda Fleming
The Shaving of Shagpat
The Tragic Comedians
Short Stories
Poems—in Two Volumes
An Essay on Comedy

Prospectus on Application.

By the Author of "Bachelor Betty."

PATRICIA BARING

By
WINIFRED JAMES.

"We have nothing but praise for this singularly fresh and striking book."
—Liverpool Daily Post.

"This book is one of the most subtle, and at the same time successful studies of girlhood and the development of womanhood penned during recent years."
—Southport Guardian.

By the Author of "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come."

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE

By JOHN FOX, Jr.

"The story of June, the pictures of Kentucky life, the glorious open air of the mountains, and the Lonesome Pine itself, have made us so thankful that we forget the slaughter and think only of the beauty of the tale."
—Westminster Gazette.

A NOTABLE WAGNER VOLUME.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF

WAGNER. By ANGELO NEUMANN. With Four Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
This account of Director Neumann's travelling Wagner Theatre in Europe throws much interesting light on Wagner's personality and the history of The Ring.

RACIAL PROBLEMS IN HUNGARY.

GARY. By R. W. SETON-WATSON ("Scotus Viator"). Author of "The Future of Austria-Hungary." Forty-two Illustrations and Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.
"Extraordinarily documents."—Spectator.
"His book will at once take rank as the standard authority on this immensely important subject."—Nation.

THE MAKING OF CANADA,

1763-1814. By A. G. FRADLEY, Author of "The Fight with France for North America," "Canada in the Twentieth Century," &c. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
"Among the years of Canada's making none reckon for so much as those of the vivid and evolutionary half-century of which Mr. Bradley gives so stimulating an account in these bright and invigorating chapters."—Daily Telegraph.

ÆNEAS SILVIUS (Enea Silvio de Piccolomini—Pius II.). Orator, Man of Letters, Statesman, and Pope. By WILLIAM BOULTING. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"A welcome attempt by a writer of taste and judgment to supply an English biography of the great mediæval scholar (1405-1464) whose Papacy is memorable for his efforts to form an armed confederation of Christian princes to resist the Turk."—Times.

IN THE DAYS OF THE COUN-

CILS: A Sketch of the Life and Times of Baldassare Cossa (Afterward Pope John the Twenty-third). By EUSTACE J. KITTS. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"It is most interesting reading, and throws a clear light on an obscure and confused period of European history."—Aberdeen Free Press.

AN HISTORICAL INTRODU-

CTION TO THE MARPRELATE TRACTS. By W. M. PIERCE. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"An able, learned, and exhaustive investigation, from the Non-conformist point of view, of the origin, bearing, contents, and authorship of the famous Martin Marprelate Tracts called forth by the condition of the Church under Elizabeth, and designed to show the unsupportable character of Episcopacy."—Times.

ON SALE
EVERYWHERE

10 ORANGE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE,
LONDON, W.C.

"THE COUNTRY HOME"

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/8 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. MYNART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDARIUM LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 156x111. ss. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Argued. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, ss. 6d. net.
"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through time. Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.
"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTESS. Royal 16mo, 19. net.
"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume will help to reverse that verdict. Though it is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbiness and ugliness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.]
"The greatest poetry is always personal. But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense, or distinguished mind. . . . Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."
First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLAN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.
"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.
"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TASSER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Biddisford.
"Had Browning written pirate lyrics instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.
"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a xapēpov. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LITTLETON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.
"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'ad' adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Littleton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.]
"These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen faws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in the age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the delighted beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.
"His 'Elizabeth' takes something of a Shakespearean quality of insatiable pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, ss. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRISTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 3s. net.
"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Respects not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GRINDBOO. With Cover-design by ARTHUR O. SPARE. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.
"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.
"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.
"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.
"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Music.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman.

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.
Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.
"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TITMAN.
"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

GEDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

VOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 771	Poetry and Criticism . . 779
Candle-light . . . 773	Tuscany 780
Prize Patriotism . . . 773	Shorter Reviews . . . 781
Mackenzie Bell and Watts-Dunton . . . 775	In the Time of Lilies . . 783
Jonathan Swift . . . 776	Correspondence . . . 784
February and the Saint 778	Books Received . . . 787

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

LAST week we commented on the "confession of faith" made by Mr. Forbes Robertson to a company of female Suffragists. This week it is the turn of Mr. Granville Barker. Mr. Barker has delivered himself of the weighty pronouncement that the only argument he has been "able to discover against the enfranchisement of women to-day is that they were not enfranchised yesterday." We are quite ready to believe that Mr. Barker has not been able to discover any other arguments against Female Suffrage, but he must not, therefore, suppose that other arguments do not exist. Mr. Forbes Robertson, it will be remembered, said quite flatly that "nothing had been written" against women's suffrage, so that we can take it that he shares with Mr. Barker the inability to hear or read or understand anything that does not happen to fit in with his own preconceived opinions on any subject. This is a beautiful and proper state of mind for an actor who is attending to his own business—namely, acting—but if actors are going to enter the lists of political and sociological discussion they really should endeavour to obtain some sort of information on the subjects they propose to discuss.

Mr. Forbes Robertson and Mr. Granville Barker, on their own confession, know nothing whatever about the question of Female Suffrage. They have neither read, heard nor considered the possibility of anything that might be urged against it. Presumably, Mrs. Forbes Robertson and Mrs. Granville Barker require votes, and that is enough for them. What a beautiful picture of domestic bliss is afforded by the contemplation of the mental attitude of these two "great actors." Meanwhile, having said their say and made their "confession of faith," and having, no doubt, received suitable rewards in the shape of approving words from their better halves, is it too much to hope that they will in future devote a little more of their valuable time to the study of the art whereby they earn their living, an art in which they are both capable of vastly improving themselves by study and imitation of the best models? Of course, if they are going to give up acting and go in for making political speeches and discussing sociological questions, that is another matter. In that case they had better at once set to work on a severe course of reading, and they might with advantage begin by endeavouring to obtain some elementary knowledge of the laws of logic. The beauty of being an actor is that nobody cares how foolish, how ignorant, how conceited, and how uneducated a man may be in private life, provided he knows how to act and can remember to repeat correctly the words which are written for him by the author. The disadvantage of being a politician or a public speaker is that if a man who aspires to these titles talks nonsense or exhibits ignorance and folly he puts himself into the pillory of public opinion, and exposes himself to metaphorical egg-throwing. There used to be certain laws enforceable against actors. The age has become more humane and the laws have been repealed, or have fallen into disuse, but the character and the mental calibre of the average actor remains exactly what it was, which is only another way of saying that he has the defects of his qualities. Of course, there are exceptions, but they are not nearly so numerous as is commonly believed—by actors.

Talking about actors, we are very sorry to hear that Mr. Lewis Waller has decided to take off The Chief of Staff. For some unaccountable reason the critics have almost unanimously condemned this admirable and stirring melodrama. We think that if Mr. Waller had "hung on" a little longer he would have found that The Chief of Staff would have survived the slings and arrows of wrong-headed criticism and blossomed into a great popular success. Mr. Waller himself was at his best in the part of Colonel Cavenish, and the situations at the end of the first and second acts are quite thrilling enough to make the success of any play. We notice that Mr. Max Beerbohm, in the Saturday Review of last week, makes a somewhat ill-natured attack on Mr. Waller. If Mr. Beerbohm will look at the matter again a little more carefully he will find that he is sneering at Mr. Waller for precisely those qualities which it is the actor's duty to achieve if he can. Mr. Waller, it appears, has succeeded in attracting a large following of devoted adherents, comprising a great number of young ladies who consider him "beautiful," and, generally speaking, regard him as an object of adoration. Well, where is the harm in that? It is an actor's business to make the best of himself, and if he succeeds in attracting the admiration of young ladies who have got sufficient good sense to prefer as an actor a good-looking man to a soi-disant "intellectual" old woman in trousers, so much the better for him and for the young ladies in question. The fact that Mr. Waller confines all his energies to acting, and that he is not in the habit of addressing meetings of women Suffragists, opening bazaars, or trying to push himself in "Society" is entirely to his credit. His rewards are great, and not the least of them is the admiration of the charming young ladies who attend all his first nights, and who, we will wager, do not count a single Suffragist or "advanced woman" among them. As to the play itself, Mr. Beerbohm affects to find it altogether beneath his critical notice. "It is a rignarole," he says, "which shows off Mr. Waller personally. That is all one need say of it." This is manifestly unfair criticism and gives the impression that The Chief of Staff is a brainless and contemptible play, with only one part in it. As a matter of fact, the play is well-written, it has a fine human interest, and there are at least five goods parts in it.

A controversy has been going on in the correspondence columns of the Saturday Review with reference to the use of the words "Catholic" and "Romanist" as applied to members of the Roman Catholic community. The latest contributor to this controversy is a Mr. F. Francis Barry, who, in last week's Saturday Review, makes use of the following words:

Again, in those days the old religion was known the world over as Catholic, the new as Protestant, from High Court Judge to the cabman in the street.

Mr. Barry's reference to the supposed authority of judges and cabmen as to the correct nomenclature of the Anglican Church is no doubt very convincing to himself. But if Mr. Barry will be at the pains of giving a cursory glance at the Book of Common Prayer he will find that the only Church recognised therein is described as the Catholic and Apostolic Church, and that the word "Protestant" is nowhere used. Consequently, when Mr. Barry makes the statement that the religion of the Church of England was known "in those days" as the Protestant religion "the world over," he is stating what is obviously untrue in substance and in fact.

Here is a typical example of female Suffragist reasoning. It is culled from a really childish article by a Mrs. Fawcett in the dull, dismal and dogged first number of a publication called The Englishwoman:

Another favourite argument of the Anti-Suffragists is that the ultimate basis of law is physical force, and physical force is male and not female. This argument was used, on a recent occasion, by an unwary orator, who illustrated it by pointing to the policeman at the entrance of the hall where he was speaking. He had not remembered that his illustration refuted his argument. For the policeman, the representative of the physical force by which the law is carried out, was the servant of a municipality elected by male and female voters.

Think of that. The policeman was the servant of a municipality elected by both sexes. Therefore, the ultimate basis of law is not physical force, and physical force is not male. A more complete non sequitur we never remember to have come across. If Mrs. Fawcett really imagines that the fact that a man can be employed by a body of men and women, or by a single woman, refutes the argument that the ultimate basis of the law is physical force, and that physical force is male, she need not have troubled to take so far-fetched a case as that of a policeman employed by a municipal body. If Mrs. Fawcett's reasoning is sound, then any woman employing any male, a butler, a gardener, or a coachman, would prove her point quite as well. As thus: Physical force is not male because Mrs. Smith employs a powerful man as butler—which, of course, is arrant nonsense, just as Mrs. Fawcett's syllogism is arrant nonsense. Mrs. Fawcett fails to see that even if men, by giving votes to women, consented to become the slaves of women, the basis of law would still be the physical force of Man. The law would continue to be enforced just so long as men voluntarily continued to be slaves and not a moment longer. In countries where, owing to female suffrage, laws totally prohibiting the consumption of alcohol have been passed, this is exactly what has happened. The law is simply disregarded, and the women who are responsible for having passed it are powerless to enforce it.

The Englishwoman also contains a story by Mr. John Galsworthy, written in a horrible pseudo-Scottish jargon. This story is evidently intended to be very harrowing and rather improper. It succeeds merely in being exceedingly silly. There is also what its author would probably describe as a "dramatic incident" in dialogue, called Mrs. Vance, which provides charming light reading. Mr. Vance is afflicted with a wife, the aforesaid Mrs. Vance, who has an undue fondness for the bell-mouthed glass. There is also Mary Cathcart, the governess of his children. Mr. Vance has, unfortunately, allowed himself to fall a victim to the charms of this engaging young woman, and when the dialogue begins we find him cross-examining the doctor as to the chances of recovery possessed by Mrs. Vance, who is lying upstairs in a state of desperate illness. Mr. Vance, we regret to say, does not at all want his wife to recover, and in the event of her demise he is anxious to lead the blushing governess to the altar. The pleasant little story ends by the announcement of the doctor that Mrs. Vance has taken a sudden turn for the better, and that her recovery is probable, and, as she is a confirmed inebriate and much given to hair-pulling and breaking up the furniture, the outlook for the future of Mr. Vance appears to be gloomy in the extreme. Although the fact is not definitely mentioned, we take it that Mrs. Vance is a firm supporter of Woman's Suffrage, and that the brutal refusal of men to give her a vote has driven her to drink. The moral is obvious. Miss Cicely Hamilton, the author of the dialogue, should endeavour to cultivate a sense of humour. Treated otherwise than as a joke, her effort can only be regarded as a totally unnecessary and quite pointless attempt to write as disagreeably as possible on a revoking subject. The Englishwoman also contains two pieces of "poetry," of which one is a piece of meaningless doggerel, called "An Old Soldier," and the other six lines (one of which does not scan) of pure nonsense, entitled "Invocation." Altogether, the quality of the Englishwoman is exactly what we should expect from a journal edited by five female Suffragists. The editress-in-chief is Mrs. Grant Richards. We read in the papers the other day that Mr. Grant Richards is again at Monte Carlo. When the mouse is away the cats will play.

We have observed with amusement the frantic endeavours made by Mr. Bernard Shaw to revive the "Shaw boom" which is suffering a serious "slump" just now. Interviews and speeches and articles have simply rained on us, and, of course, it is respectable Conservative papers which are ever ready to lend their columns for the purposes of the advertising without which Mr. Shaw's reputation cannot be maintained. The other day the Evening Standard actually devoted two columns to the account, by a Mr. Israel Cohen, of a conversation between Mr. Shaw and a "celebrated Jew," whose name we forget. The "celebrated Jew" could not speak English, and Mr. Shaw could not speak Yiddish, or whatever the "celebrated Jew's" language was; so Mr. Israel Cohen kindly offered his services as interpreter, and the Evening Standard kindly offered space in its columns. The "celebrated Jew" informed Mr. Shaw that he had the greatest esteem and regard for him and his "genius," and Mr. Shaw, not to be outdone, assured the "celebrated Jew" that he entirely reciprocated the feeling. He had ever, he said, loved and admired the Jews, because they were always at the back of all revolutionary movements. This last observation happens to be profoundly true, and, while it explains Mr. Shaw's love of Jews, it also explains why most people do not love Mr. Shaw, and why, even in England, a strong anti-Semitic feeling exists. But it does not explain why Conservative newspapers should give wide publicity to dangerous and mischievous cranks who openly boast of their revolutionary and Anarchical views.

The British publisher is, no doubt, a delightful person in his place. At the same time, he would appear to be one of those honest tradesmen whose views on the points of place and condition are a trifle singular. In plain terms, he is rapidly proceeding to take himself seriously as a journalist and as a critic of letters. One of him picks up two guineas a week for answering the literary enquiries in a certain snippet journal. Another of him writes foolishly over the pseudonym of "Alan Northman" in the Sunday School Chronicle. And a third applied to us the other day for reviewing. Then our publisher friend is a great inventor of little dodges for "pushing" the undistinguished. At the moment of going to press we receive from the head of a publishing house of standing the following letter:

Dear Lord Alfred Douglas,

I send herewith a little article by Mr. ———, entitled ———, which I think you might care to use in THE ACADEMY. The copyright is mine, and you have full permission to make what use you like of it, without any charge. It seems to me rather a good article, and hot stuff. By the way, I should like to purchase at least 100 copies of the issue of THE ACADEMY containing the article, and would take care that they are well distributed.

With all kind regards,

I am,

Yours most sincerely,

— — —

Now, this gentleman is so sure that THE ACADEMY will take his worm that he adds a postscript in which he is kind enough to tell us what is to be done with the article "after it has appeared in THE ACADEMY." We must beg of him—at the risk of losing his advertising account—to accept this, the only intimation, that the article will not appear in THE ACADEMY. The Mr. Alan Northman, before mentioned, who, however, is not the publisher from whom we have received the above letter, says in his current causerie—we believe causerie is the word—that "quite a number of people speak contemptuously of THE ACADEMY now because it has taken to criticising religious and social questions not immediately connected with literature or art." We shall be "quite" prepared to hear shortly that "quite a number of persons now speak contemptuously of THE ACADEMY" because during the past few months it has sacrificed hundreds of pounds' worth of advertisements in consequence of its indisposition and refusal to make little arrangements with publishers, publishers' advertising managers, and publishers' agents, or because it declines to trim its criticisms in accordance with its advertising accounts. The instance we have given is by no means an isolated one. We nail it to the counter because, on the whole, it seems to us to be the meanest of the lot. A publisher with whom we had a difference over a matter of principle some time ago has announced to some of his business acquaintances that THE ACADEMY is about to cease publication. We can assure him and all other persons whom it may concern that THE ACADEMY will continue its course under the present management long after "quite a number" of publishing houses have filed their petitions. We have not the smallest objection in the world to the publisher who conducts his business in a reasonable and legitimate way. Our view of him is that so long as he sticks to publishing and refrains from the publication of indecencies he is a person proper to be commercially considered. But when he attempts to put his finger into criticism, and particularly when he hints that he can purchase the opinion of THE ACADEMY, we have done with him.

CANDLE-LIGHT

FRAIL golden flowers that perish at a breath,
 Flickering points of honey-coloured flame,
 From sunset gardens of the moon you came,
 Pale flowers of passion . . . delicate flowers of death. . . .
 Blossoms of opal fire that raised on high
 Upon a hundred silver stems are seen
 Above the brilliant dance, or set between
 The brimming wine-cups . . . flowers of revelry!
 Roses with amber petals that arise
 Out of the purple darkness of the night
 To deck the darkened house of Love, to light
 The laughing lips, the beautiful glad eyes.
 Lilies with violet-coloured hearts that break
 In shining clusters round the silent dead,
 A diadem of stars at feet and head,
 The glory dazzles . . . but they do not wake. . . .
 O golden flowers the moon goes gathering
 In magic gardens of her fairy-land,
 While splendid angels of the sunset stand
 Watching in flaming circles wing to wing. . . .
 Frail golden flowers that perish at a breath,
 That wither in the hands of light, and die
 When bright dawn wakens in a silver sky,
 Pale flowers of passion . . . delicate flowers of death.

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

PRIZE PATRIOTISM

It seems but a little while ago that Mrs. Brown Potter was pledging Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's word about the country needing protection. In point of fact, it is years ago, and while the matter has passed into much rougher and less beautiful hands than those of Mrs. Brown Potter the country is still needing protection. On what is delicately termed the Fiscal question we do not propose at the present juncture to bestow space. It appears to have occurred to a number of enterprising persons, however, that the country is now needing protection of quite another sort to the protection adumbrated by Mr. Chamberlain. Somebody has written a play which is called sweetly An Englishman's Home. And on the strength of this play somebody else has proceeded to get up a great hubbub as to possible invasions and the desirability of means for the prompt annihilation of the invader when he arrives. We shall not deny the possibility of possible invasions; neither shall we deny the advisability of ample and proper defences. There can be no doubt that the defiant and contemptuous English spirit of "let 'em all come" is a fine and creditable spirit, and that a little healthy capacity to meet 'em if they did come might conceivably be an advantage. And it would seem that we were going steadily and courageously to work in the matter of providing this capacity by the glorious British method of prize competition. Although the play, An Englishman's Home, is understood to have been written by a gentleman possessed of the all-British name of Du Maurier, and although it resolves itself practically into a melodramatic sneer at the expense of the now defunct English volunteers, the persons interested in the defence of England, home and beauty against the foul possible invader desire to establish that defence by means of recruiting volunteers for Mr. Haldane's Territorial Army, in order that it may be brought up to paper strength. The head and front of the movement, of course, is the Daily Mail, which redoubtable organ has secured the active support of Lord Esher and the active and financial support of a gentleman with the all-British name of Eugen Sandow. An anonymous admirer of the Daily Mail has subscribed ten thousand pounds towards recruiting expenses, and another anonymous admirer of the Daily Mail has subscribed two hundred and fifty pounds, which the Daily Mail, with its customary acumen, has split up into prizes for persons who accomplish the most recruiting. It would be interesting to know the names of the two anonymous admirers of the Daily Mail. An admirer who admires your paper and your frothy schemes to the tune of ten thousand pounds, or even to the tune of only two hundred and fifty pounds, should not be allowed to hide his blushes behind the scant cover of anonymity. The Daily Mail is, no doubt, acquainted with the cognomens of both its admirers, and we should like to wager that they are all-British names, and that we could set them down in cold type right off if we were so minded. The Daily Mail's high respect for anonymity and reticence on delicate matters goes without saying. And hence, so far as names are concerned, we must make ourselves content with Du Maurier, Eugen Sandow and the foreign gentleman who is manager for Bovril, Ltd. And we are quite sure that it was none of these gentlemen who put up the ten thousand pounds or, for that matter, the two hundred and fifty pounds, whereby England is to be saved from her ruin. At the time of writing the arduous business of recruiting is proceeding apace. From the top of one of our contemporary's columns we take the following choice headline:

THIRD 1,000.
YEOMANRY FULL.
HEAVY BATTERIES FULL.
CYCLISTS CORPS FULL.
ENGINEERS FULL.
REMARKABLE EXERTIONS OF THE DAILY MAIL.
8,000 MORE WANTED.

We are also able to read wonderfully as follows:

As the result of the appeal which, at Lord Esher's request, the Daily Mail has made for 11,000 men to complete the Territorial Army in the County of London, recruiting continued briskly yesterday. No fewer than 500 men were sworn in last night, an absolutely unprecedented number.

Also:

Many enthusiastic competitors began early yesterday to map out their plans for winning a recruiting prize. They were faced with no harassing details or restrictions. The winners will simply be those who obtain the most recruits. A sum of £250 is, as announced, to be distributed by the Daily Mail on behalf of a reader in the following way:—

First prize	£100
Second prize	50
Third prize	25
Ten prizes of	5
Twenty-five prizes of	1

Almost everybody has a chance. No employé of the Daily Mail is eligible for a prize. A young curate in a crowded district believes that he will be well in the running for a prize.

And further:

After she had sung the patriotic song, "A White Man," at the Kennington Theatre last night, Miss Lulu Valli, the principal boy in the pantomime, called upon the audience not to be content to sit and applaud, but to be up and act like men. Then Colonel Whitehead, of the 21st Battalion (Surrey Rifles), stepped upon the stage, and, surrounded by his officers, made an appeal for recruits. Non-commissioned officers went round the theatre recruiting.

While on a subsequent page we have a pretty picture of Mr. Sandow and a full discovery of the process whereby he "will get rejected candidates accepted." Mr. Sandow, it seems, is presenting one thousand pounds in cash prizes, and, in addition, many gold and silver and bronze medals to the men who make the best improvement under training, and he is also sending out letters to large numbers of his former physical culture pupils whom he thinks would be willing to serve in one or other of the corps. On the whole, it is an odd combination—Daily Mail, Lord Esher, Sandow, two hundred and fifty pounds in prizes, a thousand pounds in prizes, and many gold, silver and bronze medals! We make no doubt that when Mr. Haldane dies "Daily Mail" and "Sandow" will be found written on his heart, whilst a post mortem on the cardiac apparatus of Lord Esher will no doubt reveal to a delighted world the names of the donors of the aforementioned sums of £10,000 and £250 which we have said are to preserve England from her ruin. Meanwhile, let us be truly grateful, like Mr. Haldane. Our homes and our liberties, not to mention our precious lives, were in danger. The Empress of the North, who will probably turn out to be Mrs. Pankhurst, had her withering eye upon us, and there was nothing for it but a roaring melodrama and an equally roaring Daily Mail. With the roaring melodrama Mr. Frank Curzon is filling the New Theatre nightly, and to the edification of the King's lieges. With the £10,250 the Daily Mail has booked 3,000 recruits, so that up to now somebody has paid about three pounds a-head for them. The question naturally arises, who is to be rewarded for these fearful and wonderful patriotic efforts? What will Mr. Sandow get in return for his thousand pounds, his gold, silver and bronze medals, and his physical training "free of all expense"? What will the gentleman who gave £10,000 to the Daily Mail get? And what will the gentleman who gave the £250 get? And, above all, what will the Daily Mail get? And, least of all, what will the 3,000 recruits get? The plain answer, of course, is Nothing. The three thousand recruits may go to the Pavilion Theatre and there behold with six thousand eyes an elderly gentleman in a red coat who will pull his forelock to them what time a young lady from New Zealand explains that he is one of the survivors of the Light Brigade, and that he has known what it means to be fairly short of the necessities of life. This old gentleman did his duty to the satisfaction of his country, and with five hundred and ninety-nine of his brethren in arms he was made the subject of a poem by Lord Tennyson. Oh, the wild charge they made, noble six hundred! And here is one of them ducking and kowtowing to a noble British Music Hall audience, whose memories are not long enough to enable them quite to understand why he is noble and what it was that he helped to do. The old gentleman asks for nothing, and he is liberally obliged. Even so, the Daily Mail's three thousand recruits are enflamed with but one desire—namely, to serve their country with such skill as Mr. Haldane can put into them. Even so, Mr. Eugen Sandow asks nothing from his country (we take it that he is a British subject) other than leave to disburse his thousand pounds and hand out his large selection of gold, silver and bronze medals; and even so the donor of the ten thousand pounds wants nothing, and the donor of the two hundred and fifty pounds is similarly modest. And as for the Daily Mail itself, it wants absolutely nothing at all. And we trust that Lord Esher and Mr. Haldane—not to mention Mr. Asquith—will see that its wants are supplied. For our own part, we will never believe that Providence has reduced this country to the pass of requiring to be buttressed by the Daily Mail and Eugen Sandow. And if, in its inscrutable wisdom, Providence has so reduced us, let us, in the name of all that is decent, go to our doom without having resort to the Daily Mail for a rod or Mr. Eugen Sandow for a staff.

MACKENZIE BELL AND WATTS-DUNTON

MR. MACKENZIE BELL has published a collection of his poems. On the title page the book is described as "The Poems of Mackenzie Bell," and there is nothing to indicate whether the poems be new or old. In the advertising columns of a contemporary, however, we find the following announcement:—

Suitable for Birthday or Wedding Present.

POEMS OF MACKENZIE BELL.

Author of "Christina Rossetti: a Biographical and Critical Study," &c., &c.

The Volume opens with a Dedication to Theodore Watts-Dunton of five pages, and an Introductory Essay of eleven pages, and is divided into sections with sub-titles, of which the following are a few:—"Nature Poems," "Poems of Consolation and of Religion," "Historical Poems," "Travel Pictures," "Humorous Poems," &c.

"There are Poems in this volume that will bring light and cheer to many a drooping spirit."—Academy.

New and Enlarged Edition, Crown 8vo, Cloth Boards, 2s. 6d. net. From all Booksellers or the Publishers.

And in a dedication "To Theodore Watts-Dunton, my beloved friend of twenty-five years' standing," we read: "When I told you some time ago that my collected poems were sold out, and that a new edition with much added work (which had appeared serially since my poems were printed last in volume form) was in contemplation, it was one of the proudest moments of my life when (sic) you acceded to my request to dedicate the book to yourself." The proud moments of Mr. Mackenzie Bell's life are, of course, his own affair. And as for the new edition "with much added work," we should have taken small, if any notice of it, if Mr. Mackenzie Bell had been careful in the matter of his advertising.

It will be observed that in the advertisement we have reproduced above, Mr. Bell causes to appear words which may be construed as praise from THE ACADEMY. In point of fact, however, the volume has not been received by us for review, and we are unable to authenticate the words quoted, though we have made search for them through a file extending over several years. We do not say that a notice containing these words never appeared, but when it did appear it must have borne reference to one of Mr. Bell's earlier publications, and he has no right to make it appear that we have been commending his latest venture, which we consider on the whole to be a foolish production, and not in the least likely to bring light or cheer to anybody's spirit, "drooping" or otherwise. The kind of "cheer" Mr. Bell has to offer is indicated by the following lines from the very first poem in the book:

Poesy lives in everything,
Though only poets find
Her hidden treasures, or can bring
These treasures to mankind.

She lives with Nature evermore
Alike on land and sea;
Where breakers roar far, far from shore,
And on the quiet lea;

Where yonder mountain's soaring peak
Scarce fails to touch the sky;
In yonder vale where, fair and sleek,
The drowsy cattle lie;

In yonder cot where seldom come
The cares of human strife;
In yonder city never dumb
With sounds of human life.

Here, of course, we have the commonest of commonplace expressed in the terms of balderdash. The fact that Mr. Watts-Dunton has accepted the dedication of a volume which contains such ineptitude makes it quite evident that Mr. Watts-Dunton is a very kind gentleman indeed. And Mr. Mackenzie Bell's tears of gratitude become him.

From this same dedication we gather a great deal that is personal to Mr. Bell. He assures us that his sense of gratification in Mr. Watts-Dunton's acceptance of the honour "did not arise from any idea that my work as a poet would be enlinked thereby with yours, and with the poetry of the many illustrious singers, and with the writings of the many eminent men of letters, with whom you will always be associated in literary history." Which, on the whole, is a little superfluous. "My thought," Mr. Mackenzie Bell says, "was widely different. It might be defined as one of wondering delight that a man like myself, with so many and so manifold disabilities, should have achieved such a place, merely by the force of his own personality, as to make this dedication possible." Let us go apart quietly and think of it!

Later Mr. Bell proceeds to flatter the object of his worship in the most barefaced manner. "I shall never forget my first reading of your epoch-marking and superb treatise on Poetry in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' which showed you to be in the high critical succession from Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Inconsiderable as is the number of great poets, and small as is the number of great novelists, the great critic is rarer than either of these. Only once, or it may be twice, in a century does a great critic appear." Mr. Bell here breaks off short. He does not say that Mr. Watts-Dunton is the man, but he leaves us to draw our own inferences. And he continues, still in the strain of the ardent worshipper, "Your verse, particularly the incomparable 'John the Pilgrim,' 'A Starry Night at Sea,' and 'The First Kiss,' has been for years part of the poetry in which my true life centres, whilst the memory of your entrancing 'Aylwin' has refreshed me often." And our heavenly poet winds up in the following startling manner:

Praise has been bestowed on

The music of the nightingale

Across the rising wheat

in "Spring's Immortality" (p. 115), my best-known poem, and I may remind you that the adjective "rising" before "wheat" occurred to me when I was in your company.

One is constrained to wonder what will happen next. Did Mr. Watts-Dunton read this dedication of his beloved friend before it went to press? And, for that matter, did he read any of his beloved friend's poems? Did he read, for example, Mr. Mackenzie Bell's "Exhortation to the Women of Great Britain"? which concludes:

Yet hoping, cease not still to act
Unchecked by gibe or jeer;
With passion plead each stubborn fact,
The hour of dawn is near—

When man-made laws shall cease to vex
The thinkers of our race—
When justice is no word of sex—
As each has found its place.

And is he prepared to affirm, on the strength of his critical reputation, that Mr. Mackenzie Bell, the "poet" of these lines, and of a good many others quite as bad, holds, or is ever likely to hold, any position in English poetry?

We gather from Mr. Mackenzie Bell's "Introductory Essay" that his "poems" have been introduced into schools as an "unseen" reading book. Mr. Bell does not say by whose authority this introduction has been effected. But if it is an introduction in the official sense, and if the poems of Mackenzie Bell are really being imposed upon the childhood of the country as an "unseen" reading book by authority, we have no hesitation in asserting that herein lies a grave scandal, and a scandal which should be made the subject of official enquiry at once. The poetry which is thrust down the throats of small children may seem to be a matter of trifling consequence, but there can be no doubt in the world that the lack of appreciation of good poetry, which is so common a defect in the English adult, is directly traceable to the fact that the literary education of English children is usually begun on indifferent verses. "Casabianca," "Lord Ullin's Daughter," and "The Psalm of Life" are bad enough in their way, but if they are to be displaced by the poetical works of Mr. Mackenzie Bell, Heaven help the infancy of our dear country! Out of justice to Mr. Bell, we reprint a portion of a poem for school recitation (Standards I. and II.), called "Little Bertie":

Rest you in quiet now, my baby boy,
You are in truth your parents' highest joy;—
For though our home has ever been a place
Where Happiness has deigned to show her face,
Yet still your birth increased its bliss much more,
And filled a void there was in it before.

O may your life continue ever free
From taint of shame, what'er your lot may be:
As spotless as the snow-drops oft appear
When first they come to tell us Spring is near:
Such is my wish for you, my jewel prized;
May I yet live to see it realised.

Well, we hope Mr. Bell will live to see a good many things realised, but the sooner he realises that such "poetry" for children is the sheerest blither, and that the person who teaches such "poetry" to a small child is working irreparable injury on its mentality, the better will it be for all of us. If Mr. Mackenzie Bell wishes to go down to posterity as something better than a poetaster eaten up by vanity and foolishness he should ruthlessly cast out, expunge, withdraw from publication, and destroy, quite half of the alleged poetry contained in this volume. We have no particular opinion of Mr. Watts-Dunton, at any rate considered as the figure and portent in which his friends delight to paint him. But, regarding him in his bare capacity as a reviewer for the Athenaeum, or, if he likes it better, in his capacity as the author of that greatly overpraised novel, "Aylwin," we are astounded that he should allow his name to be associated with Mr. Mackenzie Bell's extraordinary volume. The principle of "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours" can be carried a little too far, even among old friends.

JONATHAN SWIFT

To arrive at any just conclusion as to Jonathan Swift and his work, it is necessary to consider briefly the times in which he lived and wrote, for the differences between the author of the present day and the author of that period are enormous. The novel as we now know it was not in existence; its progenitors, Fielding, Richardson, Smollett, Sterne, had not yet appeared on the scene; there was thus a scope for any competent writer which is almost inconceivable to us who live in an age of overflowing railway bookstalls and cheap reprints. A young man from behind the draper's counter or at the city desk had only to produce a few hundred lines of passable blank verse, or a topical pamphlet, to be hailed as a shining light in the literary heavens; and it was quite within the bounds of probability that he would be offered a post as secretary (or, as it might often be construed, trumpeter-in-chief) to some person of wealth and title:

the poet Gay, for example, whose greatest achievement, "The Beggars' Opera," was suggested by a chance remark that Swift made to him, was a silk-mercer's apprentice. He hit upon the idea of an essay treating on "The Present State of Wit," and as a consequence became steward to a duchess. Addison, Pope, Sheridan, and Congreve were contemporaries of Swift, and personally acquainted with him; for a part of his life, indeed, Addison and Sheridan were his warm friends.

The freedom of speech at table and in company which was then so prevalent, was not, as a rule, a deliberate departure from the canons of good morals. The frequent excursions into the realm of scandal gave opportunity for brilliant jest and quip and sarcasm, and the honourable place of the woman, as queen of the home and recipient of man's homage in this sphere, as in the more superficial one of public life, was still far ahead. The dandies could talk, and talk well; their smartness went deeper than dress or display of ruffle and cane, and their capabilities for dealing with serious affairs is evident to anyone who reads the history of the social and political events of the time. Bearing these facts in mind, some little illumination is available as a sidelight on Swift and his work.

It may be true, as Sir Leslie Stephen says, that "to judge Swift by a merely literary standard is to judge a fencer by the grace of his attitudes." But it is difficult to see by what other standard we are to estimate him to-day, since the topical interest and inspiration of his work is practically non-existent. How many readers could tell off-hand the story of "Wood's Halfpence," or of that rousing pamphlet, "The Conduct of the Allies," which sold like wildfire—eleven thousand copies in a month or so? Or even the more famous "Tale of a Tub"? The fact is that the details of these controversies are about as interesting to us at the present day as the details of the Juvenile Cigarette Smoking Bill may be to our descendants two hundred years hence, so that such of Swift's writings that remain current and readable now must have stood the test of time to a large extent by their literary craftsmanship.

The only work of the Dean familiar to the average person is, of course, "Gulliver's Travels," and as the author of that diverting fantasy he is known to half the children in the land. It is a curious comment on the fleeting fashion of human affairs that this book, which was, when published, a scathing topical satire, we now give to children as a birthday or Christmas present. Certainly it is immortal, and the living author who could chance upon as fine an idea in some other sphere would be sure of immortality. Gulliver, a man travelling in the land of Lilliput, where his immense size caused such consternation, and his sneeze engendered a panic equivalent to that of an earthquake, and Gulliver voyaging to the country of Brobdingnag, where the people nearly trod on him because of his microscopic dimensions, and picked him up to quiz him on the palms of their hands, even as he had picked up a Lilliputian, is for ever certain of a place in our affections. The book is really a political pamphlet, but the idea is so fascinating that two hundred years after, even if we are unacquainted with a single one of the events which inspired it, we can read it with pleasure and profit. Portions of it, which satirised cruelly the social customs of England at that time, still retain their sting, as anyone will find who troubles to read again the account of the Houyhnhnms, in whose land horses are the rational reigning power, and human beings ("Yahoos") the servants and inferiors; or the visit to Laputa, the island in the air, where everything was done by mathematics; or the description of the redoubtable academy of Lagado. The way in which Swift produces his effects is more an intense realism than any reliance upon the exact word or the choice phrase. He avoids fine writing; when a man is master of his subject there is no need for it—the simpler the language, in reason, the better. He expresses sentiments the most atrocious, absurd, original, as if they were merely commonplace truths quite obvious to everybody, and maintains them in such a calm and familiar manner that their extravagance does not strike the reader. And this leads us to consider for a moment that marked characteristic of his writings which is perhaps too often alluded to rather glibly as “indecent.” We may be permitted to advance the opinion that in by far the majority of instances his indecency was not intrinsically such at all, but more a tremendous honesty, a colossal sincerity—almost, one might say, a blatant sincerity—which was so much a part of his nature that it would not be denied expression. In adducing this we do not defend him indiscriminately; he wrote some horrible and inexcusable things. With regard to the advantages of sincerity, it is not always the height of discretion to call a man a fool, however whole-heartedly we may believe him to be one; nor should we, as a rule, twist a man about his large ears, or his abnormal rotundity, or his peculiarly fascinating squint; but Swift was troubled not at all by such diffidence or reticence as we of a milder mould might suffer from; in fact, the reader is often inclined to wonder that he escaped physical retaliation at the hands of his victims. He spared neither man nor woman, and such restraint on the part of those whom he insulted and ridiculed is strong evidence as to his astonishingly powerful personality. Mr. Augustine Birrell, usually a genial and competent critic, takes an extreme view of this particular quality of our author. “No fouler pen than Swift’s,” he writes, “has soiled our literature. His language is horrible from first to last. He is full of odious images, of base and abominable allusions. It is a question not of morality, but of decency, whether it is becoming to sit in the same room with the works of this divine.” We think, however, that this attribute, sincerity run mad, goes far to explain some of the darker blots on the writings of the irascible old Dean; he was too anxious about the success of his argument to bother about his comparisons or the beauty of language, and, in all, except the one great instance of duplicity—his love affair—he hated deception intensely.

Somehow, the name of Swift has come down to us as that of a poet. He wrote a large amount of indifferent verse, but practically no poetry worthy of the title. There is nothing very attractive to us in the rather monotonous rhymed couplet which was so plentiful then, and which reached an exuberant stage in the effusions of Pope. Some of the verses to Stella are pretty, if not impressive:

But, Stella, say what evil tongue
Reports you are no longer young,
That Time sits with his scythe to mow
Where erst sat Cupid with his bow,
That half your locks are turned to gray—
I'll ne'er believe a word they say.
'Tis true, but let it not be known
My eyes are somewhat dimmish grown.

Regularly on her birthday the Dean presented her with a copy of some little lyric, the burden of which was not always complimentary. The poem for the year 1719 runs thus:

Stella this day is thirty-four
(We shan't dispute a year or more):
However, Stella, be not troubled
Although thy size and years are doubled
Since first I saw thee at sixteen
The brightest virgin on the green;
So little is thy form declined
Made up so largely in my mind;

O, would it please the gods to split
Thy beauty, years, and size and wit,
No age could furnish out a pair
Of nymphs so graceful, wise and fair
With half the lustre of your eyes,
With half your wit, your years and size;
And then, before it grew too late,
How should I beg of gentle fate
(That either nymph might have her swain)
To split my worship, too, in twain.

The presumption is that Stella was of a meek and tractable disposition if she took this sort of thing quietly.

There is a fine pomposity about the opening lines of the “Ode to Dr. William Sancroft” which does not often occur in other poems:

Truth is eternal, and the Son of Heaven,
Bright effluence of th' immortal ray,
Chief cherub, and chief lamp, of that high sacred Seven
Which guard the throne by night, and are its light by day.

And the eighth canto is worth a partial quotation:

Kind star, still may'st thou shed thy sacred influence here,
Or from thy private peaceful orb appear;
For, sure, we want some guide from Heaven, to show
The way which every wand'ring fool below
Pretends so perfectly to know;
And which, for aught I see, and much I fear,
The world has wholly miss'd;
I mean the way which leads to Christ.

“Cadenus and Vanessa” comes very near to greatness, but, like all lengthy poems tinged by narrative, gives a feeling of flatness when the jingle continues for page after page in this style:

The shepherds and the nymphs were seen
Pleading before the Cyprian queen.
The counsel for the fair began,
Accusing the false creature man.

Its characteristic is ease and fluency rather than impressiveness; and the “Rhapsody on Poetry” comes under the same verdict, although it possesses more energy.

We cannot but conclude that Swift's verse exemplifies the gulf that exists between the clever rhymster and the true poet. His rhyming, too, was occasionally careless, although at least one of his biographers states that he has hardly a faulty rhyme. This was far from being the case, as any reader can discover for himself; he has many bad dissonances. “Sex” and “effects”; “caught” and “fault”; “phrase, are” and “Cæsar”; “ferment” and “vermin,” in the disgusting “Problem”—none of these strikes us as a perfect rhyme. As a rule, however, he was careful, and he is grammatical. But, after all, care and grammar remain but the rattling dry bones if there be no spirit of poesy to breathe on them and give them life. His satires afford us nothing in the way of relief; a few stanzas from the commencement of one will illustrate this:

How this fantastic world is changed of late!
Sure some full moon has worked upon this state;
Time was, when it was questioned much in story
Which was the worst, the Devil or a Tory. . . .
There was a time when fair Hibernia lay
Dissolved in ease, and with a gentle sway
Enjoyed the blessings of a halcyon day.
Pleased with the bliss her friendly union made
Beneath her bending fig-trees' peaceful shade
Careless and free, her happy sons were laid.
No feuds, no groundless jealousies appear
To rouse to rage, or wake them into fear;
With pity they beheld Britannia's state
Tossed by the tempest of a stormy fate;
Wild frenzy through her blasted borders passed
Whilst noisy Faction drove the furious blast;
Calm and serene we heard the tempest roar
And fearless viewed the danger from the shore.

And so on for many pages. One can hardly call this sort of thing by the sacred name of poetry. It was rather an aptitude for flinging some thought—often some pungent thought—into rhyme, nothing more; and obviously it is more interesting from the point of view of comment on affairs of that day than from the standpoint of literary value. It is nothing but prose rhymed, and the very merits of Swift's prose—directness, absence of pathos or sentiment, a general desire to hit everything that offended him with a club, and if possible a big and knobby club—formed the defects of his poetry. Another attribute of the true poet, love for scenery and for aspects of nature, is almost entirely lacking from his writings; he seems to miss the sweeter, more delicate side of things when he essays description, whether in prose or verse. He describes "The Morning" in London:

Now hardly here and there a hackney coach
Appearing, showed the ruddy morn's approach;
The slipshod 'prentice from his master's door
Had pared the dirt and sprinkled round the floor.
Now Moll had whirled her mop with dext'rous airs
Prepared to scrub the entry and the stairs;
The small-coal man was heard with cadence deep
Till drowned in shriller notes of chimney-sweep;
The turnkey now his flock returning sees
Duly let out o' nights to steal for fees;
The watchful bailiffs take their silent stands
And schoolboys lag with satchels in their hands.

This is "catalogue verse" of the purest—and poorest—of which only very small quantities could possibly be taken at one sitting.

To sum up, the aspect of Dean Jonathan Swift's life, viewed broadly from his works and what information we have as to his mode of thought, is bound to strike us as sombre in the extreme. Even as a young man his inherent depression breaks out in his writings. Addressing his muse, before the age of thirty, he says:

To thee I owe that fatal bent of mind
Still to unhappy restless thoughts inclined;
To thee what oft I vainly strive to hide,
That scorn of fools, by fools mistook for pride;
From thee whatever virtue takes its rise
Grows a misfortune, or becomes a vice.

And at later period, about the age of forty-six, we find him lamenting his lack of friends in a most pathetic manner:

'Tis true—then why should I repine
To see my life so fast decline?
But why obscurely here alone
Where I am neither loved nor known?
My state of health none care to learn,
My life is here no soul's concern,
And those with whom I now converse
Without a tear will tend my hearse.

Behind all the social brilliance, behind all the literary fame, we seem to trace an infinite loneliness of soul; and when we consider why this should be, in spite of his notable companions and exalted environment, we find that, added to his naturally domineering and haughty temperament, he is one of the few men in history who never had an intimate and enduring friend among men. Those who loved him became alienated; those whom he loved, died. It seems possible that, had he possessed the quality of binding to himself as with bands of iron some fine, strong nature which understood him and comprehended his strange, distorted outlook, the gentleness which lurked below his imperious, cynical mind, the whole course of his life might have been happier, and more in harmony with that world which never fathomed him. But for this Jonathan there was no David.

FEBRUARY AND ITS SAINT

FEBRUARY is the month when we finally forget the preceding Christmas, and assume an air of expectation for the tardy spring. The holly and evergreen must not be permitted to remain, or divers mysterious penalties will result, according to the old legend which Herrick has rendered into rhyme:

Down with the Rosemary, and so
Down with the Baies and Mistletoe;
Down with the Holly, Ivie, all
Wherewith ye drest the Christmas Hall;
That so the superstitious find
No one least Branch there left behind:
For look, how many leaves there be Neglected there, maids, trust to me,
So many goblins you shall see.

But, in spite of the increasing sense of summer's nearness, February is often the most unkind month of the twelve, and as capricious as any April maiden. She binds us with sterner fetters than mid-winter—and the next day the eaves are dripping with dreary runlets, the horses are sliding and falling, and the streets are black and shining with a wet, treacherous film. Again, she will shrivel us with cold blasts that give the whole town an East-wind scowl, and, collars up, buffeted and belaboured, we dive chilly hands into warm pockets and think of the welcoming firelight of evening. But sometimes—for we must not be too harsh with her, seeing how bravely she strives to wrench her hand from the cruel grasp of Winter—sometimes she will spread dainty, frosty frescoes on our window-panes when winter smiles, more beautiful in their feathery curves than any mortal artist can tell; and at close of day, leaning her banks of cloud heavily to the West, she will hail the departing sun in a burst of dusky splendour, so that the very heavens seem glowing with a divine conflagration, wherefrom the purple smoke ascending drives and blurs before the first faint, dreaming stars. Then we love her, and think of her gifts of heartening flowers, her parting touch to the patient trees, her swift, rare laughter.

Chief among her retinue comes the daffodil, earliest from the far Scillies, splashing even the secret byways of the city with yellow flame, eclipsing of late years the snowdrop and violet with his regal radiance; fain, perhaps, to oust even the primrose, were it not that the pale little flower-faces look up at us so humbly, so winningly. In the parks the crocus will be pushing up ostentatiously his white and purple and rich old-gold trumpets, saying emphatically that spring is really here—often too hastily.

And of the Saint of February, now but a memory, what can we say? He was a real person, that we know—a priest of Rome who was martyred there about the year 270; but of how his fame extended to the wintry North we find little recorded. In the early part of the nineteenth century his celebration was at its height, and of his revels "Elia" wrote charmingly. In a delightful grumble, discussing why the heart should be the portion of our anatomy invariably selected for the transfixing arrow, he remarks: "It will serve as well as any other thing. Else we might easily imagine, upon some other system which might have prevailed for anything which our pathology knows to the contrary, a lover addressing his mistress, in perfect simplicity of feeling, 'Madam, my liver and fortune are entirely at your disposal'; or putting a delicate question, 'Amanda, have you a midriff to bestow?'"

The unkind fate of Saint Valentine appears to have started the custom of interchanging presents as a commemoration, and certainly, in spite of his dwindling fame, he has had what we might term a fair innings. At first, on these occasions, lots used to be drawn for partners among the younger folk, and the gallant knight who found himself apportioned to a fair lady thus was supposed to be her squire for the period of twelve months following. The ultra-sentimental part of it arrived later, and doubtless can be held responsible for the sixteen hundred years or so of its existence. It is an interesting and significant reflection that the festivals which have remained, which have entered into our national life and character, have, with one exception, to do with the central figure of Christianity. Easter, Whitsuntide and Christmas have become with us holiday seasons; but, while Saints' days are plentiful enough in the calendar, we do not allow them to interfere with the customary routine of business. The exception referred to is, of course, "St. Lubbock's Day," and it may be allowed in proof of the rule, although the canonisation of its founder is slightly unorthodox. The attempt to make public and permanent holidays on the anniversaries of events that were merely historic seems to fail with us; there is, perhaps, a sub-conscious sense that inspiration is lacking, that without the serene illumination of some deep, deansless fervour, some mystical, supernatural light, history fades quickly into the grey of the past. From even our cold, Northern natures the desire for mystery is inseparable, so that we celebrate—though thinking, it may well be, little of their inner meaning—on the three chief occasions of the year events beautiful and inexplicable. Other annual celebrations have died out or become moribund.

"Two hundred thousand letters beyond the usual daily average," says Hone, "annually pass through the twopenny post office in London on St. Valentine's Day." And now, in some little back streets, here and there, a couple of dozen hideous caricatures in the frowsy window of a "general" shop represent practically all the homage paid to the poor, extradited Saint whose fragrant souvenirs went to and fro between the young man and maiden of thirty, forty, fifty, a hundred years ago. Poets disdain to write of him, but it was not always thus; from Chaucer downward they used to find plenty of "copy"—if we may be so irreverent—in St. Valentine. Lydgate, a monk of Bury, writes of Queen Catherine, consort to Henry V.:

Seynte Valentine. Of custome yeere by yeere
Men have an usance, in this region,
To loke and serche Cupides kalendere,
And chose theyr choyse, by grete affecioun;
Such as ben move by Cupides mocoun,
Takynge theyre choyse as theyr sort doth falle:
But I love oon whiche excellith alle.

Gay alludes to the supposition that the first stranger seen on St. Valentine's morning will be the "fate" of lad or lass:

I early rose just at the break of day,
Before the sun had chased the stars away;
Afield I went, amid the morning dew
To milk my kine (for so should house-wives do)
Thee first I spied, and the first swain we see
In spite of fortune shall our true-love be.

Shakespeare makes Ophelia sing in her saddest and most distracted mood a little verse which betrays the same idea:

Good morrow! 'tis St. Valentine's day
All in the morning betime,
And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine!

But the poets of the present age have better work to do than to turn a rhyme in aid of memories so faint and unpopular. Sic transit gloria mundi! The Saint has had to bow before the rush of modernity. We have no time to disorganise our fluent affairs again so soon after Christmas with its exuberant irregularities; we are emancipated—immune. The probabilities are that had the celebrations taken place in another part of the year, June or September, they would have continued for a century or so longer; or, let us say, until aero-liners plied between the Bank and Mandalay. But it was not to be; the February Saint is dethroned.

REVIEWS

POETRY AND CRITICISM

Æschylus in English Verse. Part 3. By ARTHUR S. WAY, D.Lit. (Macmillan and Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

THE prevailing custom of comparing all authors indiscriminately with the greatest masters of their several arts imposes on critics, who are determined not to identify advocacy with judgment, the irksome task of reducing redundant praise to juster proportions. The critic with a decent regard for his duties and for the readers, who by reading his criticism accept him as a temporary guide, is forced to emphasise faults when he would have preferred to praise conscientious effort, if that had not already been magnified into high achievement. Otherwise, criticism becomes purely arbitrary, conforming to no standard of taste.

"Mr. Way is a trustworthy scholar," his translations from the Greek "are rendered with absolute conscientiousness and with unflagging vigour," so that "we read his verses with a different kind of pleasure from that which is derived from the ordinary run of translators." "He has made the choruses readable English verse." This is high praise, which Mr. Way deserves. His sustained effort in rendering into English verse the "Iliad," the "Odyssey," all the dramas of Euripides, and now all of Æschylus completed in this volume; his devotion to his contemporaries in undertaking this long task; his fidelity to the originals; his successful efforts to keep the quality of his verse at a sufficient standard of merit; all these facts entitle him to serious consideration. Since his peculiar equality can be judged by a study of these three dramas, the Agamemnon, the Choëphoræ, and the Eumenides, the choice of examples of his style may be left to chance by lighting on each thirtieth page of the volume. At the bottom of page 149 Mr. Way begins the second strophe of a chorus of furies, representing line 350 of the Eumenides. The passage is chosen here because both the Greek and Mr. Way's metre are of medium difficulty:

In the hour that beheld our being begun
Were these our prerogatives ratified:
No dealings have we with Immortals; none
Will deign at the banquet to sit by our side:
No part nor lot for ever have I
In white robes' glistering radiance;
But we take for our portion the desolation
Of homes which are made Strife's habitation:
When the hand is with life-blood of kin made red,
Then hunt we the slayer; our strength shall outlast him,
Be he never so swift; we o'ertake him, we blast him
By the power of the blood ever-fresh he hath shed.

γιννομένηναι λάχῃ τὰδ' ἐφ' αὐτὴν ἐκράσθη ἀθανάτων δ' ἀπέχειν χεῖρας. οὐδὲ τὴς ἐστί συνδαιτυμὲν μετὰ κοινοῦ παλλέειναι θὶ πέπλῳ
ἄμορος, ἀκλήρος ἐνέχθη.
δυσμάτων γὰρ εἰδόμην
ἀνατροπᾶς, ὅταν Ἀρῆς, τίσασθός ὦν, φίλον ἔλῃ
ἐπὶ τόν. ὦ, διόμεναι κρατερον ὅνθ, θυμῷ
μανοῦμεν ὑφ' αἵματος νέου.

Here follows the bald meaning of the text, for readers whose Greek has fallen into disuse:

These destinies were set for us at birth; to withhold hands from mortals. Nor is there any companion with them, cohabiting with us. I was made, without lot, without portion in garments all-of-white. For we took upon us destructions of houses, whenever Ares, being intimate, had slain kin. Oh! chasing after him, though he is strong, nevertheless we darken-his-light, because of fresh bloodshed.

From a comparison of these three versions it will be plain that Mr. Way does not seek such verbal accuracy, nor such homometrical exactitude as to render any lyrical qualities impossible. On the contrary, he shows his appreciation of those qualities in Æschylus, by contenting himself with no model of the Greek drama in English, short of the most elaborate, from which to imitate the form of his lyrical passages. It is said that a great, Cambridge, Greek scholar, suppose it was Shilleto, used to gaze long at the printed page of Demosthenes, in order to photograph his style upon his brain. By such profound study Mr. Way may well have absorbed the sense of Æschylus. Since he is cut off by centuries of inarticulate mumbling from any sounds remotely resembling the speech of Greeks, he had no rapport with the sound of Æschylus, save by studying the notation of those echoes of long-silenced music which Nature alone evokes from the very greatest poets. So Dante still vibrates in Milton. Mr. Way has, therefore, studied conscientiously the notation by which Swinburne represents on paper Greek melody in consummate English lyrics. Who can judge whether that melody does not now sound in even more perfect diapason, in the fuller scale of English, used by a born master of its intricate subtleties? Mr. Way has made Swinburne's forms his model. To expect more of him is to expect that if Shilleto had only filled his mouth with pebbles and shouted to the sea he could have swayed the English people like reeds by his eloquence. Æschylæan, Swinburnian lyric melody is the gift with which Nature endows but very few of the human race. Yet this is how Mr. Way's verse has been appraised: "He has imparted to his English version all the ease and spontaneity of the original"; "the lyrics have a real lyric swing about them"; "the translations are fine poems"; "there is a sonorous roll," in the verse, "a variety of pause, a flexibility, a richness, and a dignity about it that make it approach nearer to the splendid music of the Greek than anything else that has been produced in the same line"; "the splendour of the lyric effects"; "the charm of the language."

On account of the quantity of this sort of criticism it is impossible to let it pass in silence; it will utterly mislead many who would otherwise find much pleasure in Mr. Way's scholarly work. He has probably surpassed all other verse-translators in the amount, the variety in kind, the equality in merit, and the fidelity of his translation. He possesses some lyric ability, as much, perhaps, as Conington exercised, with more enterprise, since he uses more difficult forms. After a careful examination of his lyrical defects it is only fair to add that they lie in the possession of an ordinary ear, and very seldom in any carelessness for which a scholar should be blamed. He seems to write by the eye, not by the ear. If a student of Swinburne reads "Sapphics" or the choruses from "Atalanta in Calydon" aloud to himself, carefully pronouncing all the vowel and all the consonantal sounds (disregarding, of course, the illusive characters which represent them), he will hear how exquisitely the note of the flute, the violin, the reed, the harpsichord, the organ—indeed, of "all kinds of music"—naturally flows from the tongue of a great lyrist, each into the only place in which it can form that melody, which is his peculiar birthright. By making to himself laws of the practice of great masters, so patient a student as Mr. Way may yet produce some one fine lyric effect. It is impossible for any man to have produced such effects at large, who has written so much, without possessing the highest lyrical gifts. The assertion that Mr. Way is not nine feet high leaves him with all the attractions which he possesses.

TUSCANY

Under Petraia, With Some Saunterings. By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." (John Lane, 5s.)

WE can imagine no pleasanter preparation for a leisurely holiday in Northern Italy than the perusal of this volume, and to those who can only indulge in that species of exploration known as "armchair travel" it will be no less interesting. Without conceding the ill-judged rhapsodies of a certain "critic" who, reviewing the author's previous book, wrote, "Match me out of Sterne this high blend of whimsical pathos and idiosyncratic humour!" we fully appreciate the very genuine humour and pathos with which a subject that in careless hands can be uncommonly "dry" is here invested. It takes not only the observant eye, but a rare knowledge of how to record and what to omit, to constitute the ideal writer of a travel-book, and we find here a sufficient approach to that desirable combination to give the reader a great deal of pleasure.

Petraia, the ancient Royal Villa at Castello, was left to the Florentine monks of the Servite Order in 1362, for the purpose of a monastery; it suffered many vicissitudes—war, confiscation, purchase—and finally from the Grand Dukes of Tuscany it passed to the Crown of Italy about the year 1859. King Victor Emmanuel II. had it completely restored, its treasures repaired (in the private chapel are frescoes by Pocetti and a Holy Family attributed to Andrea del Sarto), and used it as his favourite residence. The author was fortunate enough to discover a two-storey house dating from the fifteenth century, the garden of which adjoined the Petraia Park, with a view clear to the Apennines, and of this house and garden she discourses charmingly for many pages, with anecdotes in plenty as to troubles with the contadini and bothers with the workmen. Incidentally, too, she tells of the incomprehensible side of the Italian native. For example, at a large engineering factory under English management one of the employés badly injured another, and the aggressor was sentenced to imprisonment. The fellow-workmen, fearing a permanent vendetta, took counsel together:

They persuaded the victim to make a declaration that he had given the greatest provocation in the first instance, and—of course for a consideration—to profess his willingness to have the sentence reversed and to go to prison himself instead of the real culprit. While the negotiations were in progress it was suddenly recollected that the following Sunday was a great fiesta in that part of the world. The victim struck at once; he was quite willing to go to prison, provided he was let out on Saturday evening, and he would go back on Monday morning and finish his term of imprisonment in peace. This also was arranged—there are few things in Italy that cannot be "arranged." The man was let out on Saturday night, enjoyed his fiesta, and kept his word, returning on Monday morning to prison.

Some amusing digressions occur upon the domestic economy of life in this quarter of the country.

In whatever part of the habitable globe Providence has placed you, it is desirable, if you wish your feet to tread the ways of pleasantness and paths of peace, to be on good terms with your neighbours—but if your lot is cast on a Tuscan hillside it is absolutely essential to your well-being that this should be the case. . . . You will wish your dependants good-morning and good-evening, which salutation they will reciprocate, and possibly add, a happy night. They will also probably inquire if you have slept well, and if on the previous day you have complained of any of the minor evils to which flesh is heir, they will most certainly express the hope that these are ameliorated, and it will be considered graceful on your part if you reciprocate this little civility. . . . You will on every possible occasion avoid the direct path and go wearily round about the bush. If the Briton is an English or, still worse, a Scotch Briton, it may take him long years of practice before he gets so well into this kind of harness that it does not gall him considerably.

The "saunterings" which form the latter portion of the book include a delightful account of an excursion across the border into Switzerland, also a description of a North Italian tour through Bologna, Ferrara, the Euganean Hills, Padua, Verona, and, of course, Venice. In all these places the noted churches and their artistic treasures are treated at such length as space permits; in fact, at times the text becomes rather of the guide-book order, through the effort to condense the information. We like best the pages when, with shrewd but never bitter comment, the author breaks off to chat about inns, people encountered, and the local customs. We may remark that the American girl she meets is a particularly unfortunate specimen, and the German tourist seems not much better, according to the brief notes given:

In these later years she (Venice) has become the playground of Germany, and the northern hordes from Munich and Berlin, which in autumn fill her steamers and gondolas, make one shudder. The women are not pillars, they are columns of too solid flesh, and the way in which they bring down their enormous feet on the delicate Opus Alexandrinum pavements of St. Mark's and the Duomo of Torcello constitutes a real danger to these fast-vanishing works of art. To compare them to Cook's tourists would be grossly to insult the latter.

This is the only expression of real animosity that the author permits herself; but the English "tripper" is just as objectionable in his blatant way.

The illustrations, reproduced from photographs, are very good, and we are glad to see an exquisite portrait of "Jackie," the little cat who is quite one of the characters of the book—to whose memory, in fact, it is dedicated. The story of his death is an interlude of pathos which is not in the least incongruous or overdone.

Considering the mine of information contained in this volume we think it should have possessed more in the way of an index than a mere "table of contents," but this is a drawback which may be remedied, if, like his predecessor, "In a Tuscan Garden," it reaches the second edition, which it seems thoroughly to deserve.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Trade and Tariffs. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON, M.P. (London: Black.)

THIS book is written largely from the point of view of party controversy, as might be expected. But the bias is too obvious to be convincing. Page after page is suggestive of the electioneering platform, for which we conclude the book has been compiled. Passages such as the following do not lead us to regard the author in the light of a scientific and impartial expert:

Unfortunately, Protectionists are able, now as in the past, to trade upon blind passions; and they are content, after every one of their economic arguments has been answered, to repeat the more angry cry of retaliation. "Hit back," "Don't take it lying down," "Treat them as they treat us"—such are the watchwords with which tariffists spread the gospel of Imperial Unity, not reflecting that the very Colonies to which they ask us to give a preference "hit" us all the time.

This sort of thing may suit the platform, but does not appeal to the business man. Mr. Robertson has filled his book to overflowing with figures and statistics, but there are many practical questions which he does not touch, such as the buying of raw cotton in England by German manufacturers, who take it over to their works in Germany, and, bringing back the manufactured article to England, easily undersell our manufacturers, who work under free-trade conditions.

The most significant section is that which deals with "The Modern Failure of Protectionism." This takes up only ten pages in a work of over three hundred, and in this short space deals with ten countries supposed to be collapsing from Protection: France, Italy, Greece, Russia, Austria, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Portugal and Spain. Let us take a few examples on Mr. Robertson's own showing: France has increased her exports in the last few years by £58,000,000; Italy by £29,000,000; Russia by £40,000,000, and Switzerland—most remarkable of all—by £40,000,000. But why are similar statistics omitted in the cases of Germany and the United States? The merest tyro in economics must be aware of the prosperity of these countries under Protectionism.

In a short appendix Mr. Robertson tries to argue that Mr. Lloyd George's Patents Act of 1907 is not, in effect, protectionist. But we find that manufacturing experts hold very strongly that it is a valuable measure of protection. To Mr. Lloyd George may belong the credit of getting the Act passed, but its real originator is a certain Manchester merchant, who has for many years past urged successive Governments to give manufacturers this form of protection, a fact which may or may not be known to Mr. Robertson, but of which no mention is made.

Prince Karl. By ARCHIBALD CLAVERING GUNTER. (Ward, Lock and Co., Ltd., 6s.)

It would be interesting to know what motive induced the publisher of this book to collect together seven such stories as those which appear within its pages. They are in the late Mr. Gunter's worst manner, than which there could be no severer censure. As a writer of melodrama Mr. Gunter had certain qualifications. He had a genuine, if crude, instinct for the dramatic, and his "curtains" gained in effect what they lost in plausibility. Few novelists worked within such narrow limitations, but it would be futile to deny that, when he was content to be least ambitious, he succeeded in being most readable. He lacked, however, the sense of humour, without which it is impossible to construct even a tolerable farce. His attempts at wit in this volume are depressing, and the reader who has displayed sufficient hardihood to struggle manfully through "Prince Karl" will face the remainder of the book with feelings of gloomy foreboding. We advise him not to take the risk. These stories are, for the most part, vulgar, dull and insipid. Of one only—"Skinny's Mother"—is it possible to speak in terms of even partial praise. The others are frankly deplorable. Mr. Gunter's capabilities as a writer of English may be indicated by the following choice fragment of dialogue:

"I have followed you," answered Carroll, "because I don't intend for you to go away with that money and that cloak for which you gave a cheque that I have reason to know will be thrown out of the Warfield to-morrow."

We suppose, however, that the book will find some readers. Certainly the class of person who is attracted by stuff of this kind is adequately catered for by our publishing houses.

A Question of Means. By MARGARET B. CROSS. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

ONCE upon a time the novel—pleasantly defined as "a smooth tale, generally of love"—concerned itself with the varying fortunes of two ardent souls, whom cruel circumstance had thrown apart, but whose mutual affection proved strong enough to overthrow the designs of destiny. We have changed all that, however. Nor can it be reasonably doubted that, on the whole, the change is for the better. For most of us real life begins at the altar, and with marriage we are initiated into the secrets of a world whose very existence we had hitherto but dimly surmised.

In this novel Miss Margaret B. Cross follows the method of the realists. Her lovers are comfortably married before the opening of the sixth chapter, and what follows is concerned with the inevitable and universal experiences of domestic life. The problem, briefly stated, is this: Given a man and a woman, each well-bred and delicately nurtured, who, through sheer stress of circumstances, have fallen upon evil days, how will they comport themselves with regard to their changed outlook? Life, of necessity, resolves itself into a question of means. There are children, in abundance, and the advent of each child means a diminution of the family comfort. It requires a nature dowered with almost infinite capacities for heroism to prove equal to the strain. Miss Cross traces the gradual antagonism provoked between a man of lofty and unselfish ideals and a woman in whom the maternal instinct is the dominant factor. Each character is depicted with a rare power of sympathy. Each is deeply devoted to the other, but each, it would appear, is wanting in the necessary subtlety of comprehension. Disaster looms darkly on the horizon. It is averted, however, by an accident, and—so skillfully has Miss Cross laid her plans—the reader is conscious of no incongruity in this sudden turning of the tables.

The main interest lies with husband and wife, but the other characters demand a word of appreciation. They are vivid, alive, real: Malcolm Hunter, harsh and tyrannical, yet, within his limitations, a not unworthy specimen of English manhood; Cuthbert Anderson, the weak-kneed Anarchist, for ever reviling Fate for his own follies. As a contrast, we have Betty Marvell, whose love-story—touched as it is with a certain wistful pathos—forms one of the most charming episodes in the novel.

We congratulate Miss Cross. From the somewhat drab material of every-day life she has woven a romance of colour, of joy, and of high, heroic endeavour.

Charlotte Mary Yonge. By ETHEL ROMANES. (Mowbray, 6s.)

MRS. ROMANES has written a pleasant little memoir of one of the most charming and gracious figures in the history of Victorian literature. It is easy to forget the debt that the present generation owes to the late Miss Yonge, and, indeed, it must be confessed that her work, at its best, was of a somewhat ephemeral character. She was in no sense a commanding personality. She founded no school; she attracted no followers; she communicated no fresh impulse to the intellectual life of her age. Her style is occasionally slipshod, her chronology sometimes inaccurate. But as a writer of domestic stories she had few rivals, and certainly no superior. Her ideals were those of another age. She wrote for "young ladies" before they had begun to bicycle, and when it was universally assumed that the home was the proper and all-sufficient sphere of a woman's interests. The cry of "Votes for Women" would have left her not merely cold, but indignant. She viewed, indeed, the advent of the "New Woman" with a horror equal to that of her contemporary, Mrs. Lynn Linton, a writer with whom she had little else in common. She was a faithful daughter of the Church, and herein, perhaps, her real interest lies. A friend and disciple of Keble, she brought the Oxford Movement into the homes of thousands of English families. Her pen was always wielded in defence of that Faith which was the chief mainstay of her life, and her readers received without question teaching from the novelist which they would have indignantly rejected had it been proffered by the theologian. From the publication of "The Heir of Redclyffe," in 1853, her success was assured. There was no wavering in the fidelity of her readers, and even her indifferent novels were secure of a hearty reception. Let it be said, in justice to her, that she never courted popularity. She displayed a healthy contempt for mere sensationalism, and for those unworthy artifices by means of which many inferior writers have attained a more remarkable success. It is impossible, however, to acquit her entirely of dullness. Mrs. Romanes recalls a delightful story in this connection:

Tennyson is described by Mr. Palgrave as reading in bed one of Miss Yonge's deservedly popular tales, wherein a leading element is the deferred confirmation of a grown-up person. "On Tennyson read till I heard him cry with satisfaction, 'I see land! Mr. ——— is just going to be confirmed,' after which darkness and slumber."

It is unlikely that the next generation will have any use for a writer so hopelessly out-of-date in her methods and sentiments as Miss Yonge. But it is by no means certain that the next generation will be so adequately catered for in the matter of entertaining and wholesome fiction. Be this as it may, one is grateful for so delicate and sympathetic a presentation of a writer who, in her day and generation, yielded so wide and beneficent an influence.

Araminta. By J. C. SNAITH. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

MR. SNAITH has given us in Araminta Perry—known as "Goose" because she is "rather a silly"—a heroine as refreshing as are the strawberries and cream of Devonshire, her delightful county; and the comedy he has written round her doings is an unbroken entertainment from beginning to end. She is frankly unintellectual, is devoted to Buszard's "cream buns," and despite her size and beauty (she stands six feet in height, and is a re-incarnated Gainsborough) a pillow-fight affords her satisfaction untold; but she is simply irresistible. Her arrival at the town house of her aunt, the Countess of Crewkerne, in a "growler," attired with the unsophisticated art of the village dressmaker, and her reception by a pardonable error of the patrician butler as a new housemaid, are inimitably related; her first interview with that aged, shrewd, sarcastic Aunt Caroline is provocative of a chuckle for every paragraph. "Her behaviour," says Mr. Snaith confidentially, "was such as has never previously been offered to the public in a work of this character. She attempted to shake hands with the butler":

No sooner had the finely chiselled profile of Mr. Marchbanks confronted her than the creature of the straw hat tucked the wicker basket under her left arm, and thrust out her right hand with a spasmodic suddenness which staggered Mr. Marchbanks completely.

"Oh, how do you do?" she said. "I hope you are quite well."

She informs her august London relative and also various other distinguished people that she comes from "Slocum Magna, the next station to Widdiford. They haven't quite got the railway at Widdiford yet, don't you know, but it is only three miles away, of course." That "of course" is delicious; in fact, the "Goose" captivates us all the way, and we are in danger of overlooking other important persons in the story. Aunt Caroline is ruthless—a Gorgon; her sublime pride and insolence override everybody. The account of how Jim Lascelles, the young artist, commissioned by the Earl of Cheriton to copy a Gainsborough in the Countess's drawing-room, copies instead the more attractive flesh-and-blood Gainsborough who comes in to chat with him, is capital. It transpires that Araminta had promised to marry Jim when, at a tender age, he had done knightly deeds for her in the way of apple-stealing down in Devonshire; in the end, of course, the wedding becomes a fait accompli, though not without considerable plotting and worrying on the part of two or three other men caught in the net of Araminta's beauty. The author tries our credulity a little too far in order to force the pace for a happy finish: Jim receives five hundred guineas for a portrait when fifty would have delighted him, seven hundred for another, and, finally, the cheque for £10,000 from Cheriton, who relinquishes the girl to him with a bless-you-my-children attitude of mind, is rather a strain. This is a pity, for it is the only flaw in a most charming book.

Mr. Snaith is one of the few authors who can indulge in asides to his readers with perfect propriety, and he is astute enough to make them brief and witty. Obviously the man who writes merely to tell a good story, with no skeleton of didacticism at the feast, is most likely to succeed; with the exception noted above, Mr. Snaith has told his story excellently, and we can advise those of our readers who have an eye for really fine work in the domain of fiction not to miss this book. They will set it down in high good humour with everybody concerned.

The Silent Ones. By MARY GAUNT and J. RIDGWELL
ESSEX. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

We must admit at once that if the object of a story were to give "thrills" the authors of this book have achieved it admirably; there are portions of it at which the most blasé novel-reader could scarcely avoid a spasm of the "creeps," and as for less hardened devotees of fiction, their hair will surely stand on end. The hero is a negro—for this relief all reviewers will give thanks—who has received a Cambridge education, and who consents at the request of a German professor to search for a valuable script in a city of Central Africa; by which data our readers will acutely observe that the plot is anything but new. Still, the incidents of the quest, and the inclusion of three very jolly Englishmen make a most acceptable mélange, which in its own line could hardly be improved. Practically the whole of the action takes place in or on the borders of the great desert, and there are several apt bits of description attached to this, from one of which we may quote a few lines as illustration:

It takes more than sand to make a desert. A desert is like wickedness, made up of many things. There is sand, of course, sand by the dozen degrees at a stretch, as hot as Hyde Park oratory and as dry as a House of Lords' debate, but that is not all. There are stone fields. There are plates of rock as flat as the Board of Trade, and as hard as the heart of a bank manager. There are ranges of mountains with as many ups and downs as the Kaffir market. There are sandhills that swell from nothing to immensity like a company promoter, and vanish as mysteriously when the breezes change. There are ravines as dark as the ways of a Hebrew moneylender, and there are the bones, the bones of them that have bowed the knee to the spirit of the waste.

The chapter entitled "The Freedom of the Desert" is one of the grimmest things we have read for a long time, and we do not recommend anybody who happens to suffer from "nerves" to sample it at bedtime. With this small reservation we can only add that the somewhat hackneyed theme is treated with surprising power, in a good literary style, and that few readers, we think, will care to put the book down unfinished.

The Fault. By C. T. PODMORE. (John Long, 6s.)

IF we were to attempt any thorough resumé of the plot of this lengthy novel, we should occupy at least a column of valuable space and bewilder our readers' brains to no advantage. The story is ingenious, and passably interesting provided a few concessions are made as to probabilities. We suppose the hoary theatrical artifice of having two characters who shall be practically doubles of one another, and making some "business" with the shaving of a moustache, will never lose its charm for some novelists, for in various fashions the device crops up as regularly as the first primrose, or the centenarians in the halfpenny papers. It must have belonged to one of the original three plots. In this particular instance of its use one man poisons another, changes clothes and belongings with the corpse, and strives to personate his victim for a while; this occurs towards the end of the story and necessitates a climax much too prolonged; for art's sake—if there is any art in it—the last chapters should have been more concise and crisp; the attention of the reader flags. And the author leaves us without any news as to the fate of one of his characters—Elsie, the consumptive girl in the travelling theatre; this is unfortunate, for she is quite the nicest in the book. The villain of the piece is an illegitimate son, who gradually goes from bad to worse, partly through brooding on his origin, and the moral we believe the author wishes to enforce is that the sins of the fathers are visited on the children. He has done it fairly vividly, but, once more, of the manner of its doing—the trick of the "doubles"—we are very tired.

IN THE TIME OF LILIES

ONE of the commonest flowers in any herbaceous border is the beautiful, old-fashioned Madonna lily. There are many statelier and more gorgeous blossoms of the lily kind, but none sweeter; and then, too, the "Mary lily," as it is called in the North of England, has the added charm of association, for no picture of the Annunciation is complete unless a branch of these pure, white blossoms stands up between Mary and the angel.

But it is only since the thirteenth century that painters established the lily as the conventional symbol of the Madonna, for the earlier artists used to surround her with flowers of every sort and colour. It was not until comparatively late that the symbolising instinct of religious minds in a simple age felt that the ideal purity of the Lord's Mother was well expressed in the exquisite purity of white lilies, and so they were dedicated to her service.

But the love of flowers is as old as the earth itself, and the pagan delight in roses and the change of seasons, in harvest and vintage, was a vital force that the Catholic Church assimilated very easily and naturally, without troubling herself about its origin. The old ideas lived on under new names like the savage Christianity of the old Norsemen, who gave their converts choice of baptism or death. The fire-worship of Midsummer Eve was turned to the honour of St. John; St. Valentine became the patron of the pairing season, which is older than the Catholic faith; St. Barnabas' Day was the signal for putting the scythe to the hayfields. In France, again, St. Servais was held responsible for the malicious genius of the weather, and was said to reserve three days of snow to come at his pleasure during May. From daimon to saint was an easy transition for an unlearned and uncritical world, since the old instinct which groped in the unseen remained unchanged. The sense of mankind had always looked for help towards the line of the hills "lift upward and divine," and what did it matter to the peasant of the Middle Ages whether the unearthly presence alighting there were the herald Mercury or the more glorious Archangel? So the pagan roses or the Christian lilies succeeded each other in honour of the Mother of Love, were she Greek or Catholic. And still in the western parts of England Flora and Pomona are honoured in local customs and festivals whereof the original meaning has long been forgotten.

So the pagan sense of charm in Nature was offered in worship of the Virgin-Mother, and all the flowers of the earth were dedicated to her service. And then the literal conscience of the Middle Ages followed hard upon this spontaneous tribute with a serious apology for it; it was symbolic, said the Fathers, "for 'Nazareth' signifieth 'flower,' whence saith Bernard, that the Flower would be born of a Flower, in a flower, and in the time of flowers." And indeed the immemorial instinct of joy in natural beauty gained infinitely from its association with the symbolism of the new faith. All the conventions of secular poetry were pressed into the service of religion, and the beauty in which the decorative instinct of the Middle Ages took delight became an attribute of holiness. The season beloved of poets, "between March and April when spray beginneth to spring," became a symbol of the Resurrection. The conventional gardens of the poets where—

Full gay was all the ground and quaint
And powdered as men had it paint—

were sublimed into the beauty of Paradise, "where everlasting spring abides with never-fading flowers." The decorative instinct of the Middle Ages rejoiced in beautiful and gracious forms, in flowers and gems and chased armour, rich embroideries and birds and painted missals. All sorts of secular beauties were borrowed to describe the heavenly joys of the blessed—Paradise is full of joy and merry song, of gay herbs and trees and "of fowls' song great plenty." And the conventions of earthly love were used to quicken religious zeal—a love-round is written for a "maid of Christ," as the stories of Paris and Tristram were written for ladies of the Court. The Madonna was praised in roundel and ballad, and, as was natural in an age so accustomed to the sight of soldiers, the splendid harness of earthly chivalry served to illustrate the Christian armour of a deadlier warfare. It is said that the French knights used to rise during the reading of the Epistle when it was taken from St. Paul, because St. Paul is represented with the sword of his martyrdom, and so is one of the patrons of warriors. The symbolism of that age was a living thing, all the thought of the world was translated into it. And since flowers were the most beautiful things in a beautiful world their symbolic value was of a rarely suggestive character. It is the strength of a convention that it can be made to convey more than a realistic image, because it quickens the sense and leaves the intellect free. The literal quality of the medieval mind was its strength; there is an indefinite beauty in its symbols that could not be reduced to words, but which was capable, in the hands of a master, of conveying things that could not be uttered. It was through the symbolic medium that Dante made heaven manifest as no later poet could have done. He achieved the impossible with the transcendent simplicity of genius and conveyed the sense of two things in one, image and reality together, in the amazing passage where the river, in a meadow whose banks are painted "with an admirable spring," becomes as he touches it "the two courts of Heaven manifest"; the river "out of its length become round" in a sublime conception is at once mask and reality, the garden of spring and the Holy Rose itself in one, the two mutually enclosed and enfolding and co-existent.

The symbolic teaching of an unlearned age which counted heaven within calculable distance had, in spite of all its crudity, the invaluable advantage that it prepared men for possibilities of miracle latent in ordinary things. There was reason in the mad poet's prayer to be delivered "from single vision" and the deadening rationalism of a later age. But the change of seasons is unchanging, and the passionate rejoicing of spring that made of the earthly season a type of immortal peace, lasted through Dante's time to Dr. Watts', and is likely to last, since joy in Nature does not pass, but grows with the world's age. For the medieval passion for symbolism, which taught the world so much, could not teach it the beauty of winter, because Nature was still a hidden dreadful power and her severities a type of the Creator's wrath, so that the "poor estate of winter" was held by that simple age to be a scourge and terror, and its "freezing rage" was symbolic, not only of the hardships of life, but of the pains of hell. "There at eventide is fire new-kindled, long abiding, and at morning comes an eastern wind felon cold. . . ."

The terror of this idea heightened the joy in the Resurrection—beauty of spring, which was an antithesis to the sorrow of the world. Nor was the purely human interest of spring lacking in that very human age. "Worms go wooing under clod," says the poet, very pertinently going on to remark that "Women waxen wondrous proud," and that was possibly to half the world a matter of more importance than the remoter interest of heavenly affairs. The love-songs of all ages are pitched in the same key; "The world may find the Spring by following her," say the poets of one generation hundreds of years before another discovers that "her feet have touched the meadows and left the daisies rosy." Human nature changes little throughout the ages, and the outworn forms of the thought of one generation sometimes hold lessons for succeeding ones. So the mysticism of early religious art has invested the Madonna lilies of our gardens with an indefinable reminiscent charm, and when the tall white blossoms rise up into the cloudless summer blue their stillness has an air of mystery, as if the breathless stir of the angelic presence had hardly passed by. The garden where the painted lilies grow is a garden emblematic of poverty, the lilies stand before the ideal figure of Catholic worship, who was "humble among women like as a poor woman." But when Fra Angelico saw the courts of Paradise they were as full of flowers as a queen's garden and angels as bright as anemone beds. And the poor were not shut out of those gardens, because "every man may buy heaven, the poor man with his penny and the rich man with his pound." The body of saints is a democracy: popes, kings, shoemakers, all equal and all blessed, move perpetually in an unending slow measure with the ineffable calm of beatitude, among the lilies of eternal spring. The Little Poor Man of Assisi remembered that flowers truly belong to the blessed estate of Poverty, and bade the Garden-brother spare a corner from his pot-herbs for beautiful and fragrant flowers, in honour of the verse which says, "Ego flos campium et lilium convallium." The poor love flowers, though they do not talk much about it, and Madonna lilies never grow better than in the cottage gardens, where they are left a great deal alone. There is much to learn, and more to remember, when we consider the lilies.

CORRESPONDENCE

SCHOPENHAUER AND WAGNER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Those who are interested in Wagner the Philosopher, as well as in Wagner the Musician, will surely agree with me that Mr. William Ashton Ellis has served us badly in the first chapter of the sixth book of his monumental biography of Wagner, where he takes advantage of his position to give us pages and pages of his own particular disagreements with Schopenhauer's philosophy! All that was necessary was a clear résumé of Schopenhauer's system, and then these most interesting letters in which Wagner discourses of it. Instead of which, for eleven pages, Mr. Ellis inflicts upon us his own personal objections to Schopenhauer's philosophy, and then winds up, "Somewhat thus did Wagner ultimately interpret to himself 'friend Schopenhauer's' grand inspiration!" That Wagner had his own modifications of Schopenhauer's system we learn from the quotation from the Venice Diary on page 56, which speaks of "some points for amendment in friend Schopenhauer's system." For these amendments in Wagner's own words we should have been grateful; possibly Mr. Ellis had them in his hands, and yet preferred to give us his own interpretations. Then, on page 28, Mr. Ellis says: "Further, none but a temperament itself inclined to Pessimism—or, let us say, physiologically driven thereto from time to time" (was Wagner a Schopenhauerite at some times and not at others?)—"could have so unreservedly endorsed the ultimate doctrine. How both men may have been physiologically disposed towards the pessimistic view I shall presently endeavour to explain."

Is Mr. Ellis's physical interpretation of a mental phenomenon more interesting to the reader, or more likely to be correct, than Wagner's own description of what happens, in his letter to Roedel: "The becoming perfectly aware of the ideality of Time, Space, and Causality, of their being mere forms of our knowledge, is so sublime an event in our consciousness that, as Schopenhauer makes quite plain, it can only take place in a brain quite abnormally organised, and even then in none but a state of quite peculiar exaltation."

That Mr. Ellis's own brain is not of this special calibre; that he could not have grasped this fact of the ideality of Time, Space, and Causality (or if he had grasped it had subsequently lost the Vision) he tells us in a very foolish speech on page 39, where he says: "It is merely a matter of Time, and the time-possibilities ahead of a disembodied Will must be infinite." Yet of the "disembodied Will," which we can only know here in the embodied state, we can prognosticate nothing in its disembodied state. To speak of the disembodied Will in terms of time is as ridiculous as to attribute the properties of sound to silence—to speak of a B flat Silence, or a Silence in A sharp! It is on a par with the action of the savage when he buries a loaf of bread and a tomahawk in his father's grave! We may be sure that it is only Mr. Ellis, and not Wagner, who shrinks from the Schopenhauerian theory that in this life pain is positive and pleasure negative. Yet, what a hope for the Future that very Theory gives us! If pain is positive and pleasure negative in this phenomenal state of the Thing-in-Itself, does it not give us a right to the idea that after death, in the non-phenomenal state of the Thing-in-Itself, pleasure will be positive and pain negative? If I might dare to premise anything about the Thing-in-Itself in its non-phenomenal state I would premise that on pages 35 to 40 we are given an appreciation of those parts of Schopenhauer's doctrine that afford Mr. Ellis a "ray of hope" that soon after death he may return to earth in a more splendid personality. Then, on page 40, we have Wagner well out of sight and Mr. Ellis in the pulpit with a peroration in the best ecclesiastic manner: "And should one now and then feel faint and heart-sick" (why did he not say, "And should one now and then feel physiologically disposed to pessimism"?), "even in the thick of the fight, there always is that temporary refuge, the central peace (?) a man may find at bottom of his deepest heart, all consciousness forgotten for a spell." (An experience I, for one, do not recognise!) "Let him not abide there too long" (oh, wise caution!)—"that is all—for work will still be waiting for his hand and brain, and ever must his will be wrought to finer faculty of use and service," etc. But oh, what a swift descent from the absurd to the completely ridiculous! From the pulpit we are thrust, without a moment's warning, right into the shop of a vendor of spectacles. For fifteen pages we revel in symptoms, and emerge with the feeling that we have been reading a quack advertisement. "Do you suffer from dyspepsia, weariness, sick-headache, nerve-storms, aching limbs, or biliousness? Then undoubtedly you have astigmatic eyes and must hie you to the oculist." But I cannot for the life of me see what all this has to do with Wagner or Schopenhauer. Did their genius depend on or arise from their astigmatic eyes? Then what a pity that Mr. Ellis and all the rest of us do not suffer from a similar eye-complaint. Or was it that Schopenhauer would have been a philosopher in any case, but quite a different kind of philosopher if he had known no eyestrain? Would the lack of that disease have prevented him from making any of those discoveries with which Mr. Ellis agrees? Obviously not: those parts of his System were the indubitable product of his mighty Brain! It was just those vexing little pessimistic conclusions with which Mr. Ellis does not agree that were caused by the "eyestrain"; we with our clear, unastigmatic eyes can see how wrong and how irritating they are, and how Wagner, where he endorsed them, was also suffering from eyestrain! The Preface, too, is surely in questionable taste? The Biography is for the general public, not for Mr. Ellis's personal friends only, to whom this full-page photograph of his little house in Surrey may be of interest. The splendid translations Mr. Ellis has given us of Wagner's prose works render unhappy this lapse in the treatment of the Schopenhauer chapter all the more remarkable.

J. T. PRESSLIE.

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Cook speaks truth. I am certainly in the position of the gentleman of whom "the poet" (sic) sang:

"'E don't know where 'e are."

It is difficult exactly to locate one's position when jousting with Mr. E. Wake Cook, there is nothing particularly resembling a lance in his hand, and he does stir up such a large quantity of dust.

"I calmly repeat," says Mr. Cook (speaking of Tintoretto's "Last Judgment"), "that the general result is chaos." Now, this is the first time that Tintoretto's "Last Judgment" has come into the argument; it was "The Paradise" in Mr. Cook's last letter. Which does he mean? In any case, I am inclined to prefer John Ruskin's criticism, part of which, upon "The Paradise," I quoted last week, if only for the fact that Ruskin uses his mother tongue with an amount of grammatical correctness which does not always distinguish the work of Mr. Cook. I don't wish to be unduly severe, but really! Too split infinitives in so many lines! And in THE ACADEMY, too!

Mr. Cook should re-read Ruskin's description of the "Last Judgment" of Tintoretto in the Church of Santa Maria dell'Orto. Vol. II., p. 196, "Modern Painters." If, after that, he feels inclined to indulge further in his fourth-rate rhapsodies I'm afraid we must regard him as one of those:

"clouds without water, carried along by winds; autumn trees without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; wild waves of the sea foaming out their own shame; wandering stars for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved for ever . . . murmurers, complainers walking after their lusts (and their mouth speaketh great swelling words), showing respect of persons for the sake of advantage."

I can't be angry for long, though, with Mr. Cook; I have just been reading his delightful "Anarchism in Art" and revelling in the quaint things he does with the King's English and the "howlers" he comes in matters of fact.

Yes, I knew all about the way Dante's poem is divided into three parts, but, oh, let me implore Mr. Cook to weigh well his winged words! Let us pause for a moment and try to imagine the earnest student of the year 2009 (when, they say,

A Special Offer to Smokers

OUR JAMAICA CIGARS are equal in aroma and taste to those from Havana, whilst the cost is half that of the latter.

A sample box, containing 25 of the following brands of Cigars, will be sent post free to anyone filling in the coupon below and enclosing P.O., cheque or stamps for 10/6 to us:—

Flor	80/- per 100	Bouquet Finos ...	35/- per 100
Celestiales	65/- per 100	Caribas	33/- per 100
Favoritas	65/- per 100	Conchas Especiales	30/- per 100
Ideales	45/- per 100	Exquisitos	27/6 per 100
Perfectos	45/- per 100	Excellentos	27/6 per 100
Governor	42/- per 100	J. T. C.	25/- per 100
Reina Victoria ...	38/- per 100	Operas	22/6 per 100
Londres Imperiales	37/6 per 100	Young Ladies ...	20/- per 100

IMPORTED EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES:

The "Seymour"	6/6 per 100
Lord Rothschild, Gold Tipped	9/6 per 100

TURKISH CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 1	6/6 per 100
----------------------	-------------

VIRGINIA CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 2	5/6 per 100
----------------------	-------------

RUSSIAN, BRAZILIAN, AND LEAF-COVERED CIGARETTES... .. from 8/- per 100

TOBACCO MIXTURE:

Medium... ..	10/- per lb.	Mild	12/- per lb.
--------------	--------------	-------------	--------------

JAMRACH & CO.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS

199 PICCADILLY, LONDON

Suppliers to the Nobility.

Established 1871.

Please forward me, post paid,.....

for which I enclose

Name

ACADEMY. Address

it will be all the same), with his "Poole's Index" and some notable numbers of THE ACADEMY, confronted, in the reading-room of the British Museum, with the thrilling fact that Mr. E. Wake Cook "simply hates" Dante's "Inferno"! And considers John Martin "the most amazing genius that ever appeared in the Art world."

Mr. Cook admires the art in Dante's "Inferno"; he recognises its greatness, and—he "simply hates" it. One would have thought such an attitude implied complexity of mind rather than simplicity. Mr. Cook has nothing to offer against Chesneau's opinion, nor that of Charles Lamb; surely these knew more of the matter than Christopher North and Bulwer Lytton. A model of mine once wandered round my studio till she came to a reproduction of Tintoretto's "Milky Way." She seemed impressed by it, so I asked her what she thought of it. "Oh," said she, while a look of pitying contempt spread over her face, "I've seen much dirtier pictures than that" (a fact). We laugh at the model, but her point of view is largely the point of view of Mr. Cook and his school, if traced to its logical end. Mr. Cook thinks Rodin's drawings "the weakest things ever published," but that is because Mr. Cook has never yet seen the honey in the lion's carcase, and, although wielding Samson's weapon, has not accounted for many of the enemy—in short, he is unacquainted with Strength.

Mr. Cook says "very little of M. Rodin's work will stand examination or competent criticism by anyone knowing anatomy." This is because Mr. Cook has never yet seen any of M. Rodin's work. I put it that way because Mr. Cook is sensitive to affront, and I have been well brought up. How, then, shall Mr. Cook rightly judge John Martin? Let me implore Mr. Cook to:

"Marshall his silence for the Great Oblique,
Not piffle out his soul in private pique."

Let him forswear Martin for a time, and really start on a sincere study of Dante and Tintoretto. Let him take this loathsome decadent school to his bosom and warm it with the heat of his soul artistic, and perchance, as happened to the saint in the legend, he will find the leper is in truth turned to the Christ in his arms and the dull eyes blazing out as suns. Let him not forget:

"... Fresh births of beauty wake
Fresh homage; every grade of love is past,
With every mode of loveliness; then cast
Inferior idols off their borrowed crown
Before a coming glory; up and down
Runs arrowy fire, while earthly forms combine
To throb the secret forth; a touch divine
And the scaled eyeball owns the mystic rod:
Visibly through his garden walketh God."

CALEB PORTER.

'Green Room Club, Leicester Square,
February 6th, 1909.

THE KING'S ENGLISH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Any nervous perturbation which editors and others may have had in regard to English composition, due to those goliwogs, The Authors of "The King's English," must now be dispelled. "The Authors" themselves have unwittingly relieved the tension by having their unique specimen of English composition published in THE ACADEMY of the 30th ult. Their letter extends to half a column, and contains seven pairs of brackets. The brackets alone condemn it, for every writer of correct English avoids brackets as far as possible. Here, however, "The Authors" use them with unpardonable prodigality. Again, the phrasing of their letter is ugly—wretchedly bad. For instance, take the sentence:—

"We ask a 'French Linguist's' pardon for omitting the reservation; but we have considerable hopes (sic) that no one else has been deceived."

"Omitting the reservation" is obviously bad English. The completion of the sentence is perhaps worse—"but we have considerable hopes that no one else has been deceived." The equivalent in King's English is—but we hope that no one else has been misled. Deceit is not in question; therefore "deceived" is not the proper word. "Hopes" is not good English. "Considerable hopes" is Covent Garden English. It is on a par with We have considerable faiths that no one else has been deceived.

"Hopes" is only permissible in grouping enumerated single instances—e.g., "The Authors" might say with propriety—

We hope to write better English; we hope to be rich, and we hope to enjoy health—these are our present hopes.

As to the logic of "The Authors'" letter, these gentlemen ought to know that it is neither scholarly nor polite to dictate to a critic what the manner of his criticism ought to be. The logical attitude should be to controvert the statements submitted by their critic. "The Authors" ignore the matter in the first instance, and say that a "French Linguist" "instead of" doing such and such, "might have" done such another thing. Very accommodating to "The Authors," but not scholarly debate.

"Seduced" into buying a book is not good English. Induced is the word—e.g., I will not be induced to buy "The King's English" after perusing the sample submitted in the shape of "The Authors'" letter.

W. McC.

Glasgow, February 9th, 1909.

THE SOPHISTRIES OF A RADICAL NONCONFORMIST

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It is rather amusing to learn, from an admission in Mr. Harold Spender's review in last Saturday's Daily Chronicle of the work on "Human Nature in Politics" by Mr. Graham Watson, that "the time has passed when we could speak seriously about the divine right of the people, or say with any seriousness that 'the voice of the people is the voice of God.'" Let it be left to the strangely constituted minds that have ever held this astounding belief thus formally to repudiate it. Whilst it is, however, doubtless highly satisfactory that Mr. Spender and any of his brother Socialists should own themselves at length convinced of the falsity of such obviously foolish propositions, his implied claim in so doing to speak on behalf of his countrymen should surely be denied by those who have never entertained the absurd doctrines he now disavows.

Moreover, not content with this gratuitous and uncalled-for recantation in the name of his contemporaries, the oracle of the Westminster Gazette next proceeds—with the sophistry so typical of that organ of Radical Nonconformity—to impugn by innuendo the voice and sane judgment of men of the past. "We now know," he continues, "what the ancients knew before us, that people in the mass, like individuals alone, are humanly liable to passion, prejudice, ignorance and error." An under-statement of this nature is equivalent to actual misstatement. The ancients did not believe that people in the mass were merely liable to error in the same measure as individuals; the philosophers and statesmen of antiquity having intuitively arrived at a conclusion very similar to that scientifically established in modern times, concerning the disproportionate increase of the evil elements in any large and mixed gathering of human beings. In the forcible words: "Senatores, boni viri; senatus, mala bestia," the Roman orator tersely expressed the truth so ably set forth by Dr. Gustave Le Bon in his "Psychology of Crowds," that the aggregate, namely, of error, ignorance and prejudice contained in every popular assembly would be by no means adequately represented by the simple sum of its units—the process being in this case a geometrical rather than an arithmetical progression.

ARTHUR F. HOPKIRK.

London, S.W., February 9th, 1909.

THE BRITISH WEEKLY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Surely in certain most flagrant instances of vulgarity the religious Liberal Press stands much in need of some friendly advice, which would be none the worse of coming from within the party. Public opinion, however, seems to have accepted that such advice published in a Liberal paper entails disloyalty to one's colleagues.

In any case, let attention be drawn to a perfectly atrocious habit which every now and then is exemplified in the columns of the British Weekly, a journal that claims to be nothing if not setting a faith for Liberals. So does this sin against good taste that I do not know with what to match it in respect of forming an eyesore.

Let the mind be thoroughly imbued with the solemnity of the tone pervading its leading articles, which, of course, are thickly strewn with sacred names. The impression left should be one of detachment from worldly affairs. The second page of this journal is, with the exception about to be noted, kept free from advertisements. However, it is by no means uncommon to find on this second page, into which the solemn leaders invariably run, a small space reserved for furthering the sale of some medicament. The truly refined mind, deeply imbued with the spirituality of a subject constantly demanding the repetition of sacred names, surely does not welcome the sudden appearance of any worldly advertisement whatever, much less one so contrary to a sense of fitness as that quoted below. What sort of good taste can it be that dictates an abrupt mental transition from the subject of God, Christ, the Church, the Atonement, etc., etc., to an advertisement such as this: All who suffer from Constipation or Piles are invited to write for advice and particulars of inexpensive and unfailing remedy to Nurse Cruse, etc. Mention paper. Perhaps Dr. Robertson Nicoll has laid to heart the words of Geo. Meredith in "Diana of the Crossways": "There is nothing the body suffers that the soul may not profit by."

DAVID IRVINE.

National Liberal Club, February 7th, 1909.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

The Life of Philibert Commerson. An old-world story of French travel and science in the days of Linnæus. By the late Captain S. Pasfield Oliver, and edited by G. F. Scott Elliot. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.

General Lee, Man and Soldier. Thomas Nelson Page. Laurie, 6s. net.

FICTION

Hilary Thornton. Hubert Wales. John Long, 6s.

His Father's Honour. D. Christie Murray. Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.

The Sex Triumphant. A. C. Fox-Davies. George Routledge and Sons, Ltd., 1s. net.

The Heart of a Gipsy. Rosamond Napier. Duckworth, 6s.

The Measure of Our Youth. Alice Herbert. Lane, 6s.

An Actress's Husband. Gertrude Warden. White, 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

George Canning and His Friends. Containing hitherto unpublished letters, Jeux D'Esprit, etc. Edited by Captain Joceline Bagot. With illustrations. In two volumes. Murray, 2 vols., 30s. net cash.

The Story of Libraries and Book-Collecting. By Ernest A. Savage. Routledge, 2s. 6d.

The World We Live In. E. A. Brackett. Rider, 2s.

Psychic Philosophy. As the foundation of a Religion of Natural Law. By V. C. Desertiis, with introductory note by Alfred Russel Wallace. Rider.

The Journal of John Mayne. During a tour on the Continent upon its re-opening after the Fall of Napoleon, 1814. Edited by his grandson, John Mayne Colles. With numerous illustrations. Lane, 12s. net.

MUSIC

Pussie's Christmas (song). Grannie Weldon. Weekes and Co., 4s.

A Floral Sanctuary (song). Jules Rousseau. Weekes and Co., 4s.

The Song of the Sparrow. Grannie Weldon. Weekes and Co., 4s.

The Little Boy, and Robin Redbreast's Nest (song). Grannie Weldon. Weekes and Co., 4s.

Noël (song). Jules Rousseau. Weekes and Co., 4s.

Chant sur le Berceau (song). Georgina Weldon. Weekes and Co., 4s.

Night Thoughts (song). Georgina Weldon. Weekes and Co., 4s.

Lead, Kindly Light (song). G. W. Ashley. Weekes and Co., 1s. net.

Danse Serpentine. Richard Knight. Weekes and Co., 2s. net.

Round. Frederick Kitchener. Weekes and Co., 1s. 6d. net.

Folk-Song Series (Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12). Percy Godfrey. 3d. each.

Faithless Sally Brown (Four-Part Song). Herbert W. Pierce. 4d.

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, in key of G. Alfred D. Parker. 3d.

POETRY

Hic Et Illic. Poems written at Home and Abroad. By H. J. Bulkeley, M.A. Routledge, 2s. 6d.

Thoughts in Solitude. The Story of the Bramble, and Other Poems. By Graham-Burr. Stock.

REPRINTS

Poems of Edgar Allan Poe. With a sketch of the author. By John H. Ingram. Routledge, 1s.

A Midsummer Night's Dream. Edited by K. Harvey. Routledge, 1s. net.

The Merchant of Venice. Edited by K. Harvey. Routledge, 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

Published under the Direction of the Foreign Translation Committee.

CHISWINA.—The New Testament, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 4d.; Heroes of the Faith, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 8d. For use in South Africa.

CREE.—The Pathway of Safety, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 4d. For use in North America.

DUTCH.—Daily Prayers for Boys and Girls, 32mo, paper cover, 1d. For use in South Africa.

CAR (NICOBAR).—The Order of Morning Prayer, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 6d. For use in the Nicobar Islands.

FRENCH.—Helps to Worship, 32mo, cloth, 8d.

HAUSA.—Service Book (Portions of Common Prayer and Hymns), fcap. 8vo, cloth, 10d. For use in West Africa.

LUMASABA.—The Church Catechism, fcap. 8vo, 3d. For use in the Uganda Protectorate.

LUNYORO.—A Catechism. Part II. Cloth, 3d. For use in the Uganda Protectorate.

LUGANDA.—The Gospel of St. Matthew, with Commentary, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. For use in the Uganda Protectorate.

UBIR.—A Catechism and Psalms and Hymns, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 6d.

URDU.—The Book of Common Prayer. (Roman type.) Revised Edition, demy 8vo, cloth, 3s. For use in India.

XOSA.—Form of Licensing a Clerk to the Cure of Souls, fcap. 8vo, 1d. For use in South Africa.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

Cloth extra. Large Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

THE NEW WORD

By ALLEN UPWARD,

Corresponding Member of the Parnassus Philological Society, Athens.

In view of the great circulation recently obtained by rationalist and materialist writings, the publisher believes that many persons may be glad to have their attention drawn to a book, not the work of an ordinary Christian Apologet, which meets the rationalist on his own ground and answers him out of his own mouth.

"As I turn over the leaves and re-read the passages I have marked, I utterly despair of conveying within my appointed limits any inkling of the author's fertility of thought and illustration."

—MR. WILLIAM ARCHER in MORNING LEADER.

"A spacious mansion of delight. . . 'The New Word' is a book of rare enchantment, with something of the freshness of the world's youth about it."

—MR. HARRY JONES in DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The distinguished Philhellene, Mr. Allen Upward, now acknowledges the book in a second edition. . . The sort of writing that means stimulus to the well grounded."—CHURCH TIMES.

"Words fail to convey the wealth of ideas, novel viewpoints, wit, and amiable sarcasm which adorn the pages of 'The New Word.' . . It is a most refreshing criticism of our mechanical modes of thought."

—BERKELEY JOURNAL.

"It touches the whole gamut of knowledge. . . The style is luminous, the matter is freshly and originally put, with the skill of a master."

—WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 44 Fleet Street, E.C.

DARTMOOR.—BOARDING-IN, PRIVATE HOUSE; Men only; from November to March; very suitable for reading parties; lovely country, warm, and sheltered position. — Apply "CANTAB," Middlecote, Ilington, S. Devon.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS, &c.

32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.

AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
DIRECTORIES.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Farmer and Henley's Slang Dictionary, 7s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale

A SMALL COLLECTION OF BOOKS. —ENGLISH LITERATURE, many First and Early Editions. To be Sold at great sacrifice, single volumes or the lot.—List on application to "Q," c/o DAWSON'S, 121 Cannon Street, E.C.

THACKERAY'S (W. M.) WORKS. with Illustrations by the Author and others; 26 vols., cr. 8vo., publishers' cloth binding, new and unopened; published by Smith, Elder (1894) at £4 11s.; offered at 50s. net.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MASSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—The WEST KENSINGTON OFFICES. Authors' MSS., Translations, &c. Legal and General Copying. Private dictation room. Circulars, etc., duplicated. Usual terms. References. Established sixteen years.—SIKES & SIKES, 223A Hammersmith Road, London, W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE FEBRUARY BOOK MONTHLY

WHICH IS NOW ON SALE, 6d. NET, CONTAINS A SYMPOSIUM BY THE LEADING PUBLISHERS ON WHY THE WINTER PUBLISHING SEASON WAS BAD. THIS IS A MATTER WHICH INTERESTS WRITERS AND READERS ALSO, AND THEY SHOULD MAKE A POINT OF READING THE SYMPOSIUM.

Publishers of the "Book Monthly," SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

LORD ROSEBERY MR. BENJAMIN KIDD AND PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Wardens, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

A GREAT novel in GREAT demand is
PRIESTS OF PROGRESS

By G. COLMORE. (Second Edition.)

It throws a searching ray of light on a great public question.

The SPECTATOR says: "The book is powerfully written, and its subject demands attention."

DID SHE DO RIGHT?

By A. J. MACDONNELL.

A Story of Modern Rome and a Mixed Marriage.

FIRST TWO OPINIONS.

"An interesting romance. The authoress's pictures of present-day life in Rome are excellent."—BIRMINGHAM POST.

"The characterisation is on broad lines and is quite effective, while the plot runs merrily through 400 pages."—MANCHESTER COURIER.

THE BROKEN SNARE

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN.

A powerful, psychological study of the marriage relation by a new writer, portraying the struggle and ultimate surrender of a man and woman of high ideals who do not believe in the marriage ceremony. Beautifully and brilliantly written."

TOM GALLON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN

READY NEXT WEEK at all Libraries and Booksellers.

OTHER NEW & NOVELS.

THE TRICKSTER - G. B. Burgin.

THE LEVELLER - Alexander McArthur.

THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE

E. Everett Green.

BANZAI! - "Parabellum."

AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE. Richard Duffy.

ANOTHER LARGE EDITION NOW READY.

THE DEVIL IN LONDON, by Geo. R. Sims. 1s. 6d.

London: STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.

The Prize Novel of 1909. 250 Guineas Award

THE FAITH OF HIS FATHERS

By A. E. JACOMB. Price 6s.

Out of 156 MSS. submitted in the great First Novel Competition of last year Mr. ANDREW LANG, Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, and Mr. CLEMENT K. SHORTER have selected the above as winner of the prize.

This book was subscribed well on the day of publication, and is now in brisk demand. Repeat orders from Libraries and the Trade are coming in every day.

OPINIONS OF THE DAILY PRESS.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says: "It is, indeed, as the publisher claims for it, an absorbing tale, holding the attention from first to last by reason of its intense human interest, and notable also for its truth and for its dissection of a very real, very dangerous, and almost invincible type of religious temperament."

THE DAILY CHRONICLE says: "The knowledge of human nature it displays, the craft of the characterisation, the tragic force, increasing as it goes along, and culminating in the terrible irony of the last few lines, are exceptional. There is no other word for it—Mr. Jacomb has written a notable book."

THE ACADEMY says: "The Faith of his Fathers" has won a prize of two hundred and fifty guineas offered in a recent 'competition,' and has, we think, won it worthily. For there is in it no trace of the straining after effect, the meaningless, ornate paragraph, the extravagantly 'clever' dialogue, and other inartistic superfluities which are indications of the passion for ephemeral distinction; it proves, on the contrary, to be rather simply written, tense, straightforward, and grimly earnest."

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL CHRONICLE says: "This is actual, real, and powerful work; it is painful, perhaps, but it is true."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN says: "There is nothing meretricious about it; it is hard, prosaic stuff, hammered out unflinchingly, with little of artifice, and with the appearance of detachment from the moral issues; . . . sound and faithful work."

THE LIVERPOOL DAILY POST says: "That 'The Faith of his Fathers' should be a first novel is nothing less than amazing. Mature and well-considered workmanship stands out clearly on every page. . . . Above all, the great tragic theme which is the central issue is certainly dominant, and worked out to a ruthless and convincing close. . . . Altogether, it is difficult to state in a few words how highly we think of this novel."

ANDREW MELROSE, 3 York St., Covent Garden, W.C.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community. Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net. A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 22 2s. net. [Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.d., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

Numerous complaints having reached this Office
as to difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY, we publish below a first list of the names and addresses of Newsagents and Booksellers at whose establishments THE ACADEMY is always on sale. Further lists will be published from time to time.

Messrs. Samuels and Taylor, 7 New Broad Street, E.C.	Mr. W. Morflow, 19 Edgware Road, W.	Messrs. F. Calder Turner, 1 Bathurst Street, Hyde Park Gardens, W.,
Messrs. Davies and Co., 23 Finch Lane Cornhill, E.C.	Messrs. Scripp's Library, 13 South Molton Street, W.	Also 8 Craven Road, Paddington, W.
Mr. E. Bora, 80 Copthall Avenue, E.C.	Mr. H. Offord, 15 Avery Row, Brook Street, W.	Mr. M. E. Wilson, 8 Clarendon Road, Holland Park, W.
Mr. James Barker, 2 Castle Court, Birchin Lane, E.C.	The Manager, Foreign Bookstall, Café Royal, 68 Regent Street, W.	Murley Brothers, 112 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Messrs. Leathwait and Simmons, 5 Birchin Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bolton's Library, 81 Knightsbridge, W.	Mrs. E. Jarvis, 186 Holland Park Avenue, W.
Mr. George Blair, 16 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Mr. E. George, 13 Swallow Street, Regent Street, W.	Mr. M. Pittman, 41 Notting Hill Gate, W.
Messrs. Pottle and Sons, 14 and 15 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Messrs. Knowles and Co., Crown Court, Pall Mall, W.	C. H. Cooke, 11 Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Mr. T. Jenner, 40A King William Street, London Bridge, E.C.	Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Poulter, 8 Bury Street, St. James Street, W.	Mr. S. C. Carter, 1 Porchester Gardens, Queen's Road, Bayswater, W.
Messrs. Wm. Dawson and Sons, Ltd., 121 Cannon Street, E.C.	Messrs. May and Williams, 160 Piccadilly, London, W.	Messrs. Stanesby and Co., 179 Sloane Street, Belgravia, S.W.
Messrs. E. T. Bottom and Co., 51A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 97 Queen Street, E.C., and Also at 165A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 32 Chancery Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bingham and Co., 97 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, W.	Messrs. M. Hildreth and Co., 10 and 11 Fulham Road, S.W.
Mr. George Blair, 11 King Street, Cheapside, E.C.	Mr. F. Batson, 82 Grosvenor Street, W.	Mr. Henry Roberts, 2 Lower Grosvenor Place, S.W.
St. Bride's Publishing Co., 96 Fleet Street, E.C.	The News Stores, (next) Hyde Park Hotel, Albert Gate, W.	Messrs. Sootter and Law, Belgrave Mansions, Grosvenor Gardens, S.W.
Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Co., 37 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.	Messrs. T. Rastall and Son, 81 Ebury Street, London, W.	Mr. J. Shrubb, 165 Ebury Street, Pimlico, S.W.
Mr. Harrison, Devereux Court, Temple, W.C.	Mr. T. Wyatt, 198 Ebury Street, Pimlico, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith, Bookshop, Sloane Square, S.W.
Messrs. Parnell and Co., 63 Southampton Row, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.	Mr. W. Weaver, 157 Great Portland Street, W.	Messrs. Wright and Son, 43 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.
Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookstall, Hotel Russell, Russell Square, W.C.	Messrs. Toler Bros., Ltd., 10 Coptic Street, Bloomsbury.	Messrs. Jesson Bros., 129 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. C. G. Norton, 38 Marchmont Street, Russell Square, W.C.	Mr. William Green, 138 Great Portland Street, W.	Mr. A. F. Vedy, 265 and 420 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. R. C. Willis, 1 Green Street, Leicester Square, W.C.	Mr. Noble, 28 Upper Marylebone Street, W.	Mr. George R. Riches, 510 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. J. Browne, 5 New Street, Covent Garden, W.C.	Messrs. Keith, Prowse and Co., Bookstall, Langham Hotel, W.	Mr. R. Snare, 21 Lower Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Mr. H. Hunt, 12 Bury Street, Bloomsbury, W. C.	Mr. I. Carpenter, 17 Lancaster Street, Lancaster Gate, W.	Messrs. Blake and Co., 62 Putney High Street, S.W.
Mr. W. G. Palmer, 5 West Kensington Terrace, W.	Mr. M. A. Ridge, 43 Craven Road, Hyde Park, W.	The Idler's Own Newsagency, 169 Upper Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.
Messrs. Yates' Library, 79 Wigmore Street, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith's Bookshop, 19 Craven Road, Paddington, W.	Mr. R. Andrews, 120 Upper Richmond Road, East Putney, S.W.
Mr. H. Perkins, 3 Seymour Place, Portman Square, W.	Messrs. Crockett and Co., 22 Leinster Terrace, W.	Mr. Wm. John Arnold, Approach Book Stores, London Bridge, S.E.

Persons who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested kindly to communicate with

The Manager of THE ACADEMY,
 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BELOVED VAGABOND"

SEPTIMUS

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. 6s. SECOND IMPRESSION

"Light-hearted, whimsical, a thing of infinite laughter, which is nevertheless continually on the verge of tears, Mr. W. J. Locke's new novel has a tone altogether its own, a tone deliciously elusive and enchanting."—Daily Telegraph.

"All the elements that most delight the admirer of Mr. W. J. Locke's novels are present in his new one 'Septimus.'"—Morning Post.

"Unquestionably Mr. Locke's 'Septimus' is one of the most original and most entirely delightful novels of recent years. It is written with fresh humour and rare sympathy; its analysis of character is masterly."—Birmingham Post.

"... a lively, jolly, entertaining book, written in high spirits and eminently adapted to raise the reader's spirits as high as the writer's."—The Daily Chronicle.

"The light and charming humour which has been Mr. Locke's key of success is at its best in 'Septimus.' It sparkles over every page."—The Outlook.

"'Septimus' is the beloved vagabond born under a happier star. ... he is wholly delightful."—Glasgow Herald.

"Through the pages of 'Septimus' laughter and tears chase one another after the fashion of an April day. There are only four principals in the book, but we get to know them through and through, to sympathise with their joys and sorrows, to love them for their faults as well as their good points."—The Daily Mail.

"... 'Septimus' is without doubt the most delightful story that has appeared for many months, and its success should be as remarkable as it is deserved. ... will enable many warm-hearted ladies to enjoy the luxury of a 'good cry,' for the pathos which is so close to Mr. Locke's humour is always tender, unforced, and affecting."—Country Life.

"Evidently Mr. Locke was in the gayest spirits when he dashed off his new story ... at any rate, there is about the whole book a feeling of light-hearted irresponsibility. Even behind its tears laughter smiles, under its very pathos there lurks a sense of humour, and throughout its chapters the novelist gives full reins to a freakish imagination."—The Sunday Times.

THE ARCHDEACON'S FAMILY

A New Novel by MAUD EGERTON KING. 6s.

THE TERRITORIAL FORCE

A Manual of its Law, Organization, and Administration. By HAROLD BAKER. With an Introduction by the Right Honble. R. B. HALDANE, K.C., M.P. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NELSON'S HARDY

HIS LIFE, LETTERS, AND FRIENDS

By A. M. BROADLEY and Rev. R. G. BARTELOT. Many Illustrations and Portraits. 10s. 6d. net.

JOHANNES BRAHMS

THE HERZOGENBERG CORRESPONDENCE

Edited by MAX KALBECK, and Translated by HANNAH BRYANT (Mrs. ATKINSON). With Portrait. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

This collection will be the first series of Brahms' letters presented to English readers. It is an account of a friendship maintained under almost ideal conditions during the period of the Composer's greatest activity (1876—1897), and gives a vivid picture of his personality and of musical circles in the three great centres.

BEYOND THE SKYLINE

A new novel by ROBERT AITKEN. 6s.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES

Their Present Condition and Progress. Edited by the SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE RACES COMMITTEE. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

LIFE OF LORD NORTON

(Rt. Honble. Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, K.C.M.G.), 1814—1905. Statesman and Philanthropist. By WILLIAM S. CHILDE-PEMBERTON. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

DOURIS AND THE PAINTERS OF GREEK VASES

Translated from the French of EDMOND POTTIER, of the Musée du Louvre, Paris, by BETTINA KAHNWEILER. With a Preface by JANE ELLEN HARRISON, of Newnham College, Cambridge. With Coloured and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Romance of the East Series TALES OF THE CALIPHS

By CLAUD FIELD, Author of "The Confessions of Al Ghazzali." Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each.

In this series the great store-houses of Oriental romance will be opened for the first time to the public. Tales from the Sanscrit, from the Chinese, from every language of the East possessing a great literature will appear in due course. From these vivid narratives of old-world romance it will be possible for the reader to glean much information concerning the lives and manners and customs of vanished races, and the greatness of Empires that have passed away. Mr. Claud Field, in "Tales of the Caliphs," gives us the genuine romance of history, authentic anecdotes of Caliphs of Bagdad and Cordova, and marvellous adventures of Haroun-al-Raschid concerning which even "The Arabian Nights" is silent.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

Printed for the Proprietors, THE WILSON PRESS, LTD., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., by W. H. SMITH & SON, 95 Fetter Lane, London, E.C., and Arden Press, Letchworth, and Published at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY,
February 20, 1909

JAMES LANE ALLEN

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1920

FEBRUARY 20, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

Established over
One Hundred Years.

HODGSON & CO.

Telephone No. 7291
Central.

Auctioneers of Rare and Valuable Books,
Manuscripts, Autographs, Book Plates, and Engravings.

VALUATIONS FOR PROBATE, &c.

CATALOGUES OF SALES ON APPLICATION

Messrs. Hodgson wish to point out that they are the only firm of Auctioneers exclusively engaged in the Sale of Literary Property, and are therefore in a position to deal with such property promptly and effectively.

The next Sale, comprising an extensive Collection of Valuable and Standard Works in all Classes of Literature, will be held on Tuesday, March 2nd, and two following days.

Auction Rooms: 115 Chancery Lane, LONDON, W.C.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. HYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 2 High Belsham, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDARARIUM LONDINENSE, or the London Almanack for the Year 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MORRIS, R.E. 15h x 11h. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.
"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.
"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little here which shows him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crudeness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWFOOT. Pott 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.]
"The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fall so far from perfection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, which is distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."
First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.
Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrains spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.
"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TASSA. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile.
"Had Browning written pirate songs like these, he would have been a great success. They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.
"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a hobby. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTLETON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.
"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'the adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lyttleton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWFOOT. Pott 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.]
"These are all of her best work. Every year of the period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and dash of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupillage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.
"His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearean quality of insubtle pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.
"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfeeling appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Colotypes. Fcap. 4to, 3s. net.
"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Respects not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GIBBARD. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPAN. Crown 8vo, 5s. pp. 6s.
"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.

"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.
"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.
"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musie.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman.

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HANNETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited space of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.
Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.
"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TRENAN.
"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical 'wing' should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

CÆDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

YOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 795	The Measure of our
To Sestius. . . . 797	Youth 806
Asquith and Anarchy . 797	Shorter Reviews . . . 806
Accent and Quantity . . 798	An Outdoor Breviary . 808
James Lane Allen . . . 800	Meetings of Societies . 809
The Way of the World . 804	Correspondence . . . 810
Pontifical Services . . . 805	Books Received . . . 811

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Morning Post, a journal which is infected with the mania of suffragitis, commenting on the unseemly action of a band of female Suffragists in attending a service at Westminster Abbey, wearing distinctive badges and tri-coloured sashes, says: "Of course, there was no attempt at anything in the nature of a demonstration either before or after the service. The idea of first meeting in Dean's Yard and then proceeding to the Abbey in a body had been abandoned." We should imagine that for a body of female agitators to go en masse to a place of Divine worship for the avowed and previously advertised purpose of offering up prayers for Woman's Suffrage, is something so near to a "demonstration" that it would be hard to say wherein it differs from one. Apart from that, the Morning Post very disingenuously suppresses the fact that the intention to meet in Dean's Yard and proceed in a body to the Abbey was only abandoned because the authorities put a stop to it, and ordered the gates to be closed, with a view of preventing what would have been a most indecent attempt to demonstrate in the precincts of the Abbey. It seems to us a thousand pities that the Dean of Westminster, who was conducting the service, did not take the opportunity of reading the ladies a few selections from the Epistles of St. Paul to the Ephesians, to the Corinthians, to Timothy, and to Titus, and the First Epistle of St. Peter, which would no doubt have done them a lot of good. Women who are so imprudent as to try and drag religion into the question of Woman's Suffrage would do well to remember that in the Scriptures their position with regard to men is over and over again insisted on in the clearest and most unmistakable manner. Obeying the injunction "to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands," will not fit in very readily with the methods of female Suffragists, even if they choose to call themselves "constitutional." We should like to hear the opinion of the gentle married Suffragists on the 22nd and 23rd verses of the 5th chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians:

Wives submit yourselves unto your husbands, as unto the Lord.

For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church.

It would be interesting to hear the comments of, say, Lady Grove on the texts we have quoted.

Here is another example of female suffragist reasoning, taken from that fearful and wonderful publication, The Englishwoman. Under the title "Bow and Spear" the writer quotes from the National Review a few sentences from articles written in that magazine against woman suffrage. In each case a "telling" reply is provided by the writer of the article. Here is an example. Says the National Review: "What is demanded of us is that we should hand over the helm of the Empire to women, for that will be the inevitable result if the present agitation succeeds." And the lady of the bow and spear replies, "What is demanded is that women should have a voice in choosing those to whom the helm of the Empire is handed over. As in the nature of things there can never be one policy supported entirely by men and another entirely by women, the helm of the Empire is likely to remain pretty much where it is at present—namely, at the disposal of the majority." Now, although there is nothing whatever in "the nature of things" to prevent the possibility of all men being in favour of one policy and all women in favour of another, we can admit that the contingency is an improbable one. But granting votes for women there is nothing in the world to prevent an overwhelming majority of women together with a small minority of men over-riding the policy of an overwhelming majority of men and a small minority of women. Suppose a State consisting of ten thousand adult persons, of whom 5,500 are women and 4,500 are men. The State goes to war and suffers heavy losses. Some "humanitarian" or other crank gets up the cry of "Stop the war," which was raised at the time of the Boer conflict, an election takes place on the issue. Obviously if 5,000 out of all the women and 100 out of all the men support the "stop the war" party they will be able to outvote the 4,400 men and the remaining 500 women by 200 votes. There is nothing far-fetched or improbable in these figures, and it is quite conceivable that if the women of England, who outnumber the men by about three millions, had been provided with votes at the time of the Boer war, the war might actually have been stopped in face of the protests of nine-tenths of the men and a minority of the women. It is quite obvious that men who have any manhood or self-respect will never consent to put themselves into a position which is fraught with such odious and shameful possibilities. That is why the suffrage will never be given to women until the manhood of the country has decayed and the break-up of the Empire and the decline of the glory of England is in sight. And, thank Heaven, we are still a long way from that.

That distinguished literary critic, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, in the current issue of his journal, devotes a paragraph to a defence of the phraseology of a letter beginning in the following manner:

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to yours of the 23rd inst."

Mr. Bottomley is no doubt in the habit of making use of this slipshod, ugly, and vulgar kind of English, but it will require something stronger than his authority to commend it to those who do not care to model their epistolary style on that of the shop-walker. In the same paragraph Mr. Bottomley quotes, with a view of holding it up as an example of bad grammar, a sentence from THE ACADEMY of February 6th. The sentence in question is perfectly good English, and in his endeavours to place it in the pillory, Mr. Bottomley is merely demonstrating to the world at large his own bumptious ignorance. In another part of his precious paper, under the heading of "Prisoners at the Bar," we find some of the most impudent and scandalous remarks we have ever read addressed to a gallant, universally loved, and respected soldier—Lord Roberts of Kandahar to wit. We quote:

A DANGEROUS DOLT.

I have no doubt you are, in private life, a very pious and estimable old man. I can picture you spelling out your family prayers with extreme unction for the benefit of your men-servants and maid-servants, having happily put away from your mind all the devastation of your armies, all the brave warriors whom you have hurried unprepared to the presence of their Maker. I can see you doling out jam and judicious advice to young sycophants with all the platitudinous emphasis of the Lord Avebury, or stuttering copy-book maxims in praise of obvious virtues. I can then concede to you the usefulness of the bore, who, as Talleyrand or somebody said, affords repose to the mind. But when you embark upon subjects which really matter, you become as great a menace to society as the Nihilist, or the Anarchist, or the Apache. Nay, you are an even greater menace, for your wooden, unimaginative mind appeals to all the stupid ones who form the great majority in every land.

The author of this farrago of insolent and libellous rubbish is none other than our old friend the rejected of Deptford and Constantinople, Herbert Vivian. It is not likely that Lord Roberts is in the habit of reading John Bull; still less is it likely that he would consider it consonant with his dignity to take notice of an attack in such a paper, made by such a person as Vivian. But this feeling may perhaps not be shared by other soldiers of less exalted position, and Mr. Vivian may count himself lucky that horsewhipping, as a punishment for the fouler kind of journalistic scurrility, has gone out of fashion. Severe criticism of a public man's public actions may be excused, but wholesale vilification of an honourable gentleman because of his piety and his performance of his duty as a soldier is currish. Before Mr. Vivian babbles further about "Prisoners at the Bar," it may be well for him to remember that there is such a thing as criminal libel. It is Mr. Vivian, and not Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C., K.G., etc., who is the dangerous dolt.

The Cambridge Review professes to be amused because THE ACADEMY recently expressed the opinion that the Archbishop of Canterbury ought to resign his post. There used to be an old-fashioned idea that the leader or representative of a large body of people is under a moral obligation to resign his post when it is clearly demonstrated that his views are in direct and violent opposition to those of the vast majority of the persons he is supposed to represent. We are not surprised that this idea does not commend itself to the Cambridge Review, because we have recently been treated to a very pretty object lesson as to the views of honesty and honour which are apparently current in Cambridge at the moment. Somewhere about May of last year the Editor of this paper received a letter from an undergraduate friend at Cambridge, asking him if he would be kind enough to write an article for publication in an undergraduate journal, The Granta, in its special May-week number. The Editor of THE ACADEMY replied that he was overwhelmed with work, but that if he could possibly find time he would write an article. Subsequently he wrote to say that he found it would be impossible for him to manage it, whereupon he received a letter from the Editor of The Granta expressing great disappointment, informing him that his article had been counted on as the principal feature of the number, and imploring him to reconsider his decision.

In face of this appeal, the Editor of THE ACADEMY did reconsider his decision, and with what, in view of subsequent events, can only be described as misplaced good nature, he managed to find time at a moment when he was over head and ears in work to write an article for The Granta. This article he sent to the Editor of The Granta, and it was, of course, a gratuitous contribution. The Editor of The Granta omitted to write and thank him or to send him a proof, but the article duly appeared, and there one would have thought the matter might have been allowed to rest. However, the charming young gentleman who edits The Granta did not take this view, for in a subsequent number of his paper he came out with a violent attack on the Editor of THE ACADEMY under the heading "Celebrities I have never met and yet am happy (sic), No. I. Lord Alfred Douglas," taking as the basis of the attack the very article which he had begged from the Editor of THE ACADEMY. The fact that the "attack" itself was innocuous inasmuch as it possessed no power to damage or even annoy its object does not affect the case in its application to the Editor of The Granta. The wish to wound was there if not the ability. We made no direct reference to the matter at the time in these columns, and it is only the later comments of the Cambridge Review which have brought it back to our minds and caused us to reflect that those of the undergraduates at Cambridge who are engaged in journalism are in sad need of a little fatherly admonition.

We ourselves in our hot youth at Oxford edited a paper called The Spirit Lamp, which is not altogether unknown to fame. We should not like to affirm that its editorial utterances were always characterised by the highest wisdom, but, at any rate, we can congratulate ourselves on the fact that we did not think it "smart" to invite the editors of London literary papers to write articles for us and then to use these articles as a basis for making impudent and spiteful attacks on them. We should have considered then as we consider now: that a young man who is capable of so repaying the kindness of a man whose sole wish had been to oblige and help him, was writing himself down an ill-conditioned young whelp, who had been insufficiently kicked at school. We make no claim that the article we contributed to The Granta was anything wonderful in the way of articles; quite possibly it was a very bad one, and quite possibly the editor of The Granta did not like it; if so, he was under no obligation to print it. But once having done so, the slightest reference to the laws of good taste or good manners or ordinary decency would have prevented him from using it as a basis for attacking its writer. We do not remember the name of the promising young gentleman who is responsible for introducing into the conduct of The Granta methods which would be considered unworthy of even the lowest gutter rags in London, but we shall take the liberty of advising him to be convinced that there is nothing "smart" or "clever" in such dirty schoolboy tricks, and that those who resort to them will get nothing in return but the contempt of decent people. We do not for a moment suppose that the manners and morals of the Editor of The Granta are in the slightest degree representative of the manners and morals of the average Cambridge undergraduate, but that is all the more reason for putting them in the pillory.

The concert given at the Æolian Hall by Miss Hélène Dolmetsch and Miss Dorothy Moggridge was very successful and enjoyable as far as the performances of these two ladies on the viola da gamba and the harpsichord was concerned. Bach's beautiful Sonata No. 1 in G major, which we have never heard before, was rendered in a masterly way, and as for the viola da gamba solo, "Divisions on a ground in D major," by Christopher Symphon, whose date is somewhere about 1650, it is quite one of the most beautiful compositions we have ever listened to; it was admirably performed by Miss Dolmetsch, as was the difficult Prelude Sarabande and Gigue, for 'cello solo, by Bach. When, however, we come to the vocal part of the concert there is a different story to tell. Mr. G. Everard Healy has a fair baritone voice, but anything less effective than his singing of Purcell's "I attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly" it would be impossible to conceive. In the first place he took it much too slow, and then his dramatic style of singing is utterly unsuited to the old composers. He positively murdered Handel's enchanting "Droop not, Young Lover," by the exercise of the same unfortunate dramatic faculty. As he rendered it the song became a sort of argument. In the phrase "Grief is but madness" he did not sing the word italicised, but said it, after the manner of the music-hall comedian. He was much more successful in the modern song by Tchaikovsky, and the two arrangements of Hungarian melodies by F. Korbay. But, for our part, we resent the introduction of modern music into a concert arranged by Miss Dolmetsch. We go to such concerts to try and remember what pure music was like before Wagner had debauched it and the public taste. Nine out of ten confirmed "Wagnerites" are utterly incapable of appreciating pure classical music. As a rule, they profess to admire Bach, and they sometimes condescendingly admit that Wagner himself "approved of" Mozart, but of Handel they nearly always speak with contempt, being apparently quite unaware that Handel, equally with Mozart and Bach, could, and did, simply "write the head off" the great charlatan of their admiration, whenever he put pen to a score.

We have been reading "Tono-Bungay," with which excellent novel (the author is Mr. H. G. Wells, and we still say "excellent") we shall deal at length in a subsequent issue. On certain pages of the book there is frequent mention of "Lady Grove." And we desire at the moment to inform the polite world that Mr. Wells's Lady Grove is a house, and not the Lady Grove whose peculiar views about women have made her name revered wherever the English language is spoken. If our memory serves us, Lady Grove has prophesied that the women of the future will be imposing of stature—eight feet at a moderate computation. And doubtless it is with an eye to this development and to other Suffragist portents that the little boys in the street are now singing a new version of an old song, which commences "Father's pants fit mother now."

We have had occasion to visit the Garden City at Letchworth, a Socialist centre, which, we understand, blossoms like the rose—in summer. On the occasion of our call, however, it did not blossom in the least; rather the contrary. One of the first things that met our eye after leaving the railway station was the following choice poster:

GARDEN CITY CO-OPERATORS, LTD.
(Educational Committee.)
Saturday next,
at the Co-operative Hall,
A SOCIAL
will be held.
MUSIC AND DANCING FREE.

"Music and Dancing!" It is a dreary way to spell music, but if the Socialists will have it so, far be it from us to complain. For ourselves, we should not call Letchworth a garden city, but a good-sized and fairly remote building-plot. It has its advantages, such as an abundant supply of ginger-beer, and an establishment for the sale of monkey-nuts. But "Music" on a poster!

TO SESTIUS.

Down the dry sands they draw the ship with cables;
The orchards gather bloom; no rime-frost white
Is iris'd in the fields in morning light;
The oxen and their herd have left the stables,
All is renewed; but Death, the Shades and Fables
Impend. On thee, the hour will come, I know,
Where in the banquet, never lucky throw
Will crown thee with the kingdom of the tables.

Brief is our time, O Sestius; take and seize
Its blossom, ere old age has mined our knees.
No spring-tide stirs the shadowy waste below.
Ah, come then, sacrifice, while brakes are green,
To Faunus, in his fastnesses unseen,
A black-haired goat, a lamb with fleece of snow.

M. JOURDAIN.

ASQUITH AND ANARCHY

THE KING opened Parliament in person on Tuesday. There was a pageant, of course, and we are told that "inside the Gilded Chamber a brilliant picture slowly took shape, full of life, colour, animation and graceful dignity." In other words, the customary ceremonies were duly observed. His Majesty read a speech which had been prepared for him by the Cabinet. Mr. Asquith himself was there to hear it read. We have heard of tame Speeches from the Throne, and some of them have been very tame indeed, but surely milder and less revolutionary utterances were never put into the mouth of Monarch than those with which His Majesty regaled us on Tuesday. The Prime Minister and his "laughable combination" are becoming a trifle wary in their old age. They came into power on claptrap and with a sharp eye to filibustering. Session by session they have striven manfully to prove to an astounded world that it is possible to run a Government on this same claptrap and with this same keen eye to filibustering. And at long and last (which is a Scots phrase, Mr. Asquith) they find themselves in the inevitable muddles, and they proceed accordingly to sing very small indeed. With the cringing sycophancy characteristic of his class, one of the Labour members stated in the House of Commons on Wednesday that Mr. Asquith had never broken a promise. In a sense, this may well be true. One can never be sure which of his promises Mr. Asquith intends to break until one nails him down to considerations of time. For example, Mr. Asquith promised the teetotalers and the Nonconformists a Licensing Bill. He staked his political reputation on the passing of such a Bill through the House of Commons. And when the Lords rejected it, sad, fearsome and bloody things were to happen to the Lords. Mr. Asquith kept his promise to the extent of forcing through the Commons a Licensing Bill which might very well have been conceived in Colney Hatch. That Bill cost the country hundreds of thousands of pounds, and it has done nobody a haporth of good—not even Mr. Asquith and his engaging filibusterers. The Lords exterminated it in due course, and Mr. Asquith has promised, and Mr. Birrell and Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill have promised for him, that he would deal faithfully with the Lords. Up and down the country, like so many roaring showmen, we have had Birrell and George and Churchill. Each of them has stood in front of his rickety booth and vaingloriously tossed to the flare of the naphtha the gleaming scimitar with which the Government were to slosh off the heads of the unfortunate gentlemen who wear coronets. On two or three occasions Mr. Showman Birrell went the length even of quaffing a metaphorical bumper of anticipatory blue blood, and, what is more, he smacked his lips over it, as a judge of such beverages would. But on Tuesday, if you please, as sleek and unobtrusive and glossy as a well-fed mouser, Mr. Asquith stood in the Gilded Chamber what time His Majesty waded through a speech of the Cabinet's "own composure," which did not contain a single word that could ruffle the bosom of the most susceptible peer of them all. Not even the merest whimper against the Lords is to be found in that complacent document, the King's Speech. And as for bloodshed—not a whisper! Mr. Asquith, of course, is not breaking his promise herein, because Mr. Asquith never breaks promises. It is a question of time entirely. In the next King's Speech the Lords will hear their doom, or in the next one after that, or still the next one—provided, that is to say, that Mr. Asquith and his roost-robbers happen still to be in power. And, of course, if they go out of power Mr. Asquith will have broken no promises and buttered no parsnips. All he requires is time. In point of fact, Mr. Asquith simply dare not begin to tamper with his masters. We use the word masters advisedly and in full view of its bearing on the present political situation. The Lords have already taught England's teetotal, socialistic, wild-cat Premier his lesson, and, being a pawky lawyer and a friend and patron of pawky lawyers, he recognises that the time has come for his precious Government to learn "to behave." And it has behaved in the King's Speech with a meekness and a docility which would do credit to a thoroughly slapped schoolgirl. Ultimately all Governments in England have to deal with the country. It is all very well for them to cringe to threatening and noisy sections of the enfranchised. Such cringing may waft you into power, but it cannot keep you there; the final reference is to common sense, and in England when we cannot get commonsense out of the Commons we turn to the Lords for it and never fail to find it. Mr. Asquith knows this, and latterly he has become quite sure of it. His dreams of rebellion, his challenges, his cockcrows, his threats, his knife sharpenings, his demands for pannikins for the reception of blood amount to nothing and can never amount to more. Because he has pandered to the whims and fads and petty madneses of the sections all of those sections are at the moment mightily puffed up and swollen in their own conceit. The teetotalers, for example, in spite of their recent reverses, still go about thanking God for a Temperance England and a Temperance Premier; the bedraggled ranks of labour are equally thanking high Heaven for Mr. Asquith, and putting on airs and frills in the idiotic belief that Labour, as represented by such marabouts as Mr. Victor Grayson, Mr. Keir Hardie and our beloved working-man Cabinet Minister, Mr. John Burns, is intended to rule the earth, and the Socialists, while they pretend to loathe him, hold secret services of thanksgiving for him, and are uplifted and considered and taken notice of simply because he happens to be Prime Minister of England. And having directly or indirectly blessed, edified and enlarged these factions, Mr. Asquith naturally engages the sweet attention of the Suffragists. For these ladies Mr. Asquith professes that he will do nothing. Really, he has done everything for them that is possible in mortal Premier; for he has taken them quite seriously, and he has put into their mouths the finest of all political arguments. "Here you are," they cry; "you have sops for the Teetotalers, and for Labour and for the Socialists. We also are mad, and yet you will have none of us. Shame, shame; also, deeds not words!" And Mr. Asquith writhes in his seat accordingly. Until yesterday Mr. Asquith made it his vaunt that he had a mandate from the country. To him the country means neither more nor less than the quarter from which comes the most noise. At the present moment London is being perambulated by solemn troops and sweet societies of unfortunate and unthinking persons, who carry banners, whereon are depicted gory scenes from the French Revolution, and who cry hoarsely and beerily every few seconds: "We—want—work." These gentlemen "demonstrate" in Berkeley Square; they break a jeweller's window or so in Bond Street; they rush their own food van on the Embankment. "Here," muses Mr. Asquith, "you have the country." And he sits for hours prompting Mr. John Burns, while the said John Burns is informing the Commons that the grave problem of unemployment must be tackled, and that the Government has tackled it, and will be sure to please everybody—in the course of time. A little while ago it was the teetotalers who were the country. And quite shortly it will be the Socialists, and perhaps even the Suffragists. For to Mr. Asquith the country is a kaleidoscopic chameleon which perpetually belches forth bellowings and which is to be prevented from swallowing and destroying him only by steady gifts of bits of sugar. On the other hand, the House of Lords knows better. That—to quote the prevailing drawing-room morceau—is the difference. In the meantime, let Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill and Mr. Lloyd George and the rest of them—not forgetting the egregious Mr. Birrell—be profoundly grateful to Providence for the House of Lords, which has been for them, as it has been for previous, if less fantastic, muddlers, as the shadow of a rock in a thirsty land. Let them, while political life still remains in them, go softly about their peddling and their tinkering and their pension-earning in the certain hope that nothing very serious will be allowed to happen to England while the abhorred Gilded Chamber manages to eke out a threadbare existence. And let them be sure that when their pensions have been earned and the wildest and fearsomest and stupidest of their proposals have been buried and forgotten the House of Lords will still remain pretty well what it has always contrived to be—namely, an embodiment of the soundness and ultimate sanity of a great and ultimately sane and sound nation.

ACCENT AND QUANTITY

No one has done more on behalf of what he calls "quantitive" verse (the more usual term is "quantitative") than Mr. Robert Bridges; and his latest venture is not his least remarkable. In the New Quarterly Magazine for last month he translates into English hexameters several hundred lines from the Sixth Book of the Æneid, and prefaces these with some interesting remarks on Virgilian rhythms, which—developing ideas put forward by Spedding and others—he claims were conditioned by stress-accent as well as by quantity. With this contention as it affects Virgil himself (happily the name is so spelled by Mr. Bridges), and with the deductions made therefrom as to metrical caesura and other matters, no attempt will be here made to deal. But comparisons are also drawn between prosodic effects in Latin and in English. Identity of rule is by no means asserted; variations due to incidence of accent and the like are recognised and insisted on. Throughout, however, it is assumed that no fundamental difference in method exists between our speech and that of ancient Rome, that quantity and stress-accent mean to us just what they meant to Virgil and his readers. Because ruī oceanō nōx can end a Latin hexameter, it is inferred that "their unmerited lot" must form a suitable ending for a line of correspondent metre in English. This assumption is so startling, and carries with it such far-reaching consequences, that no apology need be made for examining it.

The one thing of which we can feel absolutely sure concerning classical Greek and Latin metre is that syllabic quantity played in it a prominent and principal part. Just as every writer on English verse places "accent" in the forefront, so every ancient grammarian makes "quantity" the basis of metre, and is silent regarding the syllable-stresses which fill so large a place in our prosody. Does not this point to a deep and radical difference? No doubt it is difficult for us to conceive of a verse based on principles fundamentally unlike our own, but the facts vouch themselves. Mr. Bridges makes "our inability to read Greek as it was spoken" a reason for confining his remarks to Latin. But we at least know that the words in a Greek hexameter possessed accents of some kind, which bore no relation whatever to metrical feet. Since it was from Greek verse that the rules of Latin quantitative metre were originally taken, this fact is of cardinal importance. Greek verse, and therefore Latin verse when it adopted Greek measures, had quantity for its essential foundation. The distinction between long and short syllables, according to Mr. Bridges, was artificial, and "had to be learned just as we should have to learn the rules of an analogous fiction in English." We have precisely such a fiction in our classifying of syllables as accented and unaccented. Every one knows that this ignores a host of minor differences. None the less, this division, in broad outline, corresponds to a fact, the most prominent and important in our speech. So it must have been with Greek and Latin. Quantity must have been as real, as important, to them as accent is to us. Great literatures are not put together like Chinese puzzles; they grow out of living language. The very structure of Greek and Latin verse, even without the unanimous testimony of all contemporary observers, assures us that quantitative relations formed the basic element, the most salient fact, in their rhythm.

How different is the case in English! When a Roman heard the words already quoted, he heard them first and foremost as ruī oceanō nōx, only secondarily and subordinately as ruī oceanō nōx. But when an Englishman hears the phrase assumed to be metrically parallel, he hears it first and in most cases exclusively as their unmerited lot. If told that it may be also read as their unmerited lot, he is puzzled and sceptical. Accustomed to ignore quantitative relations, hardly conscious that some sounds take longer to pronounce than others, taught from childhood to concentrate attention on syllables of major stress and to deal glibly with congested masses of consonants, how can he possibly feel real the suggested distinctions? The word "their," for example, is to him made longer or shorter by stress and not otherwise. That the first syllable of "merit" contains a short vowel is a fact which escapes his attention; what he does notice is its accentual prominence. Here is a fundamental difference, due to racial habits of speech, and necessarily creating a like difference of metrical value. In our language, as nearly all critics have recognised, syllabic quantity is shifting, uncertain, partly subjective; taken by itself it has little stability. Strong stress and permanent quantities, indeed, can hardly co-exist; one or other is bound to give way. There can be no doubt which gives way in English. With us, as a high authority puts it, "quantity is always loose." Therefore to argue from Latin to English, from a language where quantities were normally fixed to one where they are normally changeful and indefinite, does not seem reasonable. When accent predominates over quantity, you cannot get the same results as when quantity predominates over accent. The feeling of unreality referred to above springs from natural causes, and must be taken into account.

It is one thing to hold that syllabic quantity has a function in English verse, that our best singers use it scientifically, that neglect of it leads to harshness and dissonance; it is quite another to treat this factor as a stable and independent basis. Again and again, since Elizabethan days, men have tried to write English verse by Latin rule, and always the attempt has failed because inconsistent with the genius of our language. The two speeches being dissimilar, similar rules cannot hold good in both. What Virgil did it does not follow that an English poet can do. Without going into detail—without asking what phonetic fact "accent" stood for in Classic Latin, or whether any modification of undoubtedly artificial rules could be reconciled with our elusive quantities—we are justified in refusing to accept arguments based on a likeness which does not exist; and the experience of three centuries warrants us in believing that no experiment which makes quantity coequal with stress-accent, or even assigns to it independent reality, will find favour so long as our language retains its present form.

When lines framed on this latter basis happen to comply with the requirements of English prosody, they can be read with pleasure. Such are some cited by Mr. Bridges as carrying "six normally placed accents," though they do not all quite answer to his description. A certain amount of divergence from normal accentuation is not only tolerated but welcomed by English ears, and other lines besides these can be accepted as they stand, while many more can be made acceptable by slight if illegitimate departures from the intended structure. But when, as in by far the larger part of this version, speech-stress and metrical ictus are of set purpose made totally discrepant—when we are asked to take for hexameters such lines as:

Grieving at heart and much pitying their unmerited lot.
In the billows helpless, with a high wind and threatening gale.
Hell's Stygian barrier? Charon's boat unbidden enter?—

revolt becomes inevitable. No English-trained ear can or should enjoy such lines; they violate our most deeply rooted speech-instincts. If bidden discard these and enjoy a new verbal music, we must decline, firstly through inability to comply, and secondly because compliance would be disastrous. Native measures would no longer please. Our Shelley, our Swinburne, would cease to be melodious. "False quantities" would be felt everywhere, even in

Out of the golden remote wild West, where the sea without shore is.

If it were possible to make English ears require fixed and definite syllable-quantities, all our past minstrelsy would suffer. We cannot have it both ways, cannot appreciate quantity in one form of verse and not miss it in another. If racial habits count for anything, quantitative metre will be enjoyed when Shakespeare and Milton are forgotten—and not till then.

It is interesting to observe how, in successive attempts, Mr. Bridges has departed gradually further from the rules with which he began. His fine ear and sense of rhythm discontent him with Stonian orthodoxy. Accent is now recognised by him as a contributing cause of quantity; words like "god" and "man" are long when followed by a vowel. Such scanions as "thē threshold," "spectral horror," "an drave" (even granting the apostrophe) indicate laxer views of length by position. Elision is no longer for-bidden, being allowed to form such hypothetically Miltonic monosyllables as "T'whom," "seest," "me o'er." The old distinction between musa and muscr is abandoned in words like "hitherward," "over the ocean," "hap to hēr, yawing." Still more noteworthy is a new departure in respect of vowel-quantity, exemplified in "bȳ an" as compared with "by night," "gōeth," "plieth," "alsō." This clashes, not only with Stone's canon, but with a dominant principle of contemporary speech. In modern English, change of quality almost always accompanies change of quantity. Save in a very few instances, such as pūll and pōol, we seem unable to rest satisfied with mere difference of length, and insist on making a further change. To rest metre on a distinction between "sō" and "alsō," "gō" and "gōeth," must therefore be doubtful policy; yet a contrary decision would invalidate a whole host of scansionisms like "prōtection," "dēluded," etc. Confusion thickens when we find our author suggesting (see final Note) that some words may be treated either as spondee or dactyls, which is surely tantamount to abandoning quantity as a basis. "Myriad" and "Stygian" seem to be examples of this, while dominion is printed "dominyon." "Fiery" is made a trochee, though we were once warned against pronouncing "theory" like "beery." Can "sprig" be lengthened by spelling it as in "that bright sprigg of weird," or to what is its imagined quantity due? These instances, mostly taken from the first two pages of "Ibant Obscuri," may suggest what a morass of uncertainty is being taken for solid ground. It were well-nigh as easy to make ropes of sand, as definite "feet" from our fugitive syllabic quantities.

If some plodding grammarian had compiled these experiments, where deliverance must be written "deliv'rance," and inserting or omitting an aspirate is vital to metre, his ingenuity might extort admiration. But when one of our chief living poets expends time and labour on them, who can help saying "the pity of it"? Must such ill-omened attempts prevent our again receiving song-bursts like:

Awake, my heart, to be loved, awake, awake!
The darkness silvers away, the morn doth break,
It leaps in the sky; unrisen lustres slake
The o'ertaken moon. Awake, O heart, awake!

Will lines of native music like this be written or enjoyed when "unrſen" masquerades as unrisen? In the interest of English verse, protest must be made against efforts to sap the foundations of our metre by substituting those of an alien prosody. That they should succeed is inconceivable, but, meantime, how much we are losing! Surely Charles Bagot Cayley's Iliad "homometrically translated" might suffice for those who seek to cultivate exotics, unaware perhaps how many vain attempts have been made to naturalise this one, from the days of Spenser and Gabriel Harvey onward. Not all the skill and learning and poetic power of its latest cultivator, head and shoulders in these respects above most of his predecessors, can render a different result credible. To revolutionise the whole of English speech is a task beyond the power of any man, and one whose accomplishment—were it feasible—would consign to oblivion the masterpieces of our literature.

JAMES LANE ALLEN

"THERE are genuine Men of Letters," said a great and fearless philosopher, "and not genuine; as in every kind there is a genuine and a spurious." If we quote a line or two farther, there need be no mistake as to the identity of him whose dictum we reproduce.

"If Hero be taken to mean genuine, then I say the Hero as Man of Letters will be found discharging a function for us which is ever honourable, ever the highest. He is uttering forth, in such a way as he has, the inspired soul of him." And the sage proceeds to defend his use of the word "inspired," taking inspiration to be a commingling of originality, sincerity, and genius. How many of those we somewhat lightly term "men of letters" to-day can boast a place in the glorious company of Heroes, judged by that standard?

Fortunately, however, we need be bound by no philosopher's arbitrary measuring-rule. Whether he be hero or not, the combination of originality and sincerity—we speak at present only of the literary craftsman—is sufficient to ensure a man an estimable place in the arraignment by which he must finally stand or fall—that of the hearts of his readers; sincerity alone may do this, but insincere originality fizzles to extinction like a damp rocket. We can all recall instances of this. And now we will note in what manner these introductory remarks apply to the art of Mr. James Lane Allen.

It would be difficult to find an author whose writings bear fewer traces of affectation than those of Mr. Allen. To have to pick one's way across a moraine of superfluous mannerisms before climbing to the little peaks of thought whereon the sun shines brightly is sometimes to spoil tempers gratuitously; it detracts sadly from the value of a view to arrive angry and sore-footed, and the detritus afforded by the workings of genius is often surprisingly lacking in precious metal. But Mr. Allen's peaks are easily accessible—which is by no means to say that they are of insignificant height or of small importance. The very first impression gained by any discriminating reader of his books, we imagine, would be one of dignity and purity in the language—long before any thread of plot or even narrative had begun to unravel; a sudden sense of tranquil distinction and lucidity. And, if we illustrate this immediately by quoting the actual opening sentences of a book which we should like every student of fiction to read as a portion of his or her education—"The Mettle of the Pasture"—we beg such students as shall see this article to observe how striking an effect can be obtained by absolute simplicity:

She did not wish any supper, and she sank forgetfully back into the stately oak chair. One of her hands lay palm upward on her white lap; in the other, which drooped over the arm of the chair, she clasped a young rose dark red amid its leaves—an inverted torch of love.

A few bars of dusty gold hung poised across the darkening spaces of the supper-room. Ripples of the evening air entering through the windows flowed over her, lifting the thick curling locks at the nape of her neck, creeping forward over her shoulders and passing along her round arms under the thin fabric of her sleeves.

They aroused her, these vanishing beams of the day, these arriving breezes of the night; they became secret invitations to escape from the house into the privacy of the garden, where she could be alone with thoughts of her great happiness now fast approaching.

As she strolled around the garden under the cloudy flush of the evening sky, dressed in white, a shawl of white lace over one arm, a rose on her breast, she had the exquisiteness of a long past; during which women have been chosen in marriage for health and beauty and children and the power to charm.

Here are words perfectly simple, but perfectly selected—mated to the beauty and bloom of the young girl awaiting her lover in the summer twilight, thrilling silently to the mere anticipation of his footfall. The whole book is a study in gentle harmonies.

Mr. Allen is known chiefly by his three long novels,

"The Choir Invisible," "The Increasing Purpose," and the one mentioned above; and of these it is perplexing to give cogent reasons for placing any one first in quality. They go together, forming a triptych, and if we set "The Choir Invisible" forward as his best book, as well as the one most widely read, we are directly conscious that the other two contain work quite as fine, quite as delicate. Perhaps the title of that volume has had something to do with its more extensive acceptance—Mr. Allen is happier in his choice of titles than most authors. It maintains, we think, the high level of limpid prose slightly less consistently than the others, but the story itself is of surpassing interest. Every standard author has some book or another with which a beginning is best made for those desirous of becoming acquainted with him; no one, for example, would advantageously commence to read Mr. Meredith with "Vittoria," or Mr. Henry James with "The Sacred Fount." If we choose "The Choir Invisible" as a representative work of our author, it is because we have been astonished to find among well-read people, whose opinion is worth the greatest consideration, many to whom Mr. Allen is hardly known even by name.

The picture of Amy Falconer, the vain little flirt, in the opening chapter, is limned with a sure and steady hand. On the back of the old white bob-tail horse, ambling drowsily along the wagon-track, she comes into the reader's view with startling clearness, and passes across the champaign from her aunt's farm:

On she rode down the avenue of the primeval woods; and Nature seemed arranged to salute her as some imperial presence; with the waving of a hundred green boughs above and on each side; with the flash and rush of bright wings; with the swift play of nimble forms up and down the boles of trees; and all the sweet confusion of innumerable melodies.

Then happens "one of those trifles that contain the history of our lives, as a drop of dew draws into itself the majesty and solemnity of the heavens." The bundle with which the horse is laden—her ball-dress and its accessories—falls to the ground as the animal slips on a rough root:

She did not see it. She indignantly gathered the reins more tightly in one hand, pushed back her bonnet, and applied her little switch of wild cherry to the horse's flank with such vehemence that a fly which was about to alight on that spot went to the other side. The old horse himself—he bore the peaceable name of William Penn—merely gave one of the comforting switches of his bob-tail with which he brushed away the thought of any small annoyance, and stopped a moment to nibble at the wayside cane mixed with purple-blossoming pea-vine. Out of the lengthening shadows of the woods the girl and the horse passed on toward the little town; and far behind them in the public road lay the lost bundle.

Of the finding of that innocent-looking bundle by John Gray, the schoolmaster, and the quietly tragic consequences which ensue, the following chapters tell. Gray, unaware that the owner was the girl he loved—or thought he loved—unties it and lies awake to watch the shimmer of a woman's fascinating attire in his lonely bachelor's lodging, a willing subject for all the thrills of love's anticipations; in a little while, he thinks, such things will be in his room by full right of wifehood. The sympathetic suggestion of the man's waking dream is wholly charming. The girl throws him over, and soon after he is wounded by a terrible fight with a cougar, the tiger of Kentucky. In his illness Mrs. Falconer, Amy's young aunt, wedded to an uncomprehending husband, visits him, bringing him Malory's "Morte d'Arthur" to read. The contrast between the two women is finely drawn:

The one was nineteen—the tulip, with spring-like charm, but perfectly hollow, and ready to be filled by east wind or west wind, north wind or south wind, according as each blew last and hardest; the other thirty-six—the rose—in its mid-summer splendour with fold on fold of delicate symmetric structures, making a masterpiece.

To his shame, Gray, the purest-minded of men, almost an ascetic, finds that his heart has gone out to the rose in overwhelming passion. The scene where, during his convalescence, he takes the book back to Mrs. Falconer, and they discover that love has walked softly with them all the time, is admirable in its restraint:

"And haven't you a word? Bring this book back to me in silence? After all I said to you? I want to know how you feel about it—all your thoughts."

She looked up at him with a reproachful smile.

The blood had rushed guiltily into his face, and she seeing this, without knowing what it meant, the blood rushed into hers.

"I don't understand," she said proudly and coldly, dropping her eyes and dropping her head a little forward before him, and soon becoming very pale, as from a death-wound.

He stood before her, trembling, trying to speak, trying not to speak. Then he turned and strode rapidly away.

Thus the sombre note begins to sound more deeply in these unsullied lives—these two for whom the height of happiness is to be the misty hill of renunciation, never the bright mountains of consummated love. The whole story is of two souls tried as by fire, passing through the ordeal honourably, but not unscathed. When Major Falconer dies, Gray, in a distant city, has married a woman frankly for companionship, and out of a mistaken gratitude for her help and that of her family in a period of distress, she electing to take the risk, knowing that his love was elsewhere. The story closes with the visit of Gray's eldest son to the solitary widow, bearing a letter from the man who has loved her, whom she has loved and waited for, fruitlessly and faultlessly, for many shadowed years. "If I have kept unbroken faith with any of my ideals," he writes, "thank you and thank God!"

In his self-confident youth, before love had revealed itself, Gray had declaimed to Mrs. Falconer his presumptuous creed:

"I declare to you at this moment, standing here in the clear light of my own past, that I firmly believe I shall be what I will, that I shall have what I want, and that I shall now go on rearing the structure of my life to the last detail, just as I have long planned it."

Later on, tenderly and truly, the woman won him to see how easily such a basis could be overset and rendered useless. Her quiet conversations with him during his illness are full of wisdom—we can almost hear her grave voice chiding, so beautifully is her character drawn. "First of all things in this world," she says, "a man must be a man—with all the grace and vigour, and, if possible, all the beauty of the body. Then he must be a gentleman, with all the grace, the vigour, the good taste of the mind. And then with both of these—no matter what his creed, his dogmas, his superstitions, his religion—with both of these he must try to live a beautiful life of the spirit." No one who has suffered can read this book unmoved; and to those for whom life moves in pleasant places it is far more than a romance; it is an exposition of how the harsh, irrevocable facts of existence may be bravely fronted and to some extent foiled, in spite of inevitable scars.

It must not be thought—we say this for the benefit of those to whom Mr. Allen's chosen land of Kentucky is untravelled ground—that there is a total absence of humour in these treasurable volumes. They all concern themselves with the sadder side of life, its disappointments and subtle trials; but this selection of the grey tones rather than the high lights never, even in a single instance, makes for "heavy" reading. We may allow ourselves to take one laughable interlude from the book which we have already quoted from somewhat lengthily—the dialogue between the Episcopal parson and John Gray, at the latter's bedside:

"Suppose we do this; we'll begin to enumerate the qualities of the common house cat. I'll think of a cat, you think of some woman; and we'll see what we come to." (The parson was a woman-hater.)

"I'll not do it," said John. "She's too noble."

"Just for fun!"

"There's no fun in comparing a woman to a cat."

"There is if she doesn't know it. Come, begin!" And the parson laid one long forefinger on one long little finger and waited for the first specification.

"Fineness," said John, thinking of a certain woman.

"Fondness for a nap," said the parson, thinking of a certain cat.

"Grace," said John.

"Inability to express thanks," said the parson.

"A beautiful form," said John.

"A desire to be stroked," said the parson.

"Sympathy," said John.

"Oh, no!" said the parson; "no cat has any sympathy. A dog has; a man is more of a dog."

"Noble-mindedness," said John.

"That will not do either," said the parson. "Cats are not noble-minded; it's preposterous!"

"Perfect ease of manner," said John.

"Perfect indifference of manner," said the parson.

"No vanity," said John.

"No sense of humour," said the parson.

"Plenty of wit," said John.

"You keep on thinking too much about some woman," remonstrated the parson, slightly exasperated.

"Fastidiousness," said John.

"Soft hands and beautiful nails," said the parson, nodding encouragingly.

"A gentle footstep," said John, with a softened look coming into his eyes. "A quiet presence."

"A quiet pounce on you unawares," said the parson.

"Beautiful taste in music," said John.

"Oh! dreadful!" said the parson. "What on earth are you thinking about?"

"The love of rugs and cushions," said John, groping desperately.

"The love of a nap," said the parson fluently.

"The love of playing with its victim," said John, thinking of another woman.

"Capital!" cried the parson. "That's the truest thing we've said. We'll not spoil it by another word."

This same Rev. James Moore, who plays the flute to his friend so charmingly—it is a token of the extent of his friendship—is one of Mr. Allen's finest secondary characters.

In two distinct ways the work of Mr. Allen may be said to resemble that of Mr. Thomas Hardy—with reservations in each case. Firstly, there is a broad similarity in that the books of both tend to enlarge upon the darker aspects of life; but—and here is the flash of division—the grim aloofness of the exponent of "Wessex" is totally absent from the American author. Through the Kentucky stories shines always a ray of hope, an invincible optimism; gentleness and a strong sympathy, a superb intimacy with those banished from their Edens, take the sting from fate. Mr. Hardy hears the scornful laughter of the "President of the Immortals" who had "ended his sport with Tess"; Mr. Allen would have glimpsed a hand outstretched to save.

Secondly, both authors possess that rare power of including nature as an integral portion of their stories; and here, again, Mr. Allen has the precision of Mr. Hardy without his frequent austerity. Sun, wind, rain, moonlight and mist, and all the thousand aspects of trees, earth and sky, take their place quite apart from what is generically known as "description," but with Mr. Allen's work we lose that apprehension of some sinister influence lurking behind them which so often oppresses us in reading the Wessex novels. Nature lightens the progress of events; she wears a kindlier face for her children; love, and not fear, is the dominating theme.

There is a third resemblance to which we may just allude; both writers have brought before the public a certain country within whose bounds nearly all their characters live and move; through one we have learnt of the vales and uplands of our own Southern England, the other has pictured for us the enchantment of his loved "Blue-grass region" so far across the ocean. And in this respect both have achieved unrivalled success.

The sincerity which we emphasised at the beginning of this article is no less obvious in "The Mettle of the Pasture" and "The Increasing Purpose." Perfect in their own way are each of these books. No one who has read the latter will easily forget the story of the hemp in the first chapter; it is an epic of Kentucky. The study here given of David, the young farmer, obsessed by his desire for an extended knowledge of the Bible, and his heart-breaking discovery that more light in the shape of a college training meant the growth of many rank weeds of doubt in his soul, is an absorbing one. He works out his own salvation, and after all his saving and scraping to obtain the necessary money for his education, is expelled by reason of his frankly-expressed antagonism to the opinions of his teachers. Love does not enter into this story until nearly half of it is told. The image of the woman creeps into the young man's thoughts as he sits reading alone in his room at the old farm:

He closed the pages and turned to his dying fire. The book caused him to wrestle; he wanted rest. And now, floating to him through that mist in his brain, as softly as a nearing melody, as radiantly as dawning light, came the image of Gabriella; after David had pursued Knowledge awhile he was ready for Love. . . . In all his rude existence she was the only being he had ever known who seemed to him worthy of a place in the company of his great books. . . . Her companionship wherever he might be—to have just that; to feel that she was always with him, and always one with him; to be able to turn his eyes to hers before some vanishing firelight at an hour like this, with deep rest near them side by side!

The ending of their love-story is happy, yet with that tinge of sadness which seems inseparable from all Mr. Allen's conclusions; the woman realises that even in the hour of her triumph the man's soul will never be entirely hers—always he will be searching, searching for the Truth as it is not in books nor colleges nor the wisdom of man:

She would give him her all, she never could be all to him. Her life would be enfolded completely; but he would hold out his arms also toward a cold spirit who would for ever elude him—Wisdom.

The golden crescent dropped behind the dark green hills of the silent land. Where were they? Gone? Or still under the trees?

"Ah, Gabriella, it is love that makes a man believe in a God of Love!"

"David, David!"

The south wind, warm with the first thrill of summer, blew from across the valley, from across the mighty rushing sea of the young hemp.

O Mystery Immortal! which is in the hemp and in our souls, in its bloom and in our passions; by which our poor brief lives are led upward out of the earth for a season, then cut down, rotted and broken—for Thy long service!

"The Mettle of the Pasture," the introductory paragraphs of which we have already quoted, is Mr. Allen's most ambitious work as far as plot is concerned; but we must pass this over, to consider in conclusion one little volume which is as full of charm as anything he has penned; we refer to "Aftermath." It forms a sequel to "A Kentucky Cardinal," but is quite complete enough in itself to be read alone. Light in treatment at times almost to airiness, brief, with a theme so slender that it cannot be termed a plot, we can yet find in it the art of the author at its best. It deals merely with a garden-courtship, a marriage, and the interruption of the harmony by the death of the woman; but the sacredness of a great passion, and the impression of love's persistence in spite of that earthly parting, are conveyed in a little idyll which we should be sorry for our readers to miss. Humour plays through it like the flicker of a flame, never long present, never far off. Georgiana, the man's choice, is portrayed in a hundred indirect ways.

Georgiana does not play upon the pianoforte, or, as Mrs. Walters would declare, she does not perform upon the instrument. Sylvia does; she performs, she executes. There are times when she will execute a piece called "The Last Hope" until the neighbours are filled with despair and ready to stretch their heads on the block to any more merciful executioner. Nor does Georgiana sing to company in the parlour. . . . I have never known her to sing except at her sewing and alone, as the way of women often is. . . . The overheard rill of Georgiana's voice issues from inner depths of being that no human soul has ever visited, or perhaps ever will visit. What would I not give to thread my way, hidden and alone, to that far region of uncaptured loveliness? Of late some of the overheard lullabies have touched me inexpressibly. They beat upon my ear like the musical reverberations of future motherhood—they betoken in Georgiana's maidenhood the dreaming unrest of the maternal.

Full of gaiety are these lovers. They have an old goldfinch's nest, stuck on a pole, whereby notes are passed to and fro. At the inauguration of this system of mail-carrying Georgiana was rather surprised with the weird appearance at her window:

The nest swayed on a level with her nose. "What is it?" she cried, drawing back with extreme distaste. . . .

"It's a note from me, Georgiana! This is going to be our little private post-office!" Georgiana sank back into her chair. She reappeared with the flush of apple-blossoms and her lashes wet with tears of laughter. But I do not think she looked at me unkindly. "Our little private post-office," I persisted, condescendingly.

"How many more little private things are we going to have?" she enquired plaintively.

"I can't wait here for ever," I said. "This is growing weather; I might sprout."

Deeper and deeper becomes their love after the wedding:

It is nearly dark when I reach home from town these January evenings. However the cold may sting the face and dart inward to the marrow Georgiana is waiting at the yard gate to meet me, so hooded and shawled and ringed about with petticoats—like a tree within its layers of bark—that she looks like the most thick-set of ordinary-sized women; for there is a heavenly but very human secret hiding in this household now, and she is thoughtfully keeping it. We press our half-frozen cheeks together, as red as wine-sap apples, and grope for each other's hands through our big lamb's-wool mittens, and warm our hearts with the laughter in each other's eyes.

And then the "heavenly but very human secret" comes down to earth:

The population of this town yesterday was seven thousand nine hundred and twenty; to-day it is seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-one. The inhabitants of the globe are enriched by the same stupendous unit; the solar system must adjust itself to new laws of equilibrium; the choir of angels is sweetened by the advent of another musician.

Lastly, comes the great Interloper, to leave the man brooding over the mystery:

Yesterday a wind storm swept this neighbourhood. Later, deep in the woods, I came upon an elm that had been struck by a bolt at the top. As I stood looking at it the single note of a bird fell on my ear—always the same note, low, quiet, regular, devoid of feeling, as though the bird had been stunned and were trying to say: What can I do? What can I do? I knew what that note meant. . . . I do not think of Death as ever having come to you. I think of you as some strangely beautiful white being that one day rose out of these earthly marshes where hunts the dark Fowler, and uttering your note of divine farewell, spread your wings towards the open sea of eternity, there to await my coming.

The chief beauty of the book lies in its perfect naturalness and simplicity, and, with its predecessor, it forms one of the most delicate little romances its author has ever written.

Mr. Allen's faults are few. One, common to every writer, is the occasional oversight, such as the use of the word "switch" twice in quick succession, with different meanings, in the third of our quotations—the slip to which the most practised literary man is liable; the other is a tendency to sentimentalise at times over his heroines—the inherent danger of his style. Carried but a trifle farther, this too-sympathetic touch would degenerate into effeminacy, but that undesirable attribute cannot as yet be laid to Mr. Allen's charge—he invariably saves himself well within the mark by some turn of phrase, some humorous comment, some happy little strengthening sternness which brings to the front that innate sincerity and spirituality which is the keynote of all. We think that Mr. Allen's position in the world of literature can be best expressed by saying that he occupies a corresponding place to that which we had hoped, some years ago, Mr. Richard Le Gallienne would eventually reach. Irrespective of the scenes among which his novels are planned, which are not germane to the literary effect, he possesses exactly that daintiness of prose which promised well in Mr. Le Gallienne, rendered, however, permanent and homogeneous by a virility and a purpose for which we may search the work of the latter author in vain. Mr. Le Gallienne has remained in his artificial-flower garden where very young poets wander arm in arm with fanciful golden girls beneath opalescent skies—which is just the inevitable and tragic outcome of the cult of daintiness. Mr. Allen's lovers roam amid real flowers, and are strong, sensible, ordinary beings.

Never once in any of his books is there the faintest indication of bad taste, or any touch of the erotic, in spite of the very human passion which he often portrays. The purveyors of fiction that tries to be desperately wicked and frequently succeeds only in being ridiculous had better read "Aftermath," if only to get it burnt into them what love really is. No man could know the tiny book without having some grain of impurity removed, some little desire for true beauty of spirit driven to a deeper hold upon him, and the same statement, we think, can be made irrefutably of all Mr. Allen's romances. No greater praise could possibly be given to an author when such gifts of influence over feeling and motive are aided by an almost impeccable grace, and we look to Mr. Allen as one whose pen will yet, we hope for many years, do indomitable service in one of the finest causes in the world—true literary style and true purity of thought. Such service was never more needed than it is to-day.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

THE poets would still appear to be dumb and the editors sickly-faced with the pale cast of anxiety. In other words, our brilliant contemporaries remain more or less denuded of poetry. Two Saturdays ago the Spectator, it is true, struggled into the light bearing on its bosom a trifling gem by Mr. Newman Howard. Mr. Howard had really nothing to say, and he mixed his metaphors somewhat. Encouraged no doubt by the silence with which we received this effort, Mr. St. Loe Strachey ventured forth on Saturday last with a lengthy screed in the Somerset dialect, which, while no means bad in its way, was utterly spoilt as art by the childish improbability of its subject matter and by a stupid announcement to the effect that the verses were a description of what actually took place when a certain peer descended into a coal mine. Of course, in the strict sense the Spectator's verses were not poetry at all. The Athenæum and the Outlook for their parts continue to be poemless, which is good of them. The Nation, however, cannot restrain itself, and it has discovered a poet of the name of Ensor who has supplied it with a quotation from Pindar and fifteen stanzas about the ocean, of which the following is the first:

Down in the darkness to the coast
I ran on passionate feet
To greet the friend I loved the most
And hungered most to meet,
To hail the friend my heart had lost
And hear its surges beat.

"Passionate feet" is agreeably startling. And one cannot help wondering whether the surges mentioned in the last line are to be referred to "coast" in the first line or to "my heart" in line five. For if "surges" have to do with "ceast" they would seem to be as far away from it as the sea is from Southport. And if, on the other hand, they have to do with "my heart" the Nation might very well see a doctor at once. And after having its heart overhauled it might have its passionate feet attended to for one and the same fee. (Thrift, thrift, Horatio!)

Not to be outdone, the Saturday Review prints some lines concerning an artist for whose memory we have the greatest respect, and who probably would have been vastly amused by them, considered in their relation to art. The "poet" is Mr. D. S. MacColl, who, we need scarcely say, is no poet at all. We append the justifying sample:

Through the Australian desert, through the press
Of maddening wanton life in cities roaring,
You held your charter to the radiant gates;
Sea-gates of summer, pearl and chrysoprase,
Wood-gates of spring, blossoming rose and snow,
Floodgates of night, passion and vision and pain.
Therein abide, even in your Chantemesle,
That all men pass, where no one ever comes.

We must really call upon Mr. Harold Hodge to tell us in that incisive prose for which the Saturday Review is so justly celebrated what, in the name of all that is pathetic, the sentence beginning at "Therein abide" and ending "where no one ever comes" may be taken grammatically to mean.

Like his far-famed Wapping Wasp, the "towsy tyke" has fallen down—down; quite "six inches down"—from the Athenæum to the Westminster Gazette. Saturday was the day before St. Valentine's Day, and the "towsy tyke" naturally felt himself impelled to song. It seems that our Testament-maker is at times pleased to be humorous:

ERNEST: In bosoms that nothing can please,

Being empty of pleasure and sunk
In themselves; being wizened and frail
Like vats when the wine has been drunk—
Being warped and unspeakably stale
Like vats in desuetude shrunk.
Let the season and nature prevail,

Let the winepress of youth overrun—
JULIEN: If the valves be corroded with rust,
And the power and the gearing undone!—

ERNEST: Empurpled with stains of the must,
My fancy, forestalling the sun—

JULIEN: In the City we take him on trust!—

We consider that if the "towsy tyke" did not offer this shrewd bit of rapier work to the Editor of the Athenæum he missed the opportunity of a lifetime. That lunge about "in the City we take him on trust" is worthy of Mr. Wilkie Bard. Surely our poet of St. Valentine cannot have heard Mr. Pellissier sing "There's a sun still shining in the sky." Otherwise he would have been aware that, for the present season at any rate, the gibe about the metropolitan orb of day is already appropriated:

And talking of the "towsy tyke" and poetry and the sun and so forth, we have received from a gentleman, who appears to be engaged in a professorial capacity at a college of science, a sonnet and the following letter:

The Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In THE ACADEMY of December 26th, 1908, your reviewer deals pitilessly but pithily with two sonnets, written, one by a lady, and the other by a personage referred to as "the towsy tyke"!

Happy as I am in the safety of obscurity, these criticisms afforded me much wicked enjoyment, though I do not mean to impute to your critic any but the most righteous motives imaginable. He (your critic) seems to me, however, to have challenged the whole tribe of minor poets to the combined task of producing one single satisfactory sonnet. Though I cannot claim membership with the above-mentioned august body, I nevertheless, venture to submit to your judgment the enclosed Shakespearean sonnet.

Entreating you to overlook the plagiarism involved in the first three words, yet hardly daring to hope for any indication of your austere opinion,

Yours truly,

And here is the Shakespearean "sonnet":

When I consider how the Seasons change—
From sylph-like Spring, whose tremulous tears beguile
The Lord of Day, Him causing cease to range
Midst Arctic snows; to Summer with her smile
Of sun-kissed seas and glinting daisy-meads,
Narciss-like, fainting in her own embrace;
To Autumn, pensive, clad in russet weeds
That whisperingly proclaim her queenly grace;
To Winter snell, with ringing ground, and fields
All brown and bare, and skies of wondrous grey—
Then I perceive how all that this Life yields
Of Joy or Grief, makes for the Perfect Day:
First, Youth, with faery dreams, then Love so dear
Then, Care and Age, then—Dawn o' th' Eternal Year!

We shall be happy to supply the name and address of this soaring human poet to the Editors of the Athenæum, the Outlook, the Spectator, the Saturday Review and the Westminster Gazette, provided that they do not all speak at once. "Narciss-like" is a compelling touch.

REVIEWS

PONTIFICAL SERVICES.

Alcuin Club Collections XII. Pontifical Services, Vol. IV. Illustrated from woodcuts of the 16th century. By ATHELSTAN RILEY, M.A. (Longmans, Green and Co., 21s.)

THE titles and introductions of the Alcuin Club's Collections use so many different series of numbers, that reference to a particular volume is rendered uncertain and confusing. The two volumes considered here are therefore quoted each by its author's name, Mr. F. C. Eeles and Mr. Athelstan Riley. In 1907 Mr. Eeles published reproductions of two series of woodcuts, called here A and B, which were used during the 16th century to illustrate the Pontificale Romanum, confining himself to pars prima of the book. Mr. Riley has now completed Mr. Eeles's work, in a second volume, by treating in the same way pars secunda and pars tertia. Mr. Eeles's volume was reviewed in No. 1,850 of THE ACADEMY, after the careful consideration which the work of an expert writing on his own subject demands. Since Mr. Riley's volume merely completes Mr. Eeles's, much that was said then must be recapitulated.

The particular editions chosen by the editors for reproduction are that of 1520 for Series A, and that of 1572 for Series B, both from the Giunta Press, at Venice. An apology is due to Mr. Eeles, because, from a hasty reference to his scanty preface, his reproductions were called "a selection." Comparison with the Giunta editions themselves shows that both editors have reproduced all the ceremonial woodcuts, with one exception. Mr. Riley misses, probably by accident, one which will be mentioned later. Both editors merely leave out the devotional or decorative subjects, which do not come within the scope of their work. Both add descriptive notes to every illustration, correcting the draughtsmen's constant inaccuracies by the rubrics. Mr. Eeles's notes are certainly more careful, but Mr. Riley writes a detailed and suggestive preface. The two volumes therefore form a valuable and convenient gallery of the ritual observed in services, outside the Mass, anterior, as Mr. Riley pertinently reminds us, to the reformations ordered by Clement VIII. in 1596. It is surprising to see in a service very largely illustrated, the Dedication of a Church, how much remains in the Roman Pontifical at the present day.

It was pointed out in the former review, from the plain, intrinsic evidence of Mr. Eeles's illustrations, that both series of woodcuts are mere clichés. On this point Mr. Eeles was silent, but Mr. Riley practically confirms the statement, and quotes the reappearance of Series A in an edition of the Pontificale Romanum printed at Lyons in 1542; to which may be added another Giunta edition in 1543. He also quotes a second Giunta use of many of the B Series in a Missae Episcopales of 1563. These quotations are based on no very exhaustive search, but they are sufficient for the editor's purpose, and to corroborate the statement repeated here. The inaccuracy of the woodcuts on points which they are intended to illustrate is undisputed. To the mistakes pointed out before, and to those corrected by the editors, may be added, on a minute point, the occasional omission in both sides of vitta (the bands hanging from mitres), and in the case of large objects, the omission of half of the octo magni nobiles, sive oratores, who bear of the papal canopy. This latter omission may, indeed, not arise from inaccuracy so much as from lack of space. This suggests another point in the treatment of the subjects which must be noticed. The subjects, besides being treated typically, are treated symbolically, especially when the action represented takes place over large spaces, as in the dedication of churches and churchyards. In figure 42 (Riley), Series A, the five churchyard crosses, of which the four smaller have to be of a man's height, and in situ at the boundaries of the churchyard, are all grouped close together, and even the centre, taller one, scarcely reaches to the Bishop's waist. In the later series, B, the draughtsman, trying to evade difficulties of scale, omits all human beings, but is still forced to place the crosses so close together that, to scale with the shorter ones, the churchyard could not be more than twelve feet wide. Again, the single woodcut omitted by Mr. Riley (fol. 112, ed. 1520) represents the writing by the Bishop of the Greek and Latin alphabets across the floor of a church at consecration. During the singing of the Veni Creator ashes are strewn from corner to corner, so that they form an X or St. Andrew's cross. A little later, while the Benedictus is sung, the Bishop, with the butt of his pastoral staff, traces in the ashes first the Greek alphabet on one line, and then the Latin on the other. The intersection of the alphabets therefore occurs in the middle of the church, but not until the Bishop has finished all the Greek letters, and has passed the N of the Latin. The draughtsman could find no other way of representing this, than by putting the Bishop in a corner, with the two alphabets intersecting in front of him, at A and D, or thereabouts.

Since the woodcuts are so inaccurate on their own ground, they afford very slight evidence as to the existence of fashions at particular times and places, to which the draughtsmen's attention is not specially directed, and which are not described in the rubrics or the Ceremoniale.

Mr. Riley is inclined to give too much weight to the differences between the earlier and later series. These differences serve for little more than to remind the eye that changes were taking place in vestments during the 16th century, with the changes in architecture. Sleeveless, chasuble-shaped surplices were used in some places, and large mappa (the "fair linen cloths"), hanging in folds; apparels (rectangular patches of ornament) were tending to be disused; the clergy were beginning to grow beards, though the decree of the Council of Carthage against them, and the versicles and prayer to be said by the Bishop over the youthful student for orders when he first shaved, were still printed in the Pontificale as late at least as 1497. But it cannot be inferred, without other evidence, that these fashions were in use at the times or places of the editions in which they occur. Much less can be inferred concerning the number of lights placed on the altars, and the shape of mitres. Mr. Riley mentions the increase of height in the mitres of Series B as evidence of their later date. The evidence is very uncertain. Mitres of many shapes had been in use for a long period. Besides Carpaccio's very tall mitres of the nineties in the 15th century, taller and larger mitres than those in Series B are common in the pictures of other Venetian painters of that century, such as the Vivarini; while Jacobello del Fiore, in 1438, represents a contemporary donor, a Bishop of Ceneda, with a very high mitre on the ground beside him. Beyond the Alps, also, Albrecht Dürer represents St. Ulrick, in 1508, wearing an enormous mitre, and St. Poppo and St. Otto, in 1515, wearing mitres equally tall, but not so wide.

On the other hand, in Venetian Missals of the years 1506 and 1518, far more characteristically Italian than the ones here considered, very short, bulbous mitres are to be found. Similarly with the number of altar lights, Mr. Riley reminds us that seven lights were in use on the altar of the papal chapel in Rome at this date and much earlier. Though they may have been the rule at Mass even always, candlesticks do not appear generally on altars in the Pope's presence at other times; in fact, the altars are bare, or only adorned with a cross. However, no Pope and altar appear together in these series, and there is only one representation of an altar at Mass (fig. 129, Riley, and fol. 229, ed. 1543); the rite represented, the singing of the Christus vincit, Christus imperat, Christus regnat, was confined alicubus locis, and is not even mentioned in a Venetian Pontifical of the year 1510. Figure 129, indeed, shows two lighted candles on the altar, and two on high candlesticks in front of it, but representations are common of altars at Mass with one light held by the server, and with no lights at all; an example may be seen in the Canon-picture of the Giunta, 1563, Missae Episcopales; here the only light, even at the Elevation, is the server's torch. Again, in a Venetian Missal of 1506, there are two lights on the altar and no torch. The illustrations of this Missal are much the most characteristically Italian referred to here, yet the Canon-picture is treated purely historically, in a style suggesting Mantegna. Pilate on his judgment seat appears prominently in the foreground, while the Christ, on the cross in the distant background, is robed to the feet, and has the robe tied round the ankles. The Canon-picture also of the Giunta, 1543, edition is much more archaic and German in treatment than that of the one accompanying the same ceremonial woodcuts in the 1520 edition. It further marks the stock nature of the woodcuts. It is therefore difficult to agree with Mr. Riley that they are safe guides to the practices obtaining in Venice, where they were printed. He also remarks of Series B that "the artist evidently drew what he was accustomed to see before him in the churches of his day." The artist really cannot be described as more than an inferior draughtsman and a very bad wood-engraver. Nor does either draughtsman show signs of individual observation, unless it be in the candle-end left on one of the two prickets in figure 48 (Eeles) of Series A. Otherwise the woodcuts should rather be regarded as diagrams supplied by printers' draughtsmen illustrating particular steps in ceremonial, from the receipts given them by some ceremoniaris.

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH

The Measure of Our Youth. By ALICE HERBERT.
(John Lane, 6s.)

MISS HERBERT has given us in this novel a hero at whom it would be quite possible to poke fun, and some situations at which it would be easy to be superficially sarcastic. We believe, however, that in this study of an impressionable youth she is too serious and sincere to be taken lightly, and that his experiences, bearing essentially considerable resemblance to the search of Jocelyn Pierston for "The Well-Beloved," are those of many a young man in whom quickly excited emotions are not sentinelled by strong common-sense. To call such a man a "flirt" is often to do him great injustice; he is practically at the mercy of any pretty woman whose eyes invite him, by reason of his temperament. If, as is frequently the case, he is something of an idealist, and in the end is caught by mere beauty—as happens here—then steps in tragedy. With Bewley's marriage to Margaret the book closes; all his previous slips have taught him nothing—which is where we think Miss Herbert shows him up rather too unkindly; and we are left wondering what will happen, for certainly he will not long remain in love with her, nor she with him, if ever she was at all. She is summed up mercilessly:

She was as beautiful as she was stupid, as stately as she was mean of soul, and as spiritual in her beauty as she was materialistic in her mind. She was practical and full of sound common-sense—no doll, but a "good plain cook," without the exuberantly affectionate disposition traditionally peculiar to cooks she should have been married in her youth to a member of the Stock Exchange and held "a little lower than his horse," behind which he would have very proudly driven her to Richmond on fine Saturdays. She would have conscientiously mothered his neat children, ordered his dinners . . . until she fattened, shrivelled again, and died. Of such is the kingdom of England.

And two of Bewley's friends, discussing the state of affairs in the newly-married man's household, appraise it with equal point:

"What's wrong with him?"

"Wrong? Nothing's wrong. He's as right, and as respectable—and as interesting—as the water-rate. He trots round smirkingly after that wickedly tenth-rate young woman; and he talks to you all the time about the furniture. They 'picked up' this tawdriness in Tottenham Court Road, and that beautifully convenient nightmare in Westbourne Grove, and the other vulgarity in Wardour Street. The walls are covered with things in frames; and there's not a picture or the cheapest photo of a picture among the lot—except the Botticelli you sent; and Madam has hung that in the spare room. She's 'afraid she's not very fond of old-fashioned sorts of pictures'—and Bewley beams at her! There's not a book allowed in the drawing-room. 'Books make such a litter.' The man's dead."

The major portion of the book is occupied with his various escapades and his state of mind, and it constitutes a piece of psychology of which the author may well be proud, absorbing in interest; lightened, too, by abundant humour, and dialogue that is brilliant, but not unnaturally so. Helena Swayne, subtle, seeing right through the poor fellow, pungent and yet sympathetic, is a finely-conceived foil to the servant-girlish amours of the little Cockney Lizzie. "I wants yer just t' love me a little," Lizzie gulps. Helena, on the other hand, is an artist:

As the two glided back to Chelsea in a "taxi," Helena's pretty hand, ungloved, again lay near to Francie's knee. He hesitated long, his heart-beats choking him. . . . Perhaps she was thinking him an idiot for being so unenterprising! Horrid thought! He took her hand up softly, and it lay between his palms—almost, he felt, as if it wanted rest. Then she withdrew it gently.

"It's what I said," she told him, no emotion in her voice; "material things are all that people care for. No, I don't mean that's what you care for, boy! I mean that I may have been giving out my soul to you for hours (I haven't: don't you think it!) and not a cat would care. But if I let you hold my hand, they'd say I was a wicked woman. And my husband would decidedly object!"

We must not allow more space to the details of these "flirtations" that teach young Bewley so much and yet warn him so little against his nature; but the whole story is a fine, acute, and poignant study of a certain type of adolescence and its trials which will do much more than merely amuse. The reader who appreciates the author's evident sincerity will be inclined to thank her for having written it.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Adventures of Louis Blake. By LOUIS BECKE.
(T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

A RIGHT good share of adventure had Mr. Louis Blake, and a right good story has Mr. Becke made out of it, as might have been expected. From San Francisco to Cocos Island, where occurs an interlude of treasure-hunting, and thence to the author's chosen scenes amid the lovely coral islets of the Pacific Ocean, we follow the career of the young sailor and trader with the greatest of interest; nothing comes amiss to him—whaling, fighting, fishing, yarning, it is all fine sport and part of the excitement that makes life worth living. We do not doubt that the greater portion of this book is a record of actual events, for Mr. Becke's name will be well known to our readers, and he writes with an unaffected style that gives a very real and natural touch to each incident in the fortunes of his hero. Boys will delight in the story, and the boys of a larger growth who crave for the welcome relief of a plain tale sans heroine and love affairs will not be inclined to set it down if once they begin to read. They will call to mind certain days when they were under the spell of W. H. G. Kingston and Captain Marryat, and they will not be sorry to experience the old charm again in a slightly more modern guise. The pure story of adventure that can interest a grown-up person is somewhat of a rarity in the present strenuous age, and Mr. Becke is to be congratulated upon his success; he revives that thirst for travel and that desire for the sea which all healthy boys suffer at least once in their lives, and he will give most of his readers a longing to visit those beauteous islands of the South Seas unfortunately set so far away "down under."

The Unbeloved. By ETHEL HILL. (Greening and Co., Ltd., 6s.)

THE writer of this novel is the possessor of a luscious and opulent style. Adjectives flock to her pen like birds to the call of the charmer. She is intensely melodramatically conscious of the artistic value of backgrounds. Every event must have its appropriate setting of natural scenery. When the heroine feels it necessary to betray the secrets of her soi-distant husband to an old acquaintance, we are gravely informed that "a bird on a rose-twigg trilled out a song,"—"the connection of which with the plot one sees," to adopt Calverley. Miss Hill betrays a lofty disregard for the conventional rules of English grammar and syntax. She splits her infinitives recklessly and defiantly. "They had been talking about the materialisation of thoughts, and then had followed that startling phenomena," she writes, with blissful unconsciousness. Her knowledge of London topography would appear to be of the slightest. When Mary stood on Westminster Bridge, "meaning to walk along the embankment to Blackfriars, and then on to Drury Lane," she contemplated an absurdly circuitous route, since by turning down Savoy Street she would have saved at least half an hour.

The story itself need not detain us. A sentimental and neurotic girl falls madly in love with a man, about whom she knows nothing, save that he is a bully and a boor. At a word from him, she consents to share his home, dispensing with the formality of the marriage-bond. When it turns out that the man is already married and a notorious thief to boot, she considers that she has a right to complain. The novel closes with the suicide of the thief, and the birth of the woman's baby. It is a wantonly offensive and unpleasant story, and there are certain details in it which, we assert, quite frankly, a woman ought to be ashamed to have written.

The Heart of a Gypsy. By ROSAMOND NAPIER. (Duckworth and Co., 6s.)

IF we concede that an eminent London surgeon at the age of thirty-nine, accustomed to the world and its ways, would on a holiday fall in love with a beautiful, rather uncanny, and entirely uncultivated gipsy girl of eighteen, and bring her to his town house as his future bride, we can settle down to enjoy this clever and thoughtful book; but the concession to probability is a large one. However, the study of this untamed child of Nature suddenly transported to the restrained atmosphere of the big city, where she must learn to dissemble and to be polite with people whose very proximity she detests, is a very consistent piece of work, and in the interest of it we lose sight to a great extent of the questionable basis upon which it is constructed. An element of fantasy is introduced by the curious psychic relationship of the girl with the beech-tree under which, as a baby, she was abandoned; it fills her thoughts, forms her consolation in distress, and at the last its doom is hers. It is a high compliment to a writer when the reader can say that this risky use of the occult is successful; in this instance it seems not at all absurd or incongruous. The conflict between the girl's passionate love for Nature, for open spaces, sun, wind and rain, and her love for the man, is excellently suggested. No permanent happiness could come of such an infatuation, of course, and the end of the story is inevitably sad.

The description of life at the old Somersetshire household is vivid and humorous; "Bunny," the parson's daughter, who writes her father's sermons and rebels comically against her cramped existence, is an especially delightful character. There are two or three blemishes on the quality of the book—the distinguished surgeon, for example, is fond of calling his sweetheart his "wild, shy Hind," and the simile is sometimes rather unfortunate:

"We will buy them, every one," he cried, with the recklessness of a boy in his teens. "Flowers for the shy, wild Hind to smell and munch till her sweet breath is sweeter still, to roll in, to trample down with her delicate hoofs if she wills."

This is sheer bathos. The author speaks of the "chicness of a Frenchwoman," which is by no means a pleasant mixture of languages. And she should not call "Widdecombe Fair" a Somersetshire song; it makes Devonshire people want to get up and throw things.

Lucius Scarfield. By J. A. REVERMORT. (Archibald Constable and Co., Ltd., 6s.)

WHATEVER else it may be, "Lucius Scarfield" is certainly a monument to a man's industry. To write a book which, when printed, runs to 574 crowded pages, must have required no little courage. To read it demands a certain dogged and invincible pertinacity of purpose, which is likely, in this instance, to be its own reward. The reader who has displayed sufficient hardihood to be in at the death can hardly avoid asking, "Why was this written?" and, again, "What does it all mean?" To neither of these questions are we in a position to offer a satisfactory reply. Mr. Revermort describes this book as a "philosophical romance of the twentieth century." It might more fitly be described as a nightmare in five spasms. The world in which Mr. Revermort and his strange creations move is a world entirely remote from human experience. His characters are less men and women than human ghouls. Through all the sorry drama there runs a streak of evil, and the reader is never free from the noxious vapours of the charnel house. There are no commonplace moments, no restful interludes. A feeling of electricity is always in the air. The dialogue would have delighted Mrs. Radcliffe herself. This is the way in which one schoolgirl talks to another:

"Do not reproach me, or you will kill me here. Forgive me, forgive me! I knew not what I said. Without you, what had my life been? Without you, what will my death be? A light beyond the empyrean falls about me where you are; where you are not, all is ruin. You to die and I to live on? Madness comes round me again."

Mr. Revermort's style is unnecessarily complex. He has, it must be admitted, a fine feeling for words, but he is apt—as in the following sentence—to torture meaning to the verge of madness:

He had the sensation of flooding intimacies, and at times her essence, at war with his, seemed to conquer, and, enfolding it, to possess it utterly, intoxicating him with the feeling of being re-fashioned by the happiest hours, or by the creative joys which this woman had experienced amid scenes by himself unvisited, or in the company of the marble dreams of Hellas, by himself half-understood.

Frankly, we regret this book: the more so because there are ample indications that Mr. Revermort, if he chose to unbend his intellect to more mundane themes, might write a very creditable novel. As it is, we can only regard "Lucius Scarfield" as a melancholy illustration of the effect produced upon a certain type of mind by a too sympathetic study of Schopenhauer and the pessimistic philosophy of modern Europe.

AN OUTDOOR BREVARY

I.

THE writer of these notes looked about him with no intent to find a key to the lock of this world. In Berkeley's Alciphron the objects of sight are offered as arbitrary signs "by whose sensible intervention the Author of Nature constantly explaineth Himself in the eyes of men"; but this spectator of the world looked no farther than its arbitrary signs. To draw pleasure from them was his gay science, and at first his whole aim was to call back the sun in winter when it did not shine, or to extend its short and weak shining season; and the aim of his self-discipline was to train the retentive faculties necessary to the reproduction of impressions, to habitualise the memory to repeat, on that sensitive glass where images of thought or sense are stamped, the sparkling freshness of first vision, to extort a permanent impress of beauty from those very figures whose charm is ephemerality. Presently he seemed to draw an inward and tranquil satisfaction, a message of the admonitus locorum, from the thing perceived; which seemed other than the simpler pleasure of the satisfied sense. Of this, the following notes are a record.

I will go out into the fields, for short self-heal grows among the grass.

Let the one object and business of existence be the sweeping the waters of Life with busy nets, in the hope of entangling some creature "of bright hue and sharp fin," and finding this piercing brightness and beauty not so much in seas as in creeping and hidden brooks, not in the prodigality, the climaxes of fine scenery, but in the familiar and compassed beauty of, say, bare spaces and thin-sown trees subject to light, of a country where is nothing salient or sudden, of the sun washing a jewelled knob of moss, in a poplar clapping its fresh leaves, with its sonus desiliensis aquæ.

"Lift up thine eyes to the hills"; but not to the high mountains.

To-day the frost has yielded, and, in spite of savourless winter, the living earth can be smelt. The absence of odours is the worse side of a "hard" winter. We learn from Henry VIII.'s commissioners that one of the former abbots of the abbey of Boxley, in Kent, "pleasured much in odoriferous savours as it should seem by converting the rents of the monastery that were wont to be paid in corn and grain into gilly-flowers and roses." Let us honour the memory of the Abbot of Boxley.

We shall have snow in spring and a summer, maybe, which will be no summer, but, as Jean Paul says, a winter painted green; but this month the air has been as warm as milk, with winter gnats dancing up and down from the ditch to the sun. It is the February summer, the warm interval in the train of St. Valentine that comes between the January frosts and the March winds that hiss through the white blackthorns. "When the waters break from their enclosures, and well with joy and run in useful channels; and the flies do rise again from their little graves in walls, and dance awhile in the air, to tell that there is joy within." Beneath the hedge the dead sorrel spires are dipped in rust, and the black fallen hawthorn leaves, the silver grass stalks, bleached by sun and dew, are a background to the pushing up of young grass, of the plantain and primrose crowns, the heart-shaped leaves of the celandine, the trodden chickweed by the gatepost. A dandelion is half-open by the roadside, and a pale-coloured, half-open speedwell and a pinkish-lilac ragged robin are spreading under the shelter of some bronzed-green brambles, while wild parsley lays its jewel-like green fronds here and there above the fallow grass, and the buff oak leaves that choke the ditch, and the grey-veined mat of ivy. A frond of hart's-tongue fern is brown at the tip, but the young fronds are shooting. There is a hollow near a stile in which hundreds of beech and oak leaves, of a wet and lustrous chestnut-colour, have settled so thickly as to cover the grass, and in the sandy field beyond a gorse-bush is sprinkled with five golden spots of bloom, and greenfinches start from the thickets where blackbirds and thrushes are singing.

It is a day of sudden rains; the sky clouds, then chinks of intolerable brightness appear in dark cloud-packs, which fill with a streaming haze of light that lengthens into fan-like water-carriers, drilling their long rows of rain into the earth. An eclipse of the pale-coloured sun, and the lenient rain falls in a spray as fine as sand. Then, like a precious gum, the sun wells out again and spills itself over the green-filmed stems of the tall elms in the hollow, each visible to the foot, and made individual in the plantation by the sudden brightness of their background. The cloud above the sun is frayed again, and now the sun hangs like a lamp above a crater-shaped cloud, and below in the intenser light the distant hillocks and down and pale-coloured fields begin to smoke.

When the shortest day recedes, there is triumph in the encroaching of the light, the enlargement of the light of lights, the "house of mirth." A burning pillar of fire both to be a guide of the unknown journey and a harmless sun to entertain us honourably.

The seasons and spots where light is most manifest have a peculiar attraction, the clear and desirable light in the morning, that almost too sharp precision of the protracted day before the warm veiled weather begins, the whiteness of the sky from whence light is issuing, mimetic water, the rain-varnished road, the sharp pebble in the wall, the light-splintering leaves of laurel and thistle. Did not a certain monk, Joachim, almost transfer his allegiance? One day he was preaching in a dark chapel—in almost complete darkness, for the sky was packed with clouds—when suddenly there was a break, a lightening, and the sun shines out in the chapel. He stops, and salutes the sun, and intoning the Veni Creator, "Emmène son auditoire contempler la campagne."

A rough, high-shouldered pasture-field, patched with dock and faded rushes, where every tiny hillock and crowded mole-heap was sharply shadowed, while the light smote upon the grey dewdrops on their sunward side—large variable jewels, cold sea-green beryl, and gold, and red; and the same large lights moved upon the points of the sharp rushes, and varnished docks, upon the purple-stemmed bramble in the hedge and upon the buff leaf melting into the hue of the earth it is to fatten.

How bright are the grass-bents! Their seeds have fallen, the last dregs of sap dried in them, but they shine like filaments of spun glass; they are rooted in the crannies of the long orange-spotted wall, which a film of water, bright and thin as a snail's trail, dapples. The blue sky flows over the long wall as a stream flows over a pebble, and in it the spark-like doves, flying high, shake the light from their mirror-like white breasts, and then, as they wheel with a sharp clatter, dissolve—sparkle and dissolve again. There is a spirit of life in everything, and in the very air "atherium sensum atque aurai simplicis ignem."

When you stand on a hillside facing the low-hung winter sun, the racing and quarrelling larks in the fields below move like stars as they turn the reflection of the slanting rays upon their polished wing-shafts.

So, to a high-poised lark, those below must "shine and run to and fro like spark among the stubble," provoking him to swift descent. And so the "pretty aetheriall birds," as Aubrey calls them, were taken "by alluring them with a dareing-glass, which is whirled about in a sun-shining day, and the larks are pleased at it, and strike at it, as at a sheep's eye, and at that time the nett is drawn over them, while he plays with his glasse he whistles with his larke-call of silver."

How carefully we count the first steps of the two plants that show the earliest green in spring, woodbine with its greyish leaves, and the elder which puts forth its paired leaves, and between them the small brownish granular disc, the promise of that broad-faced water-like flower that will smell at the time "when all the ground is poudred as if it had been peynt, and where every flower casts up a good savour."

It is a day of wind, when the mounting rock is blown aside like a feather, a day of sun and snow, alternating as swiftly as the cloud-isles and cloud-streaks drawn by the wind on the downs. Now a flaring sun, set like a single jewel in the blue enamel of the sky between dull packs of cloud, and now a thin smoking veil that darkens until it has outwept its snow—just one or two granules, then semi-flakes the size of bees, then "blossoms" that flash and fall, and wink and hover and are over-past and renewed, and then cease before the sun. "Il sera le mois de Mai quand il plaira à Dieu."

To Pan the city is as smoke to the nostrils, as vinegar to the palate. It is Pan of the promontories that wanders above the voices of the hedge-birds upon the brown shoulders of the hilltops, where the air is cold as metal, and where the blue bog-like springs soak out among the rushes and the sprinkled white flints, where the matted turf is patched with dry olive moss, and fine hair-like grass, and budded gorse and brittle heather; Pan that overlooks the sheep-fields, on which sheep are marked in silver spots upon the green slopes and ribbed swells sharp in the clear austere light; and whence their laments and the bark of an incessant dog rise to the hilltop. In the bright rushing of the wind in unencumbered places and uplands, the tinkling of the hollow gicks' pipe and dead grass among the brambles, its singing hiss among the dry needles of the pine, we hear the goat-footed piper of desolate places and "stony seats" making the music which is itself the charm and terror of things.

M. J.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE monthly meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday evening, the 17th instant, at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, Mr. H. Mellish, President, in the chair.

Mr. E. Mawley read his "Report on the Phenological Observations for 1908." The most noteworthy features of the weather of the Phenological year ending November, 1908, were the severe frosts early in January, the exceptionally heavy fall of snow and remarkably low temperatures in the latter part of April, and the marked periods of unusually wet and dry weather during the summer. In February and March wild plants came into blossom in advance of their usual time, but throughout the rest of the flowering season were more or less behind their average dates. Such early spring migrants as the swallow, cuckoo and nightingale made their appearance very late. The only deficient farm crop was that of barley. The yield of wheat, oats and beans was rather above the average, that of peas and hay very good, while the crops of turnips, mangolds and potatoes, taken together, were the most abundant for many years. The yield of apples was under average, and that of pears and plums much under average. On the other hand, the crops of currants, gooseberries and strawberries were almost everywhere unusually good. As regards the farm crops, this was the third good year in succession, although compared with 1906 and 1907 the yields in 1908, except in the case of turnips, mangolds and potatoes, were very inferior to those of either of those years.

Mr. W. Marriott read a paper on "The Cold Spell at the end of December, 1908." The weather during

From Everett & Co.'s List

NEW FICTION.

MRS. WHISTON'S HOUSE PARTY

By THOMAS COBB.

THE DEVIL'S ACE

By FERGUS HUME.

"A 'mystery' novel of the first water."—Western Mail.

FELIX STONE

By A. & C. ASKEW.

THE DEGENERATE

By FRED WHISHAW.

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON.

"The Iron Heel" is a book for all to read, and its insight, large sympathy, clear reasoning, and high aims are in evidence in every chapter."—Pall Mall Gazette.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"A justifiable attack on those who seek to honour God by dishonouring His methods. . . . Miss Graham tells the story with charm and pathos."—Daily Telegraph.

"Deserves the attention it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM.

"Mr. Wyndham at his best."—Scotsman.
"Mr. Wyndham always writes of military life as one who knows it, and his slight sketches of officers are happy and unexaggerated."—Globe.

London: EVERETT & Co., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

December was generally mild until Christmas Day, when a considerable change took place in the distribution of barometric pressure, and the weather assumed a wintry character. Gales occurred in many places and snow fell more or less over the British Isles during the following week. The most remarkable feature, however, was the intense cold which prevailed over the central and south-eastern portion of England from the 28th to the 31st. The temperature on the 28th did not rise above 25° over a considerable portion of the Midlands, while on the 29th it remained below 25° over practically the whole of England (except the south-western counties) up to within about twenty miles of the coast. On the 28th, 29th and 30th over the greater part of the country the minimum thermometer fell below 20° , while over a considerable area it fell below 10° on the 29th and 30th. At several places the lowest temperature recorded was about zero. At Berkhamstead the thermograph showed that the temperature remained below 25° for a period of fifty-eight hours—a most unusual occurrence. Mr. Marriott stated that the isobaric charts indicated that during this period there was a ridge or wedge of high pressure between two cyclonic systems, and that the conditions were thus favourable for the production of great cold. For the month of December the cold was very exceptional, as the only instances in the neighbourhood of London or at Greenwich in which the maximum temperature was below 25° for the day were the following: 1796, 25th, 19° .5; 1798, 28th, 19° .5; 1816, 22nd, 24° .0; 1830, 24th, 22° .0; 1855, 21st, 23° .2; 1874, 31st, 24° .5; 1890, 22nd, 23° .7; and 1908, 29th, 25° .4, and 30th, 23° .3.

CORRESPONDENCE

"SCHOPENHAUER AND WAGNER": A REPLY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Oddly enough, four days prior to your last issue I had sent my publishers the matter for a new brief Preface—suggested by myself in a letter to them of two months earlier, but delayed in execution by a more urgent task only just completed—to replace the original appeal to my readers' sympathies with which, now somewhat out of date, at a time of great trouble and worry in every direction, I had bidden them Auf Wiedersehen! Perhaps this intimation may somewhat relieve the mind of your correspondent, J. T. Presslie (who must forgive me if I feel uncertain whether to say "Mr." or "Miss"), though I am unable to remove a "full-page photograph of his [my] little house in Surrey," which, for very good reasons, has never adorned Vol. VI., or any other volume, of my "Life of Wagner." My said new Preface opens with a word of congratulation to readers who are "rather late in the field"; I little guessed that I was on the point of confrontation with a reviewer in the same category, but must congratulate myself on the unusual experience, in these days of swift oblivion, that a work of mine should actually be criticised nearly eleven months after issue.

What I do regret, though, is that the critic of a special chapter in my Volume VI. should display so little acquaintance at first hand with the works of a philosopher for whom he (or she?) ventures to figure as champion. Echoing a voice I lately heard elsewhere, J. M. Presslie opines that "To speak of the disembodied Will in terms of Time is as ridiculous as to attribute the properties of sound to silence—to speak of a B flat Silence, or a Silence in A sharp!" Quite apart from Berlioz having characterised the love-scene in his "Troyens" as "l'expression de ce bonheur de voir la nuit, d'entendre le silence," and Wagner having described the orchestration of his "Tristan" love-scene as "the deep art of sounding silence"—both of which eloquent paradoxes your correspondent might have encountered in my Vol. VI. aforesaid—I must remind my newest critic that on page 35 (only four pages before my "very foolish speech on page 39") I had quoted from Schopenhauer himself: "True, we can carry out no idea of the above entirely without employing terms of Time. Such terms should be excluded where the Thing-in-itself is concerned [according to his master, Kant], only it pertains to the unalterable confines of our intellect that it can never quite dispense with this first and most immediate form of all its operations"; and from the same philosopher again, page 37: "In this Will we, therefore, recognise the Thing-in-itself, so far as it no longer has Space, but merely Time, as form." J. T. Presslie may possess such a mental equipment as entirely to "dispense with this first and most immediate form of all our intellect's operations," but I confess to not having personally risen to so sublime a height that I can think without an elementary notion of Sequence.

There are other remarks in that letter in your issue for the 13th inst (the anniversary of Wagner's death, by the way) which I consider too offensive for more than a mere nailing to the counter—e.g., "For these amendments in Wagner's own words we should have been grateful; possibly Mr. Ellis had them in his hands, and yet preferred to give us his own interpretations"; and "Then what a pity that Mr. Ellis and all the rest of us do not suffer from a similar eye-complaint," which might easily be met with the rejoinder, What warrant have you for assuming that Mr. Ellis does not? As for the immediately succeeding question, however, "Or was it that Schopenhauer would have been a philosopher in any case, but quite a different kind of philosopher if he had known no eye-strain?" I emphatically answer, Yes, and have proved it in that chapter of mine by the "rays of hope" that filtered into his "System" as advancing years brought that "assuagement of nervous troubles" which Herbert Spencer also recognised in his own person without knowing the physiological reason why. If anybody chooses to consider the advice to "hie you to the oculist" when suffering from "sick-headache, nerve-storms," and so on, "completely ridiculous," I can but pity that individual for being so behind the times (you see, I have still to speak "in terms of Time"); but I cannot think highly of his or her altruism, and am half inclined to revoke the sympathy I originally felt for the hopeless hash which a printer seems to have made of your correspondent's closing sentence: "The splendid translations Mr. Ellis has given us of Wagner's prose works render unhappy this lapse in the treatment of the Schopenhauer chapter all the more remarkable." Doubtless it attests my ignorance, that I am unaware of J. T. Presslie's claim to an authoritative verdict; but I may console myself with the reflection that an authority of such world-wide renown as Professor Wolfgang Golther has publicly recorded his opinion of that selfsame chapter thus: "Das erste Kapitel schildert Wagners Weltanschauung in ihrer Verwandtschaft mit Schopenhauers. Voran steht der Tod des Hundes Peps, die tiefe Liebe Wagners zum Tier, die gerade in diesem Fall durch besonders zahlreiche und schöne Briefstelle bezeugt ist. Und von diesem Mittelpunkt aus erwächst die Religion des Mitleids, die schliesslich Schopenhauers Pessimismus zu überwinden vermochte. Ich kenne keine Darstellung, die so klar und anschaulich die wesentliche und grundlegende Einstimmung zwischen Wagners und Schopenhauers Gedankenwelt heraushebt, gleichsam uns wissend macht durchs Gefühl, nicht durch leere Begriffe."

WM. ASHTON ELLIS.

Brighton, February 16th, 1909.

THE RIGHT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Will you allow me, after thanking you for the kind and, on the whole, appreciative notice of my little book, "Church Principles for Christians," to refer to one point raised by your reviewer.

I suspect that we are au fond, in agreement, or should be if we came to define our terms, but, as he says that my plea for "private judgment" seemingly "vitiate everything for which" I have "been contending," pray permit me to say that the review in question recognises the right of duty of such judgment. Your reviewer appeals throughout to the private judgment of his readers. And he is dealing with questions of dogmatics.

The fact is, we cannot, do what we will, divest ourselves of this prerogative. I can neither accept nor reject your reviewer's contentions without its exercise.

But this does not mean that every man is to construct ad initio his own creed.

JOSEPH HAMMOND.

[We are glad to find that there is, after all, very little difference between Canon Hammond's position and our own. Of course, it is true that in one sense we all exercise the faculty of private judgment. For if a man entrusts his conscience into the keeping of a Church he must first satisfy himself with regard to the credentials of that Church, and this necessarily involves an act of private judgment. His submission once made, however, his "private judgment" has nothing further to say in the matter. He has decided for the principle of authority, and what the Church imposes, that he is bound to accept. That is the Catholic position and it is the only logical position that can be taken by those who believe, as all Anglicans profess to believe, that their Church is Catholic and Apostolic.—EDITOR.]

THE KING'S ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—We are honestly reluctant to avail ourselves further of the opportunities for gratis advertisement provided by THE ACADEMY and its correspondents. We will at least be brief, and deal only with the particular rulings laid down by W. McC.; our logic, scholarship, politeness, golliwogism, Covent Gardenism, obvious badness, and notion that brackets are legitimate or not according to context, must take care of themselves. The first two rulings are evoked by our sentence, "But we have considerable hopes that no one else has been deceived." (1) "'Hopes' is not good English. . . It is on a par with 'We have considerable faiths that . . .'" The Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. hope, after defining it as, among other things, "Expectation of something desired," adds by way of note:—"c. in plural; often in singular sense, esp. in phr. in hopes," and quotes among its examples:—"Great hopes were entertained at Whitehall that Cornish would appear . . ."—Macaulay.

(2) "'Deceit' is not in question; therefore 'deceived' is not the proper word." The O. E. D. gives, s.v. deceive:—"2. To cause to believe what is false," with, as one example:—"Wolsey . . . was too wise to be deceived with outward prosperity."—Froude. And, s.v. deceived, it offers misled as a synonym. Your correspondent's error is the elementary one of assuming that there is always absolute parallelism between all senses of words etymologically related; the same line of argument would forbid us to describe as enormous an animal that was innocent of enormity. The third definite ruling is that "'seduced' into buying a book is not good English; induced is the word." Rather, it is a word, and one for a different thing; to seduce into doing is to induce to do by misrepresentation or temptation—the sense that we happened to require.

THE AUTHORS OF "THE KING'S ENGLISH."

[The authors of "The King's English" must not confuse the opinion of THE ACADEMY with that of its correspondents. We have stated that the King's English is not always a reliable guide, and this statement we are prepared to substantiate from the book itself. But that is not to say that it is a worthless book or that it is not interesting and stimulating and on the whole a valuable book. All we maintain is, that it is not infallible.—ED.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

Personal Recollections of Wagner. By Angelo Newman. Translated from the Fourth German Edition by Edith Livermore. Constable, 10s. 6d. net.

FICTION

The Dream and the Woman. Tom Gallon. Paul, 6s.
The City of the Golden Gate. E. Everett-Green. Paul, 6s.
A Poached Peerage. Sir William Magnay. Ward Lock, 6s.
The Pilgrim's March. H. H. Bashford. Melrose, 6s.
Transplanted Daughters. Mrs. Burton Harrison. Unwin, 6s.
Nightshade. Hoy Horniman. Sisleys, 6s.
The June Princess. Constance Smedley. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

REFERENCE

Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench, 1909. Cloth gilt, 31s. 6d. net; or in two vols., 16s. 6d. net each. Special thin paper Edition de Luxe, 50s. net.

JUVENILE

Tommy and a Tower. Fergus Graham. Nutt, 2s.

MISCELLANEOUS

Injuries and Diseases of the Knee-Joint, considered from the Clinical Aspect. Sir William Bennett. Nisbet, 5s.

British Mountaineering. C. E. Benson. Routledge, 5s.
Passing English of the Victorian Era. A Dictionary of Heterodox English, Slang, and Phrase, by J. Redding Ware. Routledge, 7s. 6d.

The Trials of a Country Parson. Augustus Jessopp. Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.

Golden Thoughts from the Hebrew Prophets. Edited with a Preface. F. G. Montefiore. Lane, 2s.

The World We Live In. E. A. Brackett. Rider, 2s. net.

The Darwin-Wallace Celebration, held on Thursday, 1st July, 1908, by the Linnean Society of London. Published by the Linnean Society.

Invasion and Conscription. Some Letters from a mere Civilian to a famous General. James Anson Farrer. Unwin, 1s. net.

Selected Essays of Thomas Carlyle. Introduction by A. Seth Pringle Patteson. Melrose, 2s. 6d. net.

Old Beliefs and Modern Believers. Percy A. Ellis. Melrose, 3s. 6d. net.

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. W. Warde Fowler. Macmillan, 10s. net.

The English Catalogue of Books for 1908. Published for The Publishers' Circular by Sampson, Low, Marston & Co.

History of Contemporary Civilisation. Charles Seignobos. Unwin, 5s. net.

The Newspaper Press Directory and Advertisers' Guide. Sixty-fourth annual issue, 1909. C. Mitchell & Co., 2s.

Jimbo. Algernon Blackwood. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.

POETRY

Thoughts in Solitude. Graham Burr. Stock.

Selected Poems of R. W. Dixon. A selection with portrait and a memoir by Robert Bridges. Smith, Elder, 4s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

Paedagogus. Sermons on the Education Question. Thomas Arnold Sedgwick. Skeffington, 2s. net.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

Cloth extra. Large Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

THE NEW WORD

By ALLEN UPWARD,

Corresponding Member of the Parnassus Philological Society, Athens.

In view of the great circulation recently obtained by rationalist and materialist writings, the publisher believes that many persons may be glad to have their attention drawn to a book, not the work of an ordinary Christian Apologist, which meets the rationalist on his own ground and answers him out of his own mouth.

"As I turn over the leaves and re-read the passages I have marked, I utterly despair of conveying within my appointed limits any inkling of the author's fertility of thought and illustration."

—MR. WILLIAM ARCHER in MORNING LEADER.

"A spacious mansion of delight. . . 'The New Word' is a book of rare enchantment, with something of the freshness of the world's youth about it."

—MR. HARRY JONES in DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The distinguished Philhellene, Mr. Allen Upward, now acknowledges the book in a second edition. . . The sort of writing that means stimulus is well grounded."—CHURCH TIMES.

"Words fail to convey the wealth of ideas, novel view points, wit, and amiable sarcasm which adorn the pages of 'The New Word.' . . It is a most refreshing criticism of our mechanical modes of thought."

—ABERDEEN JOURNAL.

"It touches the whole gamut of knowledge. . . The style is luminous, the matter is freshly and originally put, with the skill of a master."

—WESTERN MORNING NEWS.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 44 Fleet Street, E.C.

DARTMOOR.—BOARDING-IN, PRIVATE HOUSE: Men only; from November to March; very suitable for reading parties; lovely country, warm, and sheltered position. — Apply "CANTAB," Middlecote, Ilfracombe, S. Devon.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS, &c.

32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.

AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
DIRECTORIES.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Bartholomew's Survey Gazetteer British Isles, 17s. 6d. net, for 5s. 6d. Rhoad's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale

THE ART OF GARDEN DESIGN IN ITALY, by Inigo Triggs; 73 Photographic Plates in Collotype, 27 Plans and numerous Sketches in the Text; 4to, buckram; published Longmans, 1906, at £3 13s. 6d. net; for 21s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT

Offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants.

For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 28 Paternoster Row, E.C.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).

37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

QUEEN SQUARE CLUB.

A social club for men and women interested in politics, literature, or art. Lectures, entertainments, chess and bridge. An exquisite Queen Anne club-house, close to the British Museum and Russell Square Station. Inexpensive lunch and dinner. Subscription two guineas.—Apply Secretary, 9 Queen Square, Bloomsbury.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE FEBRUARY BOOK MONTHLY

WHICH IS NOW ON SALE, 6d. NET,
CONTAINS A SYMPOSIUM BY THE
LEADING PUBLISHERS ON WHY THE
WINTER PUBLISHING SEASON WAS
BAD. THIS IS A MATTER WHICH
INTERESTS WRITERS AND READERS
ALSO, AND THEY SHOULD MAKE A
POINT OF READING THE SYMPOSIUM.

Publishers of the "Book Monthly," SIMPKIN, MARSHALL
& CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

LORD ROSEBERY MR. BENJAMIN KIDD AND PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Wardens, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 12s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

A Special Offer to Smokers

OUR JAMAICA CIGARS are equal in aroma and taste to those from Havana, whilst the cost is half that of the latter.

A sample box, containing 25 of the following brands of Cigars, will be sent post free to anyone filling in the coupon below and enclosing P.O., cheque or stamps for 10/6 to us:—

Flor	80/- per 100	Bouquet Fines ...	35/- per 100
Celestiales ...	65/- per 100	Caribas	33/- per 100
Favoritas ...	65/- per 100	Conchas Especiales	30/- per 100
Ideales	45/- per 100	Exquisitos ...	27/6 per 100
Perfectos ...	45/- per 100	Excelentos ...	27/6 per 100
Governor ...	42/- per 100	J. T. C.	25/- per 100
Reina Victoria	38/- per 100	Operas	22/6 per 100
Londres Imperiales	37/6 per 100	Young Ladies ...	20/- per 100

IMPORTED EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES:

The "Seymour" ...	6/6 per 100
Lord Rothschild, Gold Tipped	9/6 per 100

TURKISH CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 1 ...	6/6 per 100
-------------------	-------------

VIRGINIA CIGARETTES:

Jamrach No. 2 ...	5/6 per 100
-------------------	-------------

RUSSIAN, BRAZILIAN, AND LEAF-COVERED CIGARETTES...

... ..	from 8/- per 100
--------	------------------

TOBACCO MIXTURE:

Medium... ..	10/- per lb.	Mild	12/- per lb.
--------------	--------------	-------------	--------------

JAMRACH & CO.

CIGAR AND CIGARETTE SPECIALISTS

199 PICCADILLY, LONDON

Suppliers to the Nobility.

Established 1871.

Please forward me, post paid,.....

for which I enclose

Name.....

Academy. Address.....

A GREAT novel in GREAT demand is PRIESTS OF PROGRESS

By G. COLMORE. (Second Edition.)

It throws a searching ray of light on a great public question.

The SPECTATOR says: "The book is powerfully written, and its subject demands attention."

DID SHE DO RIGHT?

By A. J. MACDONNELL.

A Story of Modern Rome and a Mixed Marriage.

FIRST TWO OPINIONS.

"An interesting romance. The authoress's pictures of present-day life in Rome are excellent."—BIRMINGHAM POST.

"The characterisation is on broad lines and is quite effective, while the plot runs merrily through 400 pages."—MANCHESTER COURIER.

THE BROKEN SNARE

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN.

A powerful, psychological study of the marriage relation by a new writer, portraying the struggle and ultimate surrender of a man and woman of high ideals who do not believe in the marriage ceremony. "Beautifully and brilliantly written."

TOM GALLON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN

READY NEXT WEEK at all Libraries and Booksellers.

OTHER NEW 6/- NOVELS.

THE TRICKSTER - G. B. Burgin.

THE LEVELLER - Alexander McArthur.

THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE

E. Everett Green.

BANZAI! - "Parabellum."

AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE. Richard Duffy.

ANOTHER LARGE EDITION NOW READY.

THE DEVIL IN LONDON, by Geo. R. Sims. 1s. 6d.

London: STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community.

Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net.

A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 82 2s. net.

[Ready shortly.

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

[Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST

Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century

By G. HERMINE MARIUS.

Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS, with a Photogravure and 130 Reproductions in Half Tone.

Royal 8vo, panelled cloth gilt, 15s. net.

The Author of this work—herself an artist—is well known in Holland as a critic of great individuality. Her studies of Ruskin, the three brothers Maris, and her book on Rembrandt have been much appreciated for their sound judgment, a quality not always allied to such enthusiasm as she displays in dealing with her subject.

OLD LONDON

A Series of Fifty Reproductions of Old Engravings Illustrative of the London of our Ancestors.

Compiled by WALTER L. McNAY.

Large 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"Architects and readers of antiquarian tastes will take note of Mr. McNay's 'Old London' The Plates are extremely interesting and carefully reproduced."—Westminster Gazette.

"'Old London' is a book which will appeal to all lovers of old prints."—Daily Mail.

THE ESSAYS OF MEREJKOWSKI

Translated from the Russian by G. A. MOUNSEY.

Fcap. 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net each.

THE LIFE-WORK OF HENDRIK IBSEN.
THE LIFE-WORK OF PLINY THE YOUNGER.
THE LIFE-WORK OF MONTAIGNE.
THE LIFE-WORK OF CALDERON.
THE LIFE-WORK OF FLAUBERT.
MARCUS AURELIUS. Just Published.

Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A MANUAL OF COSTUME, AS ILLUSTRATED BY MONUMENTAL BRASSES. By HERBERT DRUITT.

Indispensable handbook for all interested in Brasses and Costume and Mediaeval Archaeology.

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

By Professor H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH. With diagrams. Square 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each. Sold separately.

These books are intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. For this purpose they will be found a valuable aid to a practical working knowledge of the German language. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the reading examples and diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments will help to fix the names in the memory.

MY LITTLE FRENCH FRIENDS.

By LINA OSWALD. Containing many Illustrations by JEAN BAKEWELL and others, also from Photographs. Demy 8vo, cloth. 2s.

A First book in French written in everyday speech and containing songs with simple music, as well as stories and verse. This is issued uniform with "Little German Folk."

A complete Catalogue will be sent on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD.

The De La More Press, 32 George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

Macmillan's New Books

LORD AVEBURY'S NEW BOOK.

Peace and Happiness.

By LORD AVEBURY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Lincoln College, Oxford, Author of "The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic," &c. With Map and Plans. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Ancient Greek Historians

(Harvard Lectures). By J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Mars as the Abode of Life.

By PERCIVAL LOWELL, A.B., LL.D., Author of "Mars and its Canals," &c. Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Jimbo. A Fantasy. By ALGERNON

BLACKWOOD. With Decorated Half-Titles to Chapters. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This is a striking study of the mind of an imaginative child during consciousness, and also through a period of physical unconsciousness. It is remarkable for its beautiful descriptive passages, its weird suggestions, and its fine implied teaching of sympathy and courage and truth.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

TONO-BUNGAY.

The Standard.—"It is the best book that Mr. Wells has written, and it carries the English novel a stage further in its history."

By H. G. WELLS.

One Immortality. By H. FIELDING HALL,

Author of "The Soul of a People," &c.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

ORDER FROM YOUR LIBRARY

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

[Ready March 4]

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only pathos from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

[Ready March 4]

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

THE CENTURY PRESS, 6-9 Surrey St., Strand, London.

NEW BOOKS at the BODLEY HEAD

ON THE TRACK OF LIFE.

The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of LEO. G. SERA by J. M. KENNEDY, with an introduction by DR. OSCAR LEVY. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Sera is a physician who has deeply studied literature and historical science, and the object of his book is, in the opening words of the preface, "to establish our conception of social life on its original basis." He holds that the diffusion of democratic principles is vulgarising science and art, and that present social conditions, especially work and Christian teaching, are leading to the intellectual and moral degeneration of the race.

A SISTER OF PRINCE RUPERT: Elizabeth Princess Palatine, Abbess of Herford.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY, Author of "English Children in the Olden Time," &c. With numerous Illustrations Reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints &c. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"No historical biography published during the last few years surpasses this one in the minuteness of its research and the width of the field it has covered."

BRITISH MALAYA.

An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. By SIR F. A. SWETTENHAM. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ASPECTS OF MODERN OPERA.

By LAWRENCE GILMAN, Author of "Phases of Modern Music," "Strauss," "Salome," "The Music of To-morrow, and Other Studies," "Edward MacDowell," &c. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH.

Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Nephew of THOMAS CARLYLE, Editor of "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," "New Letters of Thomas Carlyle," &c. With Two Portraits in Colour and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 2 vols. 25s. net.

These are the Letters that passed between Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh from the time of their first meeting in May, 1821, until their marriage in October, 1826. There are in all 176 Letters, arranged chronologically in the form of "letter and answer." The account of the courtship contained in these Letters is more fascinating than a romance. They are brilliant and pathetic by turn, wise and witty; light and grave; and they tell for the first time the story of the early association of this remarkable pair, and the influence of one character upon the other is clearly indicated. [Ready shortly.]

UNDER PETRAIA, With Some Saunterings.

By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Globe.—"Purely conversational in style as this book is, it possesses that indefinable literary charm which holds fast the reader who has once opened its pages, so that he cannot put it down till he has reached the end. Even then it will be taken up again and again, to be dipped into here and there as the fancy seizes us."

Daily Telegraph.—"The kindness and geniality of the whole thing are irresistible. . . . It recalls the spirit of Borrow, to whom sun, moon, and stars were all good things."

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL.

Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century. By HORACE BLEACKLEY, Author of "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess." With numerous Portraits Reproduced from Contemporary Sources. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE: During a Tour on the Continent upon its Reopening after the Fall of Napoleon, 1814.

Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A FOOL OF QUALITY.

Or the History of Henry Earl of Moreland.

By HENRY BROOKE (1703-1783). With an Introduction by FRANCIS COUTTS. 2 vols. (New Pocket Library.) Leather, 4s. net. Cloth, 2s. net.

MARIA EDGEWORTH and Her Circle in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon.

By CONSTANCE HILL. Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," "The House in St. Martin's Street," etc. With numerous Illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

Miss Hill's new book deals with episodes in the life of Maria Edgeworth during the first twenty years of last century, for the development of which much unpublished material has been acquired. [Ready shortly.]

MADRID.

An Historic and Descriptive Account of the Spanish Capital, with 450 Illustrations. By A. F. CALVERT (The Spanish Series). 3s. 6d. net. [Ready shortly.]

JOHN LANE'S NOVELS FOR 1909

"Youth, with its sunlit, passionate eyes,
And roseate velvet skin,
A plea to cancel a thousand lies
Or a thousand nights of sin."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH

A NEW AND STRIKING NOVEL BY ALICE HERBERT

YOUTH—with its hopes and despairs, its loves and griefs, its triumphs and di-appointments, its illusions and revelations—is the theme of Mrs. Herbert's daring novel. Francie finds his illusions destroyed, his idols with feet of clay, and his wife a mere doll, to whom he proposed in the glamour of the moment. Still, through everything he preserves his faith in the ultimate fitness of things, and the novel's close finds him "blistered and buffeted, unbuffed still."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH

A NEW AND STRIKING NOVEL BY ALICE HERBERT

ON SALE EVERYWHERE. SIX SHILLINGS.

LITTLE DINNERS WITH THE SPHINX.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. 6s.

Observer.—"It is the quaintest, oddest conceit, told with an enchanting simplicity."

BALTHASAR.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. A Translation by Mrs. JOHN LANE. 6s.

Being Vol. VI. of the Works of Anatole France in English.

SOMEONE PAYS.

By NOEL BARWELL. 6s.

LANE'S SHILLING LIBRARY.

LIFE IN A GARRISON TOWN: The Suppressed German Novel. By Ex-Lieutenant F. O. BILSE.

DEAR FATHERLAND. By F. O. BILSE.

A WHIRL ASUNDER.

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

"A very enjoyable book; unconventional in its treatment and revolutionary in its plot. . . . The present popular edition should have a wide circulation."—Irish Independent.

With Illustrated Paper Covers, 1s. net each.

JOHN LANE - THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1921

FEBRUARY 27, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

Established over
One Hundred Years.

HODGSON & CO.

Telephone No. 7291
Central.

Auctioneers of Rare and Valuable Books,
Manuscripts, Autographs, Book Plates, and Engravings.

VALUATIONS FOR PROBATE, &c.

CATALOGUES OF SALES ON APPLICATION

Messrs. Hodgson wish to point out that they are the only firm of Auctioneers exclusively engaged in the Sale of Literary Property, and are therefore in a position to deal with such property promptly and effectively.

The next Sale, comprising an extensive Collection of Valuable and Standard Works in all Classes of Literature, will be held on Tuesday, March 2nd, and two following days.

Auction Rooms: 115 Chancery Lane, LONDON, W.C.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. MYNART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDAR LONDONENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 158 x 114. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah. He knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.
"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes remote and often uncredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbedness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWPORT. Pott 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. Fourth Edition now ready.
"The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."
First Thousand Copies sold out in 4 Footnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.
"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for idleness, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.
"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TASSER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile.
"Had Browning written pirate instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.
"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a hobby. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEBBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTELTON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.
"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'the adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lytton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"Charming verses . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWPORT. Pott 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. Fourth Edition.
"These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and distinctness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.
"His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearean quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protest."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.
"The child reveals in facts rather than in fancies . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 3s. net.
"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, 16mp. 12th century). By C. F. GIMMOND. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPAIN. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.
"A good specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.
"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.
"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HARRIS. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.
"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musical.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman.

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.
Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.
"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TYNAN.
"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

GADMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

YOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page	Page
Life and Letters . . . 819	The Child and the Cate-
"Votes for Women" . . 821	chist 828
The Sphere and the	General Lee 829
Bubble 821	Novella Teba 830
Thomas Hardy 823	Shorter Reviews . . . 832
The Conversationalist . 826	Correspondence . . . 833
Knowledge and Faith . 827	Books Received . . . 835
Among the Hills . . . 828

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazines rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

LADY CONSTANCE LYTTON, one of the Suffragettes who was brought up at Bow Street on Thursday in connection with the latest idiotic and abortive "raid" on the House of Commons, is the author of a pamphlet misleadingly entitled "No Votes for Women." We will quote one instance of her reasoning powers taken at random. She writes:

Sir Edward Clarke, at an anti-Suffrage League meeting the other day, expressed himself as "delighted to see the successful efforts that were being made to disprove the assertions of the 'Suffragettes' that they represent either the majority of women or the best informed and most public spirited among them." He believed "that neither assertion is well founded." Shortly after this speech was made, the Association of Registered Medical Women in Great Britain and Ireland asked Mr. Asquith to receive a deputation of their representatives "in favour of the extension of the suffrage to women." In making this appeal they wrote: "When receiving a deputation of Members of Parliament in last May on the same subject, you invited an expression of opinion from the women of the country. In response to this invitation we have written to all the registered medical women residing in the United Kingdom, asking whether or not they are in favour of woman suffrage. The results of this enquiry are as follows: In favour, 538; against, 15."

Lady Constance Lytton evidently thinks that this is a crushing reply to Sir Edward Clarke's remarks. So that we may take it that her idea of the highest duty of women is that they should become doctors. We have nothing to say against women doctors: we believe they are often skilful and clever, and they are no doubt useful members of the community. But that they have any sort of claim to represent the best-informed and the most public-spirited women we entirely deny. They number, according to Lady Constance's figures, 553. They are, therefore, of course, a microscopic minority. They have taken up the profession of medicine primarily in order to earn money, and we have heard of women doctors making five or six thousand a year. This certainly shows that they are "well informed" in their profession and that they are capable in a business way, but there is not necessarily anything public-spirited in earning a large income, and a woman may be a very good doctor without being in any way fitted to exercise political power. Moreover, the very fact that a woman takes up the profession of medicine proves that she is an abnormal woman (we use the word in no opprobrious sense), an exceptional woman, and an utterly unrepresentative woman. We believe we are right in saying that women doctors are unmarried and childless in the proportion of about five to one. That is to say, they are women who have deliberately declined the highest prerogatives and functions of womanhood in order to take up a lucrative profession. This is to their credit or not, according to their particular circumstances, and according to the way one looks at the question. We shall not make sweeping assertions, whatever we may privately think. Each case would have to be examined and considered on its own merits. But when Lady Constance Lytton jumps to the conclusion that a clever woman doctor is necessarily better informed and more public-spirited than, say, a washerwoman who marries and has half-a-dozen children she is indulging a woeful and deep-seated error.

When Lady Constance was brought before the magistrates on Thursday morning she is reported to have said that she was more proud of her action than of anything else she had done in her life. Lady Constance is an unmarried lady and is in her fortieth year, and for our part we shall refuse to believe that during the whole course of her no doubt amiable life she has not succeeded in doing something more deserving of self-congratulation than brawling in public and obstructing the police. In any case, it's never too late to mend, and during her month's incarceration in Holloway her ladyship will have ample time and opportunity to think matters over. We presume, of course, that she will go to prison rather than find the necessary sureties to be of good behaviour; so illogical and so excitable a lady would not, we feel sure, be able to bring herself to refuse the glorious crown of martyrdom which is offered to her. Meanwhile, may we suggest to Lady Constance Lytton that even a little activity in the too much neglected sphere of imparting elementary instruction in reading and sewing to the orphan boy and the orphan girl respectively would be an improvement on that form of activity which results in dragging an honoured and honourable name through the police court?

The Westminster Gazette is fond of representing Mr. Augustine Birrell in the figure of a bull, who, when sufficiently goaded, comes out and scatters his tormentors in a terrifying and devastating manner. The other day he was once more so represented by Sir Francis Gould in connection with his "defence" to the indictment brought against him for his hopeless and criminal mismanagement of Irish affairs. The Westminster's notion is rather an unfortunate one for itself and Mr. Birrell, for it irresistibly provokes comparisons between the right honourable gentleman and an animal which bears a superficial resemblance to a bull—namely, the cow. Mr. Birrell's whole attitude towards his accusers is very much that of a bewildered, tormented and yet doggedly obstinate cow. In reply to enquiries as to his failure to protect the lives and properties of law-abiding citizens in Ireland and his blank refusal to do anything to put down cattle-driving, boycotting and brutal intimidation, he raises doleful and long-drawn "moos" about "Liberal principles." He is unable to deny the facts that are arrayed against him because they are borne out by his own statistics, and the only argument he can think of is that, bad as things are to-day, they were worse in 1886. Even this wonderful "argument" will not hold good for long, for it is abundantly clear that as long as Mr. Birrell remains Chief Secretary for Ireland things will go from bad to worse in that wretched country. It appears now that the best chance for those unfortunate people who have incurred the displeasure of the Land League is to pray that, say, half-a-dozen more policemen may be murdered and that every sort of crime and outrage may rapidly increase, so that Mr. Birrell may at last be driven to help them even at the risk of going back on his "Liberal principles."

The recently reported case of the Socialist Member of Parliament, Mr. Pete Curran, affords a beautiful example of the way in which temperance reformers subordinate their own feelings to their sense of duty to the community at large. Here we have Mr. Curran, who, the other day, got so drunk that he was found by a policeman lying in the street underneath the belly of a docile and discriminating cab-horse, which forbore to trample on him. Anyone looking at this state of affairs in a casual manner might be tempted to jump to the conclusion that Mr. Curran was one of those wicked and unscrupulous people who actually desire to stand between "the people" and their "passionate desire for temperance reform." Not a bit of it. Mr. Curran is an ardent "temperance reformer"; he voted for Mr. Asquith's Licensing Bill at every stage, and he has never allowed his own fondness for the flowing bowl to interfere with his determination to reduce the opportunities of other people to indulge in alcoholic stimulants. We do not desire to be too hard on Mr. Curran or to exult in his misfortunes, but perhaps we shall not be exceeding the limits of fair criticism if we venture to remind him, and a good many other members of the Liberal Party, that Temperance Reform should begin at home.

We read in one of the papers that Mr. Gibson Bowles, who is contesting the election at Glasgow as a Radical, on being asked if he would allow the consideration of the Irish Vote in the constituency to influence his avowed expression of policy, replied: "I never budge." This beautiful and stirring reply, coming from the lips of a gentleman who has just "budded" to the extent of deserting the Conservative Party, to which he has belonged all his life, and going over to the other Party at a time when it has reached such a stage of advanced Radicalism that is almost indistinguishable from pure Socialism, is distinctly refreshing. We are aware, of course, that Mr. Bowles has left his Party on the Free Trade versus Tariff Reform question. He is perfectly right to stick to his principles, and nobody can blame him for refusing to acquiesce in the Tariff Reform policy if he does not agree with it; but between this very proper attitude and barefaced going over to the other side there is a great gulf fixed. Mr. Bowles's action is all the more curious in view of the fact that, although he has always been a severe and often just critic of his own Party, his criticisms have ever been directed to what he considered its abandonment of true Conservative principles. In short, he has claimed to be more Conservative than the Conservatives. And now we have him talking about his "revered and able leader," Mr. Asquith! Can anyone in his senses conceive Lord Robert or Lord Hugh Cecil or Lord James of Hereford or Lord Cromer going over to the Radical Party because they did not approve of Tariff Reform? The idea is unthinkable. And yet nobody seems surprised at Mr. Bowles's action, which perhaps is not a great compliment to Mr. Bowles.

THE wit of Oxford is exceeded only by that of Cambridge. Hence, of course, Mr. Owen Seaman. And hence, of course, the Cambridge Review. We had occasion last week to draw attention to the unmannerly conduct of an editor of the Granta (it seems that there have been many editors of the Granta), and we are now informed by the Cambridge Review that "the ex-editor of the Granta, whom THE ACADEMY has attacked, will reply"—in the Cambridge Review! Why should he not reply in the Animals' Friend? The ex-editor of the Granta is no doubt a very clever youth, and we hope to hear him sing as announced, but he will have all his work cut out to justify, to the satisfaction of honourable people, such an unmannerly and unscrupulous line of conduct as that to which we drew attention. The editor of the Cambridge Review explains delicately that he does not "intend to go into the merits of the point at issue." Seeing that it is a point, which, so far as Cambridge is concerned, absolutely bristles with demerits, this is smart of him. The fact is that the young gentlemen at Oxford and the young gentlemen at Cambridge are bursting to be smart. In their wild reaches after the finished punctilio of hapenny journalism they are naturally prone to forget the first principles of decency. They imagine, for example, that it is decent to beg and pray of the editor of a London literary paper to "honour" them with a gratuitous article and then to turn and abuse him like a pickpocket out of gratitude for his kindness. They imagine also that it is a good thing to applaud, praise and extol attacks which they have not read, and that it is a better thing to revive an impertinence for which they have already apologised, and then, on pressure from the printer and stationer on whom they depend for their editorial positions, to proceed solemnly to a second apology. However, boys will be boys; and we suppose that in universities where measles, Socialism, paradox and Seamanship would appear to be rife, naughty habits of mind are bound to exhibit themselves. On the whole, we can well understand why it is that the Oxford or Cambridge bred man is losing caste and finds himself when he goes down as stranded as the time-expired soldierman, though for very different reasons. Not so many years ago the average 'Varsity man was a person with whom one might reckon; to-day he is of no more account than the bright youth from the board schools. Smartness is a poor substitute for understanding, even in an age of comic poetry.

We note that Jim Crow, otherwise Herbert Vivian, fails to apologise to Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, K.G., for the scurrilous and under-bred remarks to which Vivian committed himself in a late issue of John Bull. Perhaps Mr. Bottomley has been too busy this week to devote that editorial attention to the matter which it would seem to demand. We can only say that if Vivian is not made to hold up his hand and apologise in humble and befitting terms that brilliant literary organ, John Bull, will have to take down its boast as to being devoid of rancour and rant. It seems to us that a very good motto for the front of the paper would be:

Evil passions, wicked rages,
But should leave to beasts in cages.

It will be interesting to have the opinion of the Guardian on Vivian's outrageous display of venom, for by what can be considered only as a journalistic irony the Guardian and John Bull are both printed and, in part, owned by the same firm—namely, Messrs. Odhams.

A fearful and pathetic wail has just been put up in Vanity Fair under the heading of "Malice Aforethought." The article would appear to have been dictated by Vanity Fair's genial editor, so full of whine and expostulation is it. From this gentleman's point of view the world abounds in creatures who "spit venom in the dark." With great gushes of tears he remarks: "There would seem to be many such. Their slime fouls many beautiful things. The rank odour of their presence poisons the air in many otherwise fair places. Their cold, dank, scaly folds crush out the life of many a delicate, fragrant flower." But, thank Heaven, there is balm in Gilead, for it seems that these venom spitters "invariably miss the target, whilst they are so afraid of the weapons they try to wield, and handle them so awkwardly, that any recoil is bound to knock them down." And with a view no doubt still further to mix his metaphors Mr. Harris or his man adds "So do they pray that thistles may grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley, because of their bile which rejects the wholesome corn." This is pretty good from a paper which is so interested in a book called "The Bomb." The amount of wholesome wheat in "The Bomb" could be collected in a thimble. It is pretty good, too, from a paper which, in its anxiety not to hurt anybody's feeling, goes out of its way on the next page to call his Majesty the German Emperor "Windy Bill," and to explain that now that the Prince of Wales has dined at the Savage Club "the Savages intend to reform and live cleanly." And it seems but yesterday that our contemporary observed that Mr. Watts-Dunton looked like a sick walrus, and described another literary gentleman as a wooden fool, or words to that effect. The persons who have spit venom at this tender pelican should be severely reprimanded at once. It appears to us that the whole article is a veiled attack on John Bull. We should have thought that Mr. Harris's ideas of friendship would have prevented these distressing manifestations of "schadenfreude," not to say "groll" and "hak."

The drought in poetry continues. Out of a sort of radical stubbornness Mr. Massingham, it is true, sticks to his poet of the passionate feet and the surge-swept heart. The gentleman's latest effusion is not without merit. On the other hand, it abounds in flaws which a competent judge of poetry would not be disposed to pass, and some of the rhyming, as, for example, "laboured" with "dead" and "powers" and "bowers" with "ours," is a little forced. For reasons past finding out the average nonconformist appears to have made up his mind that "ours" and "hours" are dissyllabic words. Possibly his illusion comes of having heard his father call persistently for "Alf Howers with the Best Authors." In any case it is a nonconformist illusion and a sure mark of the nonconformist poet. On the front page of the Spectator last week we read "Poetry: Blake's Spectacles," which looked promising, but Blake's spectacles—William Blake's spectacles, mind you—could move the Spectator poet to only five not altogether brilliant lines, beginning "These were his glasses." We can imagine Blake regarding curiously through these same glasses Mr. St. Loe Strachey and his poet. One wonders what he would think of them:

"Give me my bow of burnished gold,
Give me my arrows of desire," is slightly different from "these were his glasses." The Saturday Review has delighted us with the following illiterate stanzas:

When she-goats begged from Jove a beard,
The he-goats sad began to rage,
Because their dignity they feared
Would rivalled be by females sage.

* * *
And this the moral of my tale,
For ever bear with those who try
To ape your manly mien, but fail
In worth to reach your standard high.

The Saturday Review's "standard high" will "observed be" by everybody. For the rest, the Athenæum and the Outlook are discreetly dumb.

"VOTES FOR WOMEN"

MARK how their shining effigies are set
For ever on the firmament of Time,
Like lovely words caught in a lovely rhyme,
Or silver stars lapt in a faery net.
Ivory and marble keep them for us yet,
And all our blossomy memories of them chime
With all the daedal graces of the prime—
Helen, and Ruth, Elaine, and Juliet.

And You, in this disconsolate London square,
Flaunting an ill-considered purple hat
And mud-stained, rumpled, bargain-counter coat,
You of the broken tooth and buttered hair,
And idiot eye and cheeks that bulge with fat,
Sprawl on the flagstone chalking for a vote!

T. W. H. C.

THE SPHERE AND THE BUBBLE

THE Sphere is an illustrated newspaper, and it calls itself "an illustrated newspaper for the home." We shall not say that it is an uninteresting newspaper or that its steady advertising of Beecham's Pills, Allcock's Plasters, Scrubb's Ammonia, and Jewsbury and Brown's Tooth Paste is not profitable. In other words, besides being for the home, the Sphere is a very commercial paper indeed. There is no harm in commercialism properly considered. There is no sin or shame in plastering your columns with the advertisements of the family-medicine vendor, and there is no sin or shame in being associated with such a paper in a journalistic or other capacity, provided that the journalist or other person so associated contrives to remember always what manner of being he really is. The editor of the Sphere, as all men between Fleet Street and the Café Royal are aware, is one, Clement Shorter, a bosom friend of that great and good man, Dr. Robertson Nicoll, and a respected resident of St. John's Wood. Now, Mr. Shorter in his place is what might be termed a dear creature, and in his place we have not the smallest objection to or contempt for him. We have seen him described in print as "a great illustrated journalist," whatever that may mean, and there can be no doubt in the world that he turns out the Sphere in a thoroughly competent and satisfactory style—in a style, that is to say, which pleases both the sixpenny public and the sixpenny advertiser, thus killing as it were two birds with one stone. We should even go the length of saying that in his profession of "illustrated journalist" Mr. Shorter takes quite as high rank as the editors of the Illustrated London News, the Graphic, and the Daily Mirror, which, from Mr. Shorter's point of view, will be praise indeed. We like the Sphere to look at, we are acquainted with people who buy it "for the children," and we understand that it is much valued by invalids on account of the valuable hints they are able to get from its advertisements. We believe, further, that to have brought into being such a "property" as the Sphere now is may be safely reckoned something of a journalistic achievement, and for that achievement Mr. Shorter undoubtedly deserves—and gets—a proper share of credit. He is "Mr. Clement Shorter of the Sphere," and "as such" he is within his rights to hold up his head with any successful journalist in London. So far so good. A wise man would be content with the honour and glory which are the natural perquisites of the journalist who has compassed what Mr. Shorter has compassed, and a wise man, as we know, is at any time worth a Jew's eye. But Mr. Shorter apparently cannot be content. He has triumphed signally in illustrated journalism; he enjoys the support and confidence of the domestic and travelling public and the distinguished patronage of the pill and salve makers; yet the soul of him sighs for other worlds to conquer. To cut a long story short, Mr. Shorter simply declines to be a mere journalist. And for a great many more years than we care to think about he has been striving with such might and main as in him lies to be taken and accepted and received and pasted up, not for a journalist, but for a man of letters. We will say nothing of his abiding works in literature, for these need no bush and are duly enumerated in the British Museum catalogue. Neither do we propose at the moment to discuss Mr. Shorter as "The Biographer of the Brontës" or as the contributor of a marvellous introduction to a recently-published selection from the poetical works of the late Lionel Johnson. It is with the Mr. Clement Shorter, who churns out for us "his delightful Literary Letter" in the Sphere, that we propose at the present juncture to deal. Of the general intention and merits of the "Literary Letter" in question much might be written which would be calculated to arouse mingled feelings in the Shorterian bosom. We will say of it, broadly, that it is intended to be gossipy and "topical," and that it is also intended to invest the Sphere with a sort of literary atmosphere, and to convince the world at large that Mr. Shorter is a man of letters who by force of circumstances has been compelled to condescend to journalism, rather than a journalist who has taken to literature as a "obby," and in lieu of golf or billiards or canary-breeding or postage-stamp collecting, as is the manner of eminent journalists. Inasmuch as the world, and particularly the literary world, is a patient and long-suffering and complacent affair, and inasmuch as Mr. Shorter is, as a rule, possessed of a mouthful of the honey of Hybla or Hymettus when he speaks to us of authors or publishers he has been allowed for years to spread his sweet leaves to the air and dedicate his beauty to the sun unadmonished, unproved, uncriticised and unchecked. And naturally he has proceeded in consequence, and probably without knowing it, from impertinence to impertinence. His offences have been numerous, and a catalogue of them would take up a great deal of space. Consequently, we shall glance only at what we consider to be one of his crowning efforts. From a recent "Literary Letter," signed "C. K. S.," we take the following:

I believe it is a theory of many eminent men of letters that our age cannot produce good poetry—that this is a scientific period, and that commercialism and science have killed the poet. I am waiting for the critic to arise who will smash this theory to atoms, who will show that there never was a more poetic age than ours, who will make it clear that Tennyson's theology transmitted in verse, and Mr. Browning's philosophy given to us more or less in the same medium, were by no means the high poetry that the last generation thought them. Someone will also have to prick the bubble of Palgrave's "Golden Treasury," and challenge the ready acceptance of an earlier generation and of the middle-aged people of to-day of the mechanical verse that appears in that anthology. It is quite remote from great poetry.

That Mr. Shorter should be "looking for a critic" what time himself and Dr. Nicoll and Mr. Thomas Secombe and Mr. Mackenzie Bell and Mr. Alan Northman still breathe the breath of life is a little astonishing; on the other hand, it is not astonishing at all that Mr. Shorter should indulge the New Age and street-corner view of "In Memoriam" and apparently all Browning; though here again we have plain proof that he knows next to nothing about poetry, barring what he has been taught by the worst masters. No, the really startling, breath-taking, brilliant, arresting and impudent part of the paragraph is the reference to Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." We must take leave in the interests, not only of poetry, but of criticism and even of journalism, forthwith to nail Mr. Shorter to his own counter in the matter of this so-called bubble. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" contains roughly a matter of three hundred and fifty poetical pieces, bearing beneath them such names as Shakespeare; Marlowe, Donne, Sidney, Wyatt, Barnefield, Spenser, Campion, Drummond, Milton, Marvell, Dryden, Beaumont, Shirley, Vaughan, Crashaw, Herrick, Lovelace, Jonson, Waller, Suckling, Wither, Fletcher, Cowley, Gray, Collins, Burns, Cowper, Carey, Rogers, Thomson, Blake, Prior, Shelly, Scott, Wordsworth, Moore, Keats, Byron, Southey, Hood, Lamb, and Coleridge. We will do Mr. Shorter the credit to suppose that his remark about mechanical verse does not refer to the whole of the poetry in the "Golden Treasury." At the same time, it is evident that he refers to a very great deal of it; otherwise he would not talk about pricking bubbles. Consequently, we will beg of him to be good enough to give us the titles of the pieces in the "Golden Treasury" which appear to him to justify his remarks. We should be disposed to wager that he will make a singular exhibition of himself if he attempts to oblige us. Mr. Shorter may be sure that there is absolutely nothing about Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" which requires to be pricked. It is Mr. Shorter who ought to be pricked and not Palgrave at all. Our advice to him is that he should apply for a course of literary training to that other brilliant judge of poetry, Mr. T. P. O'Connor (vide the advertisement in the British Weekly), and that after devoting himself for some weeks to this course and paying particular attention to the hints of Mr. T. P. O'Connor's "eminent expert," he should read through the "Golden Treasury" with an humble and a contrite heart. There are doubtless a few pieces in the "Golden Treasury" which may not be quite to Mr. Shorter's taste. The "critic" who despises "In Memoriam" and suggests by implication that it is "quite remote from great poetry" will naturally find, say, Sidney's sonnet on "Sleep" or Collins's ode on the Passions a trifle mechanical. Fortunately, however, there are still people in the world who would prefer either of these trifling pieces to all the wonderful poetry in "Peter Pan," which, if we are to believe Mr. Shorter, has been proved to be "true poetry" by its "success." Mr. Shorter concludes his observations as to Browning, Tennyson and the "Golden Treasury" with the announcement that "we have the triumph of poetry in the success [again the success] of Mr. Graham Robertson's 'Pinky and the Fairies.'" In this pregnant sentence, coupled with the reference to "Peter Pan," we have the key to the entire Shorterian situation. When Mr. Shorter wrote his paragraph he was not really thinking about poetry, or Tennyson, or Browning, or the "Golden Treasury." His thoughts were with Mr. J. M. Barrie, Mr. Graham Robertson, and particularly with Mr. William Heineman, who is the publisher of "Pinky and the Fairies." Mr. Shorter wished to express for the thousandth time his admiration for the success of Mr. Barrie, and he wished to bestow a patronising nod upon the success of "Pinky and the Fairies" and upon the famous publishing house of Heineman. To accomplish this much in plain, unvarnished terms would, of course, have been somewhat unliturgical and flat-footed from Mr. Shorter's point of view, and consequently he proceeded to belaud the Barrie and Graham Robertson successes by dragging down "In Memoriam" and "Mr. Browning's Philosophy" and sneering at the "Golden Treasury." If Tennyson and "Mr. Browning" and Francis Turner Palgrave could re-visit the glimpses of the moon to-morrow Mr. Shorter would be the first to rush round to shove his card into their hands and to congratulate them upon their "success." He would "confess" that whatever carping critics might have to say about "In Memoriam" or "Mr. Browning's Philosophy" or Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" he, for his part, believed that all three of them must stand for "true poetry" because of their "success." He would congratulate their publishers; he would publish photographs of their wives' pet kittens; he would make pilgrimages to their houses; he would speak of them as his friends. And his paragraphs in their praise—at the expense of an earlier generation and "the middle-aged people of to-day"—would be innumerable and full of treacle. On the whole, critics of the Shorter stamp can be more than spared. For, although they pretend to be the friends of Literature, they are subconsciously its bitterest and most dangerous enemies. They look upon letters, not as a concern of the spirit or even of the intellect, but as a species of elegant business with which it is creditable to associate oneself for the purposes of professional or social advancement.

THOMAS HARDY

It is interesting to note the unthinking docility with which people will echo and re-echo a catchword or a cant phrase, concerning any author, which has sufficient substratum of truth to render it current and plausible. The bleat of the "Cotswold lions" has sounded its aggravating chorus now for many years to the effect that Mr. Thomas Hardy is a cynic and a misanthrope and a pessimist; we expect almost any day to hear him referred to as "the well-known pessimist," by innocent frequenters of public libraries—the fact being that a fair proportion of those who moisten and apply the ready-made label would be hard put to it to explain the difference between a pessimist and a taxidermist. For an author to be a pessimist it is not enough that he should deal with the darker side of life: he must show that his own personal feeling is inclined in that direction, and there is a detachment about Mr. Hardy's work which does not warrant such a conclusion; it renders him almost an ideal raconteur—a teller of tales, who leaves the reader to form his own opinions. In Mr. William Archer's "Real Conversations" we find Mr. Hardy expresses himself clearly on the point; "I believe," he says, "that a good deal of the robustious, swaggering optimism of recent literature is at bottom cowardly and insincere. . . . My pessimism, if pessimism it be, does not involve the assumption that the world is going to the dogs, and that Ahirman is winning all along the line. On the contrary, my practical philosophy is distinctly meliorist." It is too often forgotten that he has given us some idylls, such as "Under the Greenwood Tree," wherein scarcely any sorrow enters, and that the happy ending is by no means unknown in his books.

We are free to admit, on the other hand, that in the depiction of the sombre configurations of life, its predicaments, its tangled threads, its spoiled patterns, lies Mr. Hardy's strength; and often if it were not for the humour and the play of fancy which intersperse his gloomier scenes the heartbreak of it all would be well-nigh intolerable. The pressure of events that are merely related can accumulate relentlessly when the manner of their relation is so austere and incisive; who can forget the gradual overwhelming of hapless

"Tess" by the flood of circumstance? Then Mr. Hardy has another power which he shares with few—the faculty of calling into his service things insensate, outside the sphere of humanity, and investing them with a strange and prodigious significance; trees and clouds, rain and sunshine, night and morning, are deflected from their normal course and informed with a mood, a meaning, that urges his characters on or works in subtle connection with them at critical points in their careers. The surprising part of this potent descriptive gift is that it is employed so deliberately and with such patient precision of detail that inspiration seems lacking; more often than not it is by sheer aggregation that the emotions of Nature are sounded, and grafted into the acts of these Wessex men and women. The method is the antithesis of Ruskin's efflorescent language; it has none of the tenderness of Richard Jefferies' earthward pen; yet how it sets the stage for the actors! No one who has once read "The Return of the Native" can fail to remember how wonderfully the whole narrative is haunted by the melancholy expanse of Egdon Heath. On the very first page we feel a presentiment that it will be a dominant factor; in the twilight "the hollow stretch of whitish cloud shutting out the sky was as a tent which had the whole heath for its floor":

Looking upwards, a furze-cutter would have been inclined to continue work; looking down, he would have decided to finish his faggot and go home. The face of the heath by its mere complexion added half an hour to evening; it could in like manner retard the dawn, sadden noon, anticipate the frowning of storms scarcely generated, and intensify the opacity of a moonless midnight to a cause of shaking and dread. . . . The sombre stretch of rounds and hollows seemed to rise and meet the evening gloom in pure sympathy, the heath exhaling darkness as rapidly as the heavens precipitated it. And so the obscurity in the air and the obscurity in the land closed together in a black fraternisation, towards which each advanced halfway. The place became full of a watchful intentness now; for when other things sank brooding to sleep, the heath appeared slowly to awake and listen. Every night its Titanic form seemed to await something; but it had waited thus, unmoved, during so many centuries, through the crises of so many things, that it could only be imagined to await one last crisis—the final overthrow.

The first glimpse of the heroine comes as she stands tensely watching for her lover and listening to the wind:

Throughout the blowing of these plaintive November winds that note bore a great resemblance to the ruins of human song which remain to the throat of fourscore and ten. It was a worn whisper, dry and papery, and it brushed so distinctly across the ear that, by the accustomed, the material minutiae in which it originated could be realised as by touch. It was the united products of infinitesimal vegetable causes, and these were neither stems, leaves, fruit, blades, prickles, lichen, nor moss. They were the mummied heath-bells of the past summer, originally tender and purple, now washed colourless by Michaelmas rains, and dried to dead skins by October suns. . . . One inwardly saw the infinity of these combined multitudes, and perceived that each of the tiny trumpets was seized on, entered, scoured, and emerged from by the wind as thoroughly as if it were as vast as a crater.

The chapter in "Far From the Madding Crowd" entitled "The Gargoyle: Its Doings," contains a marvellous bit of this uncannily accurate description:

It was too human to be called a dragon, too impish to be like a man, too animal to be like a fiend, and not enough like a bird to be called a griffin. This horrible stone entity was fashioned as if covered with a wrinkled hide; it had short, erect ears, eyes starting from their sockets, and its fingers and hands were seizing the corners of its mouth, which they thus seemed to pull open to give free passage to the water it vomited. . . . Presently the gargoyle spat. In due time a small stream began to trickle through the seventy feet of aerial space between its mouth and the ground, which the water-drops smote like duck-shot in their accelerated velocity. When the rain fell in a steady and ceaseless torrent the stream dashed downward in volumes. . . . The base of the liquid parabola has come forward from the wall, has advanced over the plinth mouldings, over a heap of stones, over the marble border, into the midst of Fanny Robin's grave. . . . The rich tawny mould was stirred into motion, and boiled like chocolate. The water accumulated and washed deeper down, and the roar of the pool thus formed spread into the night as the head and chief among other noises of the kind created by the deluging rain. The flowers so carefully planted by Fanny's repentant lover began to move and writhe in their bed. The winter-violets turned slowly upside-down, and became a mere mat of mud. Soon the snowdrop and other bulbs danced in the boiling mass like ingredients in a cauldron. Plants of the tufted species were loosened, rose to the surface, and floated off.

With the contrast between this gruesome picture and Tess Durbeyfield's first view of the Valley of the Great Dairies we must finish our glance at this phase of Mr. Hardy's art:

It was intrinsically different from the Vale of Little Dairies, which, save during her disastrous sojourn at Trantridge, she had exclusively known till now. The world was drawn to a larger pattern here. The enclosures numbered fifty acres instead of ten, the farmsteads were more extended, the groups of cattle formed tribes here about; there only families. . . .

The bird's-eye perspective before her was not so luxuriantly beautiful, perhaps, as that other one which she knew so well; yet it was more cheering. It lacked the intensely blue atmosphere of the rival vale, and its heavy soils and scents; the new air was clear, bracing, ethereal. The river itself, which nourished the grass and cows of these renowned dairies, flowed not like the streams in Blackmoor. Those were slow, silent, often turbid; flowing over beds of mud into which the incautious wader might sink and vanish unawares. The Froom waters were clear as the pure River of Life shown to the Evangelist, rapid as the shadow of a cloud, with pebbly shallows that prattled to the sky all day long.

In the majority of novels scenery matters little; its description is often too obviously introduced as a form of padding out weak situations, and it affects neither the action nor the characters. In those under consideration it is inseparable from either, and cannot be in the smallest degree "skipped"; it sets the keynote of the story, round which the dreams and desires, the passions and pains of human beings harmonise and modulate in varying complementary chords—often fluctuating into discords, the resolution of which is inaudible, lost in the outer silence and shadows.

From this generalisation one or two books must be omitted—"The Trumpet-Major," for instance, where the scenery is more the casual accompaniment, beautifully suggested, but not an integral part of the story. In one sense this book is the least satisfactory of the Wessex novels, for it is impossible to avoid a feeling that sweet Anne Garland, fairest of millers' daughters, deserves a better fate than to be mated with Bob Loveday, who treats her so shabbily, and, like the legendary sailor, falls a ready victim to any woman's wiles as soon as ever he steps ashore from his voyages. John, the steadfast soldier, we conclude irresistibly, would have made her happier; and as the suspense is kept up to the very last, the disappointment comes upon the reader suddenly and rather keenly. Bob, we maintain, in direct opposition to one or two treatises on Mr. Hardy's work that have amazed us by their ineptitude, is not one of the most successful characters. Considered as a story, this book seems to need the cohesion and dramatic power which are so prominently displayed in many of the others; but this drawback is counterbalanced by its intense interest and skill as a vivid picture of the days when "there were two arch-enemies of mankind—Satan, as usual, and Buonaparte, who had sprung up and eclipsed his elder rival altogether." Few of Mr. Hardy's romances, he himself acknowledges, are so founded on fact—on actual occurrences—as this one; but in all the novels we have that sublimation of the general into the typical, that expression of the type in the conversation and actions of a few, which is only possible in the careful and tireless hands of a literary master. Take, for an example of this peculiar adroitness, the inimitable rustics of Wessex. The dull man is not always a fool, neither is he necessarily a failure; were we, however, to meet some of these natives in the flesh we should probably find them extremely uninteresting and tedious at first. But fraternise with them—in the porch of the village hostelry, at merry-makings, after church, when and where you will—and often a kind of subtle, shrewd foolishness comes to the surface which could be reproduced by no 'prentice hand. Again and again Mr. Hardy seizes it unerringly with signal effect. Listen to the residents of Egdon chaffing each other round the bonfire; they have agreed that "Get out of my sight, you slack-twisted, slim-looking fool!" is rather a hard way of saying "No" to a man's proposal of marriage:

" . . . But even that might be overcome by time and patience, so as to let a few grey hairs show themselves in the hussy's head. How old be you, Christian?"

"Thirty-one last tatie-digging, Mister Fairway."

"Not a boy—not a boy. Still, there's hope yet."

"That's my age by baptism, because that's put down in the great book of the judgment-day that they keep down in the church vestry; but my mother told me I was born some time afore I was christened."

"Ah!"

"But she couldn't tell when, to save her life, except that there was no moon."

"No moon; that's bad. Hey, neighbours, that's bad for him?"

"Yes, 'tis bad," said Grandfer Cantle, shaking his head.

"Mother know'd 'twas no moon, for she asked another woman that had an almanac, as she did whenever a boy was born to her, because of the saying, 'No moon, no man,' which made her afraid every man-child she had. Do ye really think it serious, Mister Fairway, that there was no moon?"

"Yes; 'No moon, no man.' 'Tis one of the truest sayings ever spit out. The boy never comes to anything that's born at new moon. A bad job for thee, Christian, that you should have showed your nose then of all days in the month."

"I suppose the moon was terrible full when you were born?" said Christian, with a look of hopeless admiration at Fairway.

"Well, 'a was not new," Mr. Fairway replied, with a disinterested gaze.

Then there is the chatter of the old maltster in "Far From the Madding Crowd"—perhaps the country people in this delightful book are the best of all:

"Father's so old that 'a can't mind his age, can ye, father? And he's growed terrible crooked, too, lately," Jacob continued, surveying his father's figure, which was rather more bowed than his own. "Really, one may say that father there is three-double."

"Crooked folk will last a long while," said the maltster, grimly, and not in the best humour.

"Shepherd would like to hear the pedigree of yer life, father—wouldn't ye, shepherd?"

"Ay, that I should," said Gabriel, with the heastiness of a man who had longed to hear it for several months. "What may your age be, malter?" The maltster cleared his throat in an exaggerated form for emphasis, and elongating his gaze to the remotest point of the ashpit said, in the slow speech justifiable when the importance of a subject is so generally felt that any mannerism must be tolerated in getting at it, "Well, I don't mind the year I were born in, but perhaps I can reckon up the places I've lived at, and so get it that way. . . ."

He "reckons them up" lengthily, and then puts the triumphant question, "How much is that?"

"Hundred and seventeen," chuckled another old gentleman, given to mental arithmetic and little conversation, who had hitherto sat unobserved in a corner.

"Well, then, that's my age," said the maltster, emphatically.

"Oh, no, father!" said Jacob. "Your turnip-hoeing were in the summer, and your malting in the winter of the same years, and ye don't ought to count both halves, father."

"Chok! it all! I lived through the summers, didn't I? That's my question. I suppose ye'll say next I be no age at all to speak of?"

"Sure we shan't," said Gabriel, soothingly.

"Ye be a very old aged person, malter," attested Jan Coggan, also soothingly. "We all know that, and we must have a wonderful talented constitution to be able to live so long, mustn't he, neighbours?"

"True, true; ye must, malter, wonderful," said the meeting, unanimously.

Solomon Longways and his cronies, who enliven the pages of "The Mayor of Casterbridge"; the dairymaids in "Tess," all in love with Angel Clare; the picturesque gatherings in "Under the Greenwood Tree," these, and other equally lively passages, we must pass by with a mere allusion; they are all little well-defined portraits of the bucolic mind, and many of them might hold good at the present day in the more sequestered districts of Devon and Cornwall. Dorset, we fear, is by this time too near the centre of civilisation to retain many characters of such pristine innocence and rugged eccentricity.

In the accounts of the Maypole festivities, the "skimmity-ride," the November bonfires, and other ancient customs and ceremonies which are now either extinct or surviving only in remote quarters, Mr. Hardy has done good service as a historian. The scenes are made to live again before us, and the chatter of the villagers, their quaint, broad comments on local affairs, their enthusiasm and inoffensive egotism, are never-failing sources of amusement. Those who have been fortunate enough to witness the annual Whit-Monday practice of "Cheese-rolling" at Cooper's Hill, near Gloucester, where between a steep double line of hilarious humanity the round cheeses fly down the grassy slope and split into a hundred pieces over the cottage roofs far below; or those who have been in the town of Helston, Cornwall, on "Flora Day," will appreciate Mr. Hardy's preservation of these pictures, and regret the decadence of real folk-song and dance, the disappearance of those antiquated rejoicings which for unnumbered years expended harmlessly the superfluous energy of young and old. Railways, alas, have not been an untainted blessing.

A favourite theme of Mr. Hardy's is that of the woman established by force of circumstance in a slightly lower social position than that which is hers by birth or upbringing; or perhaps we ought rather to say that of the woman of a finer texture of mind and body than those with whom she is brought into contact day by day; the effect being somewhat similar in either case. Bathsheba Everdene, the lady sheep-rearer and farmer; Eustacia Vye, dark and proud and passionate, an exotic among the cottagers of Egdon Heath, ever craving for Paris and a fuller life; Lucetta Templeman and Elizabeth-Jane, whose dresses made the Casterbridge worthies stare; Marcia Bencomb wandering at the "Gibraltar of Wessex" in "The Well-Beloved"; and other instances, will occur to our readers as exemplifying this friction between life and location. In varying ways their fates are worked out: to happiness through much tribulation, as with Bathsheba, or to despair and death, as with poor Eustacia after her mistaken marriage, drowned in the weir-pool at Shadwater; and always the adherence of the true artist to probability is noticeable, even if we rebel—as who can help doing—at the pitiable finish of some of the attempts of these women to find the meaning of their existence—their final breaking on the wheel of vain desires.

The mention of the last-named book leads us to consider another phase of Mr. Hardy's performance—that represented by "Jude the Obscure" and "The Well-Beloved." Here, we feel that the author is not treading his ground so surely. The grandeur and the supreme ironic force of "Tess" are wanting in the story of Jude; there seems to be a needless insistence upon the sordid aspects of passion; its atmosphere seems vitiated with a slight miasma as from incipient decay; there is, in spite of its cleverness, an insidious lowering of the tone and a clear dismissal of the finest qualities of art which so lift the previous books above the level of the average novelist. As for the other volume, it is a truly remarkable departure—a study of a man who in almost every woman he meets searches for the ultimate "Well-Beloved" who shall satisfy his peculiarly fastidious heart. To outline the story will be sufficient, and we need hardly comment on its extraordinary import. Jocelyn Pierston, a sculptor of budding fame, returns to his home in that "singular peninsula that stretches out like the head of a bird into the English Channel." After his absence abroad he finds himself strangely stirred by little Avice Caro, the daughter of a neighbour:

To tell the truth, his affection for her was rather that of a friend than of a lover, and he felt by no means sure that the migratory, elusive idealisation he called his Love, who, ever since his boyhood, had flitted from human shell to human shell an indefinite number of times, was going to take up her abode in the body of Avice Caro.

By page thirteen he has proposed to her, however; but on the very next page we find "he was full of mis-giving":

He had quite disabused his mind of the assumption that the idol of his fancy was an integral part of the personality in which it had sojourned for a long or short while. To his Well-Beloved he had always been faithful; but she had had many embodiments. . . . Essentially she was perhaps of no tangible substance; a spirit, a dream, a frenzy, a conception, an aroma, an epitomised sex, a light of the eye, a parting of the lips.

Thus he oversets at one blow any idea of that sacred, indivisible union of body and soul which belongs to love and is ratified in marriage. Poor fellow—"in love" with a "subjective phenomenon!" And by page twenty-eight the "subjective phenomenon" has taken unto itself another female shape. Avice fails to keep an appointment; and in his walk Jocelyn overtakes a woman with a Juno-like face, who borrows five pounds from him, shares shelter with him in an old boat, and allows him to accompany her to Budmouth, his arm round her waist:

Somewhere about this time . . . he became conscious of a sensation which, in its incipient and unrecognised form, had lurked within him from some unnoticed moment when he was sitting close to his new friend under the lurret. . . . It meant a possible migration of the Well-Beloved. The thing had not, however, taken place; and he went on thinking how soft and warm the lady was in her fur covering, as he held her so tightly; the only dry spots in the clothing of either being her left side and his right, where they excluded the rain by their mutual pressure.

As they both happened to be bound for London, she out of pique at a quarrel with her father, he on business, they naturally travel up in the same compartment; and in the cab which conveys them from the station he is so convinced that the Well-Beloved has migrated that he bursts out, "My queenly darling! Instead of going to your aunt's, will you come and marry me?" She consents, in order to become independent, and they live for a few days at an hotel; but a tiff and a little sarcasm put an end to that incarnation of the "phenomenon." In the subsequent years the man follows the uncertain gleam, under various guises, until it concentrates in a fine searchlight upon a lady he meets at an evening party. Unfortunately he hears news of the death of Avice, "the only woman he had never loved," and the fickle illumination fades—for the Well-Beloved has flown to the astral sphere, and Avice haunts him from the skies! He takes train to the West in time to see her funeral and brood awhile at her grave, but happens to glimpse Avice's daughter (Avice had married) through the windows of a house where she is a servant, and, presto!—there is no need to tell what happened. Immediately he transfers his residence to her neighbourhood, and discovers that though he is forty and she twenty he wishes to marry her. But, to his utter astonishment, she confesses that she also suffers from the same complaint:

"What I see in one young man for a while soon leaves him and goes into another yonder, and I follow, and then what I admire fades out of him and springs up somewhere else; and so I follow on, and never fix to one. I have loved fifteen already!"

This naturally upsets his programme. Later, Avice the second, having fallen in love, pro tem., with someone forbidden, is anxious to get away for a time, and Pierston takes her to London as a servant in his flat. He still asks her to marry him, whereupon she says she is already secretly married to a quarryman at home, but separated through the usual incompatibility; he then escorts her back and brings about a reconciliation. Twenty more years pass by. He is sixty-one, well-preserved, and, the husband of Avice the second having died, he comes to England from Rome prepared to wed her out of friendship. But, alas! her daughter—Avice the first's grand-daughter—passes the window, a modern young miss of about twenty, trim and pretty, and voilà Avice the third and a belated edition of the Well-Beloved! The third Avice he woos somewhat diffidently, and, by reason of her mother's wish to see her comfortably settled, she accepts him. But on the eve of the wedding she meets a former lover in distress and runs away with him; and this lover turns out to be the stepson of the Juno before-mentioned, who had eloped with Pierston long ago. "Juno"—Marcia Bencourt—comes to see him about it, nurses him through an illness, and finally these two old people marry, sadly enough, the fervours of youth all past, the valley of the shadow not far away.

Knowing so well what Mr. Hardy can do, we feel that this sort of thin psychological adventure is somewhat beneath his talent, and however sincerely he may have intended the book it seems to strike a wrong note.

In so brief a survey of the Wessex novels as this must necessarily be it is not possible to enlarge upon many aspects of them; it would be interesting to follow out in detail the story of "Tess," Mr. Hardy's undoubted masterpiece, and to see how essentially pure her nature was in the face of condemnatory facts. It would be too broad an assertion to say that Mr. Hardy exalts the man and Mr. Meredith the woman, but it is justifiable to compare the women-characters of the two great writers; with the one they are so full of suffering, so grimly hounded by fate; with the other they are so vivacious, so brilliant, so victorious. With one they are loved for their sensuous charm; with the other men love them for their spiritual and bodily beauty. This is, of course, generalisation, and they move in different spheres; but the comparison is illuminating and not without profit.

We have no space to do more than mention the short stories, and that charming little book, "Two on a Tower," which, as far as we can ascertain, is unfamiliar to most of Mr. Hardy's admirers. But we wish, in conclusion, that before Mr. Hardy forsakes his fair land of Wessex to embark on the construction of epic poetry he would give the world a novel—a cheerful one—to balance against the sadness of "Tess." The pair would then, with the chosen volumes of the other two masters, rank among the finest and most representative works of English literature in the domain of fiction.

THE CONVERSATIONALIST

It was no exaggeration to say that the river flowed beneath his windows. Pent into a narrow tunnel after its freedom of meadows and poplars, it travelled swiftly under the old mill and emerged in a flouncing fan of white water directly below his room, hasty and eager to greet the daylight again. In the morning, when he awoke, the confused noise mingled in his ears with the songs of many birds, and soon the steady thudding of the moss-grown flats of the giant old wheel as it rumbled round in its dark, streaming chamber would send a faint tremor through the walls; half-awake, he would imagine he was on board some huge paddle-steamer, labouring in a heavy sea. At night, the roar of waters wove a muffled lullaby that projected itself into his dreams, dwindling or growing as sleep laid her hand heavily or lightly upon him.

During the first few days of his stay, as he listened, he had disentangled from the din two voices, one deep and hollow, the other sibilant and whispering, and he knew that they held continual conversations together. Once or twice he caught at their meaning and stretched out his arms, saying quietly, quickly: "Yes, yes!" but even as the thought came to him the thrill was gone, and the noise of the water relapsed to a mere puling chatter of trivialities. In the daytime the diapason of the wheel sometimes overwhelmed the conversation, and then he would wander along the river-bank to watch how the water curved in shining lines round meadow-corners, and note how, wherever there was an eddy, there existed a whisper of sound, so elusive that he had to bend down closely to catch it; a bird's drowsy note near by would overcome it. He knew, by-and-by, every point near the mill where there was a little voice. From under the rushes, where the stream swung along rather quickly, rose a quaint, sleepy trickle like the preoccupied murmur of a girl-child talking to herself among her toys. Farther down, where an endless procession of tiny whirlpools screwed themselves into the grass and vanished, a soft, faltering sound prevailed; a sound to the ear as October gossamer is to the eye. He pictured a woman speaking below her breath with her lips close to other lips that whispered pensive answers; there were silences, pauses of a minute or two, and then, as more little vortices spun to the bank and unravelled against the dusky yellow stems, the voices would begin again, shyly, dreamily. He thought, as he listened, that the woman's eyes would be shut. This led him to wonder whether, some day long ago, a woman had been drowned there, and he fancied a white arm flung carelessly across the brown, earthy edge.

But at noon, the hour when the old wheel rested, he returned to the mill to gaze at the released waters, and to listen. They were more riotous; the words were more easy to the ear, the large, low words.

To-day, somehow, he seemed nearer to their meaning than ever before. The sun crept round until it shone full upon that wonderful snowy labyrinth, striking into it a dazzling sheen as of a million falling diamonds, building, twenty times a minute, faultless little rainbows in the spray, increasing the greys of the bank to greens, the browns to reds, finding in the ancient walls that rose straight from the pool unsuspected spots of purple and gold. Whenever the light touched the water, the listener found that he was on the point of comprehending what was astir between those ceaseless voices. Over there, in the corner, too, was a curl of spent foam marvellously like a face—a woman's face, white as a snowdrop's petals; and below it streamed out a long, dark patch of weed that waved like blown, heavy hair. . . . He clutched the rails and leaned forward; but a cloud drifted across the sun, and the waters became a noise. He looked up, watching the ruffled silver edge of the cloud, waiting for it to sail by; but behind it came another, and still another, so that the sunshine swept round beyond where he stood, touching a field here and there a mile away, making a green flame of a chestnut-grove on the side of a hill, sending a shaft as clear and straight as a search-light upon a little white, distant farm—leaving him always the centre of a patch of shadow that changed its shape but would not pass. He turned away with a sigh.

Sunset found him again by the mill, for the old wheel was silent then once more. Reluctantly, as though loth to lose their great illuminator, the clouds let the round red globe sink towards the horizon, and the last level spears of radiance shot across the rushing waters, so that the diamonds were changed to gold. The man lingered, his eyes seeking for that curl of white, that face in the foam, that sinuous, moving weed that looked so like a woman's hair unbound; but the pool was darkening, and the commotion bewildered him; he lost the vision of the lustrous morning.

The last rich splendours faded in the west, leaving high, cool primrose-spaces and long, low bars of cloud burning duskily below them. Opposite, where the vapours of evening still held pink reflections of the glory just ended, the earth-line, swinging slowly eastward, disclosed the dreamy, solemn oval of the full moon. From the colour of ruddy firelight, golden-brown, it paled through deep daffodil to the hue of spun silk, till presently, like a silvern shield hung on the wall of heaven, it glinted on the mill-pool and the silent, lonely figure that leaned against the low rail. Down in the tranquil backwater its sallow image elongated itself curiously until it might have been an opal goblet, held in the languid hand of some water-sprite lazily floating and dreaming; at intervals it would be covered with a thin veil of ripples that ravelled and unravelled as the current stirred the pool with invisible fingers. A wild-fowl splashed at the bank, whirring her wings; the opal goblet broke into a thousand quick, flashing fragments, a maze of tangled light and mysterious, whimsical lines, then re-gathered into the misshapen, wavering moon-face, gazing passionlessly, purely up at the faint, fine stars. The breeze that had sprung up at sunset freshened to a warm, fragrant wind.

The man turned to the falling mill-race once more—those diamonds that had changed to gold an hour ago were now like sparkling facets of silver, brilliant, living drops that sprayed up into the air and danced and whirled down to mingle their radiance with the long lines of foam spinning off below. He looked eagerly at them, for the soft enchantment of that perfect light enveloped all. It showed the snowy fan of waters; it showed the clear brown edge where the old walls left the pool; it showed . . . yes, it showed that curl of spent foam so wonderfully like a woman's face—and there, too, waved that blown, loosened hair. He listened. The voices began—he knew they would; they answered one another. he was sure, and his pale face strained forward in the moonlight, minute after minute, intent upon that vague, sibilant conversation. And as he listened a heavy hand of cloud slowly, cruelly clenched over the moon and would not let it go.

Suddenly listless, the man moved away. For the woman's face had blurred to a mere quivering oval of foam, and the voices were meaningless. "To-morrow," he said, whispering, "to-morrow I shall see her . . . and hear her voice."

REVIEWS

KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH

Old Beliefs and Modern Believers. By PERCY ANSLEY ELLIS, Vicar of St. Mary's, Westminster. (Andrew Melrose, 3s. 6d.)

FAITH is old, and immutable; knowledge is progressive, and leads incessantly towards change and correction; hence in the minds of all thinking persons arises the conflict of idea and thought which has shown itself in a hundred different ways since scientists and Egyptologists have given to the world their discoveries, their theories, and their emendations of previously sanctioned truths. To accept the great doctrines of Christianity and all they involve, unquestioningly and absolutely, may be possible to the simple and tranquil souls for whom all varieties of creed are reduced to the formulated platitudes of a Methodist pulpit, or to those whose intellectual balance suffers no derangement from the strepitous impact of a Sankey's "hymn" with its assertive rhythm and a "refrain"; but there are many who cannot take such vitally important matters on trust. Their power of ratiocination will not be quashed by mere statements, nor calmly relegated to oblivion; they desire some distinct proof to dissect, some evidence with which to grapple, some virile proposition to wrestle with, to throw or be overthrown—better than that indifference or atrophy. For this most valuable contingent of possible adherents—valuable because its majority consists of keen men of business, men of letters, men of the world in the capable sense—this book has apparently been written, and although we cannot agree with all its conclusions, it appears to us a careful, thoughtful, and earnest attempt to dispel those insidious forms of doubt to which the type of mind we have indicated will always be a prey.

It is no trivial thing to take up the pen in defence or in elucidation of sacred truths; it is a task to be performed with prayer and fasting, and the recognition that whoso deals with human souls deals with mysterious forces, and must do so in full assurance of his authority, lest his presumption result in untold harm and misery. The hand reached out to save the man who stands insecurely on the rock perilous may easily slip and push him to destruction; we are, therefore, glad to find that the author of this little treatise realises his position, reasons calmly, strives to reconcile without undue straining the fundamental truths of religion with the modern tendency to argument and criticism. "Loyalty to Christianity," he observes, "demands no sacrifice of truth, and no refusal of anything that can rank as fact. We cannot harbour the slightest fear that Nature has facts to disclose that can imperil Christianity." We might go a step farther, and say that loyalty to Christianity demands acceptance of natural truths, and that the facts disclosed by Nature, or, rather, by our more complete comprehension of her, will strengthen the faith of those whose outlook is not merely superficial: they were none the less facts before we discovered them. At the same time, the danger is pointed out of allowing the easy doctrine of "God in Nature" to degenerate into a kind of Pantheism, which regards Nature "as the complete expression of God, and makes no distinction between man and God."

Some of the statements are a little too sweeping. "There is nothing in the Bible to suggest that man began at the top and was degraded by sin." We do not find this surprising assertion proved at all satisfactorily—the writer goes on to remark that St. Paul's theory of the relation between Adam and his posterity occurs incidentally in two passages (Rom. v. 12-21;

1 Cor. xv. 22). "If these two passages were lost, nothing else in the New Testament would suggest the popular version of the effects of Adam's sin." But they are not lost; and can we not draw a considerable number of inferences?

However we may differ on two or three points, still we can concur in several chapters of the book; we feel that the author has put his case plainly and judiciously, and that a goodly proportion of those who read will have reason to be grateful to him. His work does not err, as too often similar books do, in overlooking the fact that mystery is an essential part—a corollary—of faith. "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," said the indomitable apostle—one can almost hear his voice ringing, see his eyes shining. "I am persuaded," he cries, "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God." Do we really need much book-learning, many expositors, after that magnificent, triumphant avowal?

AMONG THE HILLS

British Mountaineering. By C. E. BENSON. (Routledge, 5s.)

FROM that wonderful age when the child surveys the first flight of stairs and ponders upon what manner of sensation it might be to reach the summit unaided, to the time when, no longer a child, he gazes enviously at the inaccessible snow-peak of some cloud-beleaguered Alp, half hidden, half revealed in tantalising splendour, the instinct to climb is one of the strongest implanted in human nature. We must ascend, even though it be only to the top of some slippery, sea-washed boulder, or up the grassy slope of a smooth Sussex hill. And if there be many among us—we can well believe it so—who would rather sit by the fire and read this book than emulate its author in his hair-raising exploits, there are many others to whom it will prove but an additional incentive to essay the crags and tors that rise within the easy reach of a railway journey, in our own islands. It is not given to all of us to be sure-footed and clear-headed on dizzy heights, but much may be accomplished by practice—even persons with weak hearts need not despair, according to Mr. Benson. The secret is to take ascents steadily, without haste, and with precautions such as a good equipment and a well-packed provision-pocket in the rucksack; items one would imagine to be unnecessarily emphasised, yet which are disregarded or overlooked even by men whose experience should have taught them better.

No attempt is here made to dwell on the poetic or scenic aspect of mountaineering; there is not a sentence of "padding"; the book is severely practical, and no one who intends during the coming summer to make a sojourn in the Lake district (which is, of course, the Mecca of English climbers) should neglect to take it with him. It is full of good advice to beginners, hints and cautions, too, that will not come amiss to more advanced students of the art. Discussing the advisability of careful management of the rope, the writer says:

Twenty feet is not very far to fall, but anyone who walks out of his drawing-room window into his area would find it quite far enough. Sixty feet is no great height, either, but it would serve. Anyone who questions this has only to step off the coping of an ordinary London West End house on to the pavement to be convinced.

The novice is warned that his legs are stronger than his arms. "Of course," says Mr. Benson, "one would think he knew that, but he never by any chance acts as if he thought so. He pulls himself up with his hands, whereas he should push himself up with his feet." And, again, with regard to keeping cool, we have excellent advice:

There is not much good in losing your temper with a mountain. The mountain does not mind, and you only make a fool of yourself. . . . More than once I have been out with a beginner, who, after conscientiously loafing and zig-zagging up a hundred feet or so of grass slope announces crossly his intention of going straight ahead at "the beastly thing," and having done with it, and away he goes accordingly, digging in his toes and lifting himself with a small group of muscles, to arrive in triumph at the top, three minutes before the other man, who is following with leisurely zig-zags—but a bit done up, whereas the tortoise is as fresh as when he started, and perhaps fresher. The importance of the zig-zag as a saving of labour in ascending can hardly be exaggerated.

Many thrilling incidents are related where a slip or a fault has nearly caused disaster, and generally the humorous side of affairs strikes the author forcibly, so that the book is at times provocative of an unexpected laugh.

We are sorry that Mr. Benson has had no experience of Cornwall. Some delightful cliff and rock "scrambles" are to be had at several parts of the coast of that rugged county, and the colours of the rocks, especially towards the Land's End, are surprisingly beautiful. Many of the secluded and practically unknown little bays on both north and south coasts offer granitic pinnacles and "chimneys" which no climber need be ashamed to try, even if only for the sake of novelty and practice. But, of course, we admit that for such sport as can come under the legitimate title of mountaineering the enthusiast must travel northward-ho.

The photographs are an excellent aid to the text—some of them illustrate positions that look quite dangerous enough to satisfy the epicure in risky feats—and the list of districts where "sport" may be had will be of great value; it includes England, Scotland, and Wales, Ireland not appearing in the volume, save in a passing allusion. The inclusion of a chapter of medical hints—what to do in case of accident—was a happy idea, and goes to show the care and thoughtfulness with which the author set about his task. It has evidently been a labour of love, and it was very well worth doing.

THE CHILD AND THE CATECHIST

Church Teaching for Church Children. By the REV. J. N. NEWLAND-SMITH, M.A. (A. R. Mowbray and Co., Ltd., 3s. 6d. net.)

ONE of the most interesting features in the religious history of the nineteenth century has been the remarkable development of the Sunday School. There can be little doubt that to the work accomplished by these valuable institutions can be traced that zeal for the religious instruction of the young which is now, happily, characteristic of the Church of England as a whole. They have been nurseries of good churchmanship. Many a man to-day will thankfully and proudly admit that he owes whatever of good there is in him to the teaching he received in his Sunday-school days. There is, however, another side to the picture, and one which candour compels us to insist upon. The advent of the Sunday-school teacher was accompanied by the decay, and ultimately by the extinction, of the catechist:

The Curate of every parish shall diligently, upon Sundays and Holy-days, after the second Lesson at Evening Prayer, openly in the church instruct and examine so many children of his parish sent unto him, as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism.

So runs a now practically neglected rubric in the Book of Common Prayer. The reasons for the gradual disuse of this laudable practice are not difficult to surmise. The growth of population and the somewhat abnormal conditions of city life combine to render its retention a matter of extreme difficulty. In the majority of cases the parish priest—already unduly handicapped by a variety of entirely superfluous duties—has been content to hand over the spiritual instruction of the children of his parish to the voluntary Sunday-school teachers. These, doubtless, have done their best. Unhappily, however, in many cases, that best has not been good enough. They have been men of unflinching industry, of warm sympathy and of an entirely commendable patience. But too often they have lacked the necessary training, and the success of their efforts has been incommensurate with the labour that has been bestowed upon them. In these days when secular education is receiving so much attention it is more than ever necessary that the Sunday-school teacher should not be found walking in old and outworn paths. He must be at least as fully equipped for his task as the mathematical master or the instructor in physical science. Our children are critical. They are as quick to detect a flaw in argument as to note any appearance of insincerity or mere perfunctoriness on the part of their teachers. Such things they resent, and the influence which the teacher might otherwise have established over his pupils is considerably impaired, if not, indeed, hopelessly lost.

The absence of satisfactory manuals of instruction for the teacher is undoubtedly one of the causes of the present unsatisfactory method of Sunday-school teaching. Such books are few and far between. The best of them might possibly be counted upon the fingers of two hands. As Mr. Percy Dearmer remarks, in his excellent introduction to this book:

Our widespread failure to achieve any noticeable results from a century of Sunday School work is no doubt due to the fact that few are sufficiently gifted as to be able to make bricks without straw. We did our best, those of us who had determined to learn the art of teaching, with such books as we had, and we gradually drew up manuscript books of our own; but the lay teachers, upon whom most of the work has fallen, had neither the libraries nor the leisure for so much literary endeavour, and we clergy were but average men doing our average little best, without guidance, without tradition, and without previous training.

Happily it is possible to praise "Church Teaching for Church Children" unreservedly. Mr. Newland-Smith has written a book for which every parish priest, catechist and Sunday-school teacher should be sincerely grateful. Certainly we have never met with a more thorough or comprehensive exposition of the main principles of the Catholic faith, or one more admirably adapted to the requirements of children. Mr. Newland-Smith's method is entirely individual, though it presents some interesting points of contact to that of the Sulpicians. The book is divided into three sections, each of which covers the lessons for a whole year. The Catechism is minutely dissected, and every clause explained with the greatest care and in the simplest terms. In addition to this, the lessons are arranged in small groups, which are followed by some very useful "revisions." By this means the scholar is not allowed to forget the substance of what he has been taught in the foregoing instructions. Mr. Newland-Smith is peculiarly apt in his illustrations, which are gleaned from a variety of fields. One instance will suffice for the purpose of quotation. He is speaking of the hotly-debated subject of auricular confession:

We may take (he writes) a common-sense illustration of this. If you want a jug of water you generally go to the tap and draw it. The water does not come from the tap, though it does come from the tap; it comes from the waterworks.

Forgiveness comes from God, through the priest. He only conveys God's forgiveness, just as the tap only conveys the water. Yet people often say: "I do not want any priest to come between my soul and God." Suppose they said: "I do not want any tap to come between my water and me. I shall stand my jug out into the back garden and wait till it rains. I prefer to get my water straight from heaven." We should think them rather foolish, though they could get a jug of water in that way.

This extract will serve to indicate Mr. Newland-Smith's point of view, which is that of a loyal Catholic and Churchman. Readers may accept our assurance that in this volume there is no paltering with the eternal verities, no timid evasions or half-truths. The author may be warmly congratulated on performing for the children of this country a service no less important than that rendered to the children of France by Mgr. Dupanloup.

GENERAL LEE

General Lee: Man and Soldier. By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. (T. Werner Laurie, price 6s.)

MR. PAGE has taken for his hero one of the most fascinating personalities of modern times, the Bayard of the New World, and one of the most skilled soldiers and magnetic leaders of all times. His name perhaps does not remain in memory like that of some others, partly because his career ended in defeat (but so did Napoleon's) and partly because he did not hold the stage long enough to impress himself on the mind of the world so deeply as other great captains have done. In America his name is immortal, and so it will be among students of the art of war for all time. This volume appears opportunely, for it is well that we should read of Lee just as America has been celebrating the centenary of Abraham Lincoln—the Carnot, the organiser of victory for the North. These two great men were reared in surroundings as different as it is possible to conceive. But nobility was innate in both—in Lincoln, the log-roller of Illinois, as in Lee, the son of an old Virginian house, of an old English stock. Both were animated with true patriotism. Perhaps most of us will acclaim Lincoln's as the higher, and he offered the command of the armies of the Union to Lee. But Robert Lee had some of the defects as he had to such a great degree the merits of his qualities. He held State above country—and who can blame him, considering which was his State? Virginia is associated with all that is noblest and most attractive in all the Americas, and not only in the United States; and, as Mr. Page tells us on page 38, "Lee had from his boyhood been reared in the Southern school of States Rights, as interpreted by the Conservative statesmen of Virginia." That conception of States Rights cannot be given better expression than in the words of Robert Lee's father, a Governor of Virginia, who in the Virginian Convention, while advocating the ratification of the constitution of the United States, said in debate: "Virginia is my country; her will I obey, however lamentable the fate to which it may subject me." We are reminded of the passionate esteem in which the traditions and opinions of a father were held in old Virginia. "Political views were as much inherited as religious convictions." Then, too, we read that at the Military Academy at West Point the text-books in use there taught the absolute right of a State to secede and the primary duty of each man to his native State. In such surroundings of thought was Robert Lee born on the 19th January, 1807, at Stratford, on a plateau about a mile from the south bank of the Potomac. Mr. Page describes Stratford as "a massive brick mansion . . . which, even in its dilapidation, looks as if it might have been built by Elizabeth and bombarded by Cromwell." The Lees themselves were scions of a family "ancient enough to have fought at Hastings and to have followed Richard of the Lion Heart to the Holy Land." The Lees were the neighbours and kinsmen of George Washington, who was ever the great Southern leader's ideal. Robert Lee graduated in war during the Mexican campaign, where he received in succession the brevets of Major, Lt.-Colonel and Colonel, and at the end of the war was declared by his chief, General Scott, to be "the greatest living soldier in America"; and later the same general declared him "the greatest soldier now living in the world." Then Mr. Page says himself, "On the 10th January, 1807, was born Robert E. Lee, whom we of the South believe to have been not only the greatest soldier of his time and the greatest captain of the English-speaking race, but the loftiest character of his generation; one rarely equalled and possibly never excelled in all the annals of the human race!"

He goes on to quote Lord Wolseley, who has said: "According to my notion of military history there is as much instruction both in strategy and in tactics to be gleaned in General Lee's operations of 1862 as there is to be found in Napoleon's campaign of 1796." He who will pit himself against our great Field-Marshal in military controversy will be a brave man.

Well, then, starting in such superlatives, why has Mr. Page taken up such a defensive position on behalf of his hero? For defensive it is, almost apologetic. He says he is repelling the charge that Lee was not loyal, that he was a rebel and an egotist. He defends his position well. He shows us the heart-searchings of this noble-minded man when the time came for decision between Virginia and the Union; his decision, too, to leave the career of arms and never to draw sword save in defence of his country. He shows, too, his love of freedom, for he manumitted his slaves (his servants, he called them) before the war began, and how he ever thought for them. But is this long defence needed? To most of us Robert E. Lee has ever been even the character which these pages once more show him. Another line of defence is against the charge that Lee was only great in defence, that in offensive military operations he failed.

Here Mr. Page is not so strong, for his methods of narrative are very faulty. Military students have never had any doubt of the supreme merit of Lee's 1862 campaign and of his generalship universally. His daring, brilliant strategy, his bold turning movements, his rapid changes of position and front will be the admiration of all time. He never once failed when properly backed up. When he and Stonewall Jackson worked together they were invincible against any reasonable odds. Had Jackson lived and commanded Lee's right at Gettysburg, instead of Longstrut, the result of the day might have been reversed. Lee had there a bulldog soldier, who would not take the risks to attack Meade's flank when ordered. He wasted eight hours of priceless time while pick and shovel were at work to make a vulnerable position unassailable and while reinforcements rolled in to Meade's position.

Mr. Page deprecates his power of describing Lee's military exploits, and then proceeds to do so in much detail. Here is where he fails. Though evidently a close and accurate student of the great campaign, his narrative is very tedious to follow. He gives us no map. Now, even the readers of his own country must surely find some difficulty in tracing the quickly-told movements of either Army. Even the closest student of any campaign asks for the help of a skeleton map to enable him to retrace familiar paths of war. Similarly it is a severe strain to locate the place in either army of the generals of different units. Brigade is sent from Division, Division from Army Corps (each designated by the name of its general) without any introductory note to show that the lesser was a part of the greater unit. Mr. Page's sentences, too, are at times of quite unusual length, exacting the very close attention of the reader.

Subject to this criticism, the book is quite readable, and Robert E. Lee, general and leader, Christian and gentleman, is made known to us very intimately. In no scene do his qualities shine out more brilliantly than in the last of all, when he surrendered his Army of the South to General Grant, to whose generosity, too, due credit is paid.

"What will history ask of the surrender of an army in the field?" asked an officer of his staff in passionate grief.

"Yes, I know they will say hard things of us; they will not understand that we were overwhelmed by numbers; but that is not the question. The question is, is it right to surrender this army? If it is right, then I will take the responsibility."

NOVELLA TEBE

The Story of Pisa. By JANET ROSS and NELLY ERICHSEN. Illustrated by NELLY ERICHSEN. (Mediaeval Town Series, J. M. Dent and Co., 5s. 6d. net and 4s. 6d. net.)

THE in attractive titles, a "Vade mecum" or "Hand-book," which Mrs. Ross and Miss Erichsen naturally avoid, nevertheless accurately describe their attractive little volume. It is more than a guide-book and scarcely a history, for it begins with a sketch of Pisa from the remotest times and ends with a useful list of hotels where visitors may expect tolerable accommodation or something better. There is also a plan of the town as it stands and an index. It is, in fact, exactly the book to guide the visitor by day and amuse him during idle evenings, and it is written throughout with intelligence and enthusiasm.

Mrs. Ross alone is responsible for the first hundred pages, which relate the history of Pisa. Unlike more ambitious historians, who, in order to develop historical theories of their own, double through time like hares, she is content to chronicle as many concurrent events as she can deal with clearly, in the order in which time developed them. It must be admitted that her sketch is rather fatiguing to the mind, for it contains too many facts crowded into a small space. She might have omitted some, leaving sufficient to interpret their monuments or lesser memorials existing in Pisa at the present day. She herself seems a little confused by the remotest and most uncertain events, for the antiquity of Pisa can scarcely be said to approach the boundaries of imagination, compared with the antiquity of many other cities—say Knossos. "The volcanic spiritual force which was pent within the small town," as Mrs. Ross describes the Pisan spirit, really is astounding. It seems as if every Pisan born between 1000 and 1400 must have been "a great-hearted gentleman"; a character which by no means hindered the city's prominence even among all the cities of Europe, in crimes of violence and treachery. Yet its merits deserved the eulogy and protection of St. Bernard. It is not surprising if the expenditure of so much force exhausted the Pisan race. From the beginning of the seventeenth century the Pisan spirit disappears, and the Medici family occupies its place in the history of the city. In order to realise the greatness of that spirit while it lasted, Mrs. Ross dwells rightly on its influence and extension outside its own territory. Being the most powerful and advanced of Ghibiline cities, yet often attached by sentiment to the person of Popes, Pisa frequently acted on equal terms with the Empire, the Papacy and other great Powers. It subdued Sardinia, Corsica, the Balearic Islands and large parts of Sicily. It planted colonies and exchanges on all the shores of the Mediterranean, in the valley of the Nile, and on the banks of the Orontes; it maintained its own courts of justice at Acre, Joppa, Jerusalem, Antioch, Laodicea, Damietta and Tunis. Its Consuetudine di Mare, approved by Henry IV. in 1063 and Gregory VII. in 1075, mark the beginning of international maritime law. When we reflect that our own naval supremacy was largely built up on piracy five hundred years later, we gain an idea of the civilisation to which Pisa had attained in many directions before the Norman Conquest. It was this expansiveness and civilisation which both inclined and enabled the Pisans to fill their city with far-distant treasures, the remains of which are still to be found there.

The description of the city as it now is, with pen and pencil, is due to Miss Erichsen. Her thirty illustrations, though slight, and often on too small a scale, are correctly drawn, and with two exceptions only, apposite to her text. She generally avoids the mere prettiness into which facile sketchers are apt to fall. She is a pleasant and well-instructed guide. The depraved belfry, the Tower of Famine, with its "famous Erl of Pise," the Campo Santo, with its miraculous earth, the Duomo, without and within, and S. Paolo a Ripa d'Arno, have all been described so often that Miss Erichsen's careful descriptions need no special comment. Since such conspicuous monuments serve as advertisements to attract foreign money, they are more likely to escape modern Italian taste and cupidity. But a breach has already been made in the City-walls, and there is no knowing how soon a municipal syndicate may be interested in house-breaking or reconstruction, nor how long lesser treasures may escape the entire destruction of the Porta Romana, or the deformation already suffered by S. Maria della Spina, S. Sepolcro, S. Martino in Chiusica, S. Maria delle Carmine, S. Marta, S. Sisto, S. Anna, and S. Vito. The Medici indeed made many alterations, but they left much in their place, and nothing like the statue of Victor Emanuel in its "banal square," behind the "paltry barrier." More welcome, therefore, are Miss Erichsen's descriptions of the lesser monuments, which have suffered less, the campanili of S. Caterina, S. Silvestro, and S. Niccolò, and the churches, S. Pietro in Vincolis, S. Andrea Forisportæ, S. Michele in Borgo, S. Paolo in Orto, S. Stefano de' Cavalieri, S. Frediano, and S. Caterina. The last is also full of memories of St. Thomas, and with S. Domenico, of the other great Dominican luminary, St. Catherine of Siena. S. Francesco is especially connected with St. Francis himself, and with Alberto, whom he sent to introduce the Franciscan Order into England, and who died and was buried at Oxford. The palaces of the city, to which Miss Erichsen devotes a separate chapter, have inevitably and naturally undergone more changes than the churches, in fulfilment of the purpose which they were built to serve, human habitation. They have been altered to meet the requirements of each successive owner, whose necessities appear mingled not unpleasantly in their fabric. The Palazzo Gambacorti is haunted, as by ghosts, by that great Pisan family and by the Emperor Charles IV., and the Palazzo Granduca and the Palazzo Vecchio by the still greater Medici. In a little house off the Via della Fortezza, Galileo was born. To many visitors the Palazzo Lanfranchi is more interesting because Byron hired it, and one of the Tre Palazzi, "a prim, square, white house," because Shelley lived in it, than for any charms of architecture which they may still possess. The Museo Civico also is more lively to those who seek history and life than are most of those rather dreary mausoleums of dismembered works of art, often disguised by ignorant restoration. Here is a fragment of the Great Girdle, many coins and seals of the city, needlework and ornaments, and a collection of targoni, banners, and other insignia of the giuoco del ponte. Since the game was a public one, its adjuncts are appropriately stored in a public museum—they could scarcely be preserved otherwise—just as domestic ornaments and utensils linger suitably in old houses. And there is much besides, the more separable of the larger objects of painting and sculpture, in the Museum, the Seminario Arcivescovile, and elsewhere, precious to those who appreciate works of art even when they are misplaced and disfigured. Especially Pisan, for one reason or another, are Bruno di Giovanni's panel, St. Ursula rescuing the city from flood, once in S. Paolo a Ripa d'Arno, now in the Museum, and the polyptych from S. Caterina, by Simone Martini, now unhappily divided between the Museum and the Seminary. The great Glorification of St. Thomas, by Francesco Traini, a Pisan born, happily still remains in S. Caterina, where the saint preached; but a triptych by Bernardino di Mariotto has been willfully torn apart, although the whole of it is in one building, the Museum.

There, too, Miss Erichsen particularly admires a Madonna, by Gentile di Fabriano, and a banner painted by Fra Angelico, at least Mr. Langton Douglas says so. Still more characteristically Pisan is the great group of sculptors which Pisa first adopted from far and then bred within its walls, the Pisani. Large fragments of the Duomo pulpit, by Niccolò, are preserved in the Museum. The Baptistery pulpit, by his son, Giovanni, one of the inspirers of Giotto's realism, is still in situ. Giovanni's beautiful ivory Madonna, leaning to the right in order to support the weight of the Infant on her left arm, as Miss Erichsen describes it—or necessarily following the curve of the tusk—is in the sacristy of the Duomo. His triptych of the Madonna with the two St. Johns is in the Baptistery. The work of Andrea and Nino is much confused; one or the other can be seen in sculptures of S. Maria della Spina, but the Madonna della Rosa and the Madonna del Latte Miss Erichsen states definitely are Nino's. Tomasso, son of Andrea, and architect of the bell-house on the summit of the leaning tower, has a fine reredos in S. Francesco. A signed crucifix by Giunta, the only painter of the group, is to be found in S. Ranieri. The frescoes of the Campo Santo, especially the Triumph of Death and the Holy Hermits are famous by reproduction and description, and the reasons for ascribing them to the Orcagne, or the School of Giotto, or the Lorenzetti, or Bernardo Daddi, or even to Traini are more or less known.

It does not distinctly appear which of the authors is responsible for the last chapter, describing the neighbourhood of Pisa, with its mountains, its pine forests, its cultivated lands, its ancient burghs, its fortresses, its monasteries, its churches, and its baths. Since the chapter contains the merits of both writers and is, on the whole, the most successful in their book, it may well be attributed to both jointly. Besides giving an adequate historical and antiquarian sketch of each place, the writers create a charming impression of the scenery and healthful climate of the whole Pisan country. Most casual visitors to Pisa, and, indeed, most naturalists, will be surprised to learn that those much-abused potentates, the Grand Dukes of Tuscany, were so enlightened as to acclimatise camels in their domain of S. Rossore before 1663; that a large herd still exists; and that all attempts to acclimatise them elsewhere in Italy have proved abortive.

Space fails to tell of a great company of Popes, Emperors and foreign Kings; of illustrious families, Gherardeschi, Bergolini, Appiani, Lanfranchi, Visconti; of expert captains, Castruccio Castracane and Sir John Hawkwood; of holy Pisan patrons, St. Sisto, St. Thorpè, St. Ranieri, St. Lussorio; of picturesque personalities, the Blessed Alberto Leccapecore, the Countess Matilda, Daimbert, the mysterious and attractive Pier delle Vigne, Nazaradech, Dante and his friend, Nino Visconti, the grotesque Giovanni del Agnello; of architects, the Comacine Guilds, Buschetto, Rainaldo, Diotisalvi, Bonanno, Bacio Bandinelli; of painters, Ghirlandaio, Benozzo Gozzoli, Andrea da Firenze, Spinello Aretino, Antonio Veneziano, the Gaddi, the Lorenzetti; of historians, Marangone, Sercambi, Vesalio, Vassari, Villani; and of travellers, Rutilius Numantianus, Montaigne, Evelyn, Richard Lassels, Marianna Stark. Such as these and many more formed the history of Pisa or illuminated the city or rendered it illustrious by their presence or their works. Their acts are written in Miss Ross's and Miss Erichsen's story, and their names for the most part in their comprehensive index.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Links in the Chain. By HEADON HILL. (John Long, 6s.)

THERE is no beating about the bush with Mr. Headon Hill. He plunges you into the very heart of a situation with an amazing and most businesslike celerity. In this last novel of his, for instance, you have not been reading for five minutes before a murder has been committed. This deed accomplished, event follows event in a hot and breathless succession. We are flung headlong into a world of frauds, dupes, detectives and crystal-gazers. The ingredients of such romances never vary, and "Links in the Chain" is not noticeably different from any of the thirty or forty other novels which we owe to the unflagging industry of Mr. Hill. As an interpretation of life the book is simply ludicrous. Mr. Hill is not concerned with the credible, but it may be urged in his defence that he has contrived to avoid many of the pit-falls into which some of his less successful rivals in the art of sensation writing have been lured. He can tell an entirely impossible story, and invest it at odd moments with some faint show of plausibility. Since, too, novels of this kind seem inevitable, it is perhaps well that we have such a writer as Mr. Headon Hill. There are many worse novelists.

The City of the Golden Gate. By E. EVERETT-GREEN. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

THE great earthquake in San Francisco offers possibilities to any novelist with a sense of the tragic and a gift for vivid romancing, and the writer of this book has woven a very presentable story into those days of overpowering terror. The description of the shaken, burning city is graphically done, and the part taken by the chief character in the work of rescue and assistance to the homeless crowds affords an opening for realistic depiction of which good advantage is taken. We do not care for the hero—who is more than half a villain—with his "yellow, cat-like eyes" and his uncanny mesmeric powers; he is quite an automaton and most unconvincing. His place is usurped, however, by two well-drawn, sane and smart young men, who straighten things up very pleasantly in the end and marry the two girls who have been terrorised by the pseudo-hero, so all finishes happily. No one will grumble at any lack of ability to hold the attention, and the style keeps on a good level, as novelists go. The illustrations had far better have been omitted.

The Dream—and the Woman. By TOM GALLON. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

FOR those who are fond of a good "mystery" story, with a little love and plentiful complications, this volume will be a welcome arrival. The plot is far too involved for us to do more than suggest its burden, but it is cleverly worked out and not too far removed from plausibility to spoil the reader's sense of fitness. It treats of a murder (everyone thinks it is a murder until the victim turns up safe and sound) committed by a woman who is a somnambulist, and who wakes at the instant after the crime—if crime it be—with the sensation of having suffered a horrible dream. The trial scene is capitally told in the words of the young lawyer for the defence; the other portions of the narrative are related by those who are chiefly concerned, and if the various pieces of the puzzle do wedge together a trifle too accurately at times and the help of coincidence is a little too freely invoked, we are inclined to forgive the author because of the "thrills" and ingenious situations he has devised. He makes a slip or two: for example, we really do not think the defending counsel in a big criminal case would dine with a couple of important witnesses on the evening of the first day, and discuss freely the progress and the probabilities of the affair. However, there is the story to console us; it may not be literature, but it is good entertainment.

Did She Do Right? By A. J. MACDONNELL. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

IT occurs to us that when a person chances upon a passable idea for the plot of a novel there should exist certain conditions, rules, examinations—what you will—without compliance with which he or she could be prosecuted for writing the story. For example, a sentence like this ought to "throw" the aspirant:

He almost thought his favourite Clytie waved her marble hand, as if beckoning him to some midnight revel of the gods, as dazzling white against the dark background of foliage, she stood amidst nymphs and graces, a shrinking Venus, and playful faun on either side; the flickering shadows of the palm leaves giving a semblance of motion to the cold marble.

Seven consecutive sentences, each concluding with a note of admiration, should prevent a "pass" certificate; to say that a person is in a "dreamy reverie" (really, Mrs. Macdonnell must look up the etymology of "reverie," for she does this two or three times), and to be consistently tautological, might earn a black mark; and mixtures such as the following ought not to be allowed:

It was evident this handsome "preux chevalier" was a persona grata to the elder lady, if he had not succeeded in winning the heart of the younger.

And what are we to say to this:

Stately cypresses raise their kingly heads to Heaven, and over all the glorious, clear, azure vault, radiating sunshine, the sweet, fresh air is so pure, the rich colouring so exquisite, while the scent of late roses intoxicate (sic) the senses with perfume!

Alas! We fear that not in our time will such a Society for the Protection of the English Language be formed. Mrs. Macdonnell means well; her plot is fairly good; but on every page are mistakes—mistakes—mistakes, till the reader with any sense of composition is driven nearly frantic. The finest romance would be utterly spoiled under such treatment; it pulls the book down to the apparent level of a novelette. It is a thousand pities that some kind and grammatical friend could not have punctuated and polished this story before it was printed.

The Trials of a Country Parson. By AUGUSTUS JESOP, D.D. (T. Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)

THIS attractive little book, which reached a fourth impression fourteen years ago, is again issued in a new edition, and the pleasant discursions on life as viewed from an East Anglian rectory are as readable as ever. Up-to-date, in several items, they are not; the changes in local government and in various other matters have rendered obsolete some of the author's remarks; but on the social side the essays remain of great interest. Existence is not necessarily cramped because one is cut off from the excitements of London, and, as is humorously indicated, there lies a gulf of difference between isolation and loneliness. The microcosm of village life may contain all the elements which go to make the larger world, and the observant eye of the resident perceives much that to the mere visitor is altogether unknown.

The author has not a very high opinion of the peasants of this part of England, and he sums up their character in none too tender a fashion; but this does not prejudice his innate kindness of heart. "I, for one," he writes, "hereby proclaim and declare that I intend to help the sick and aged and struggling poor whenever I have the chance, and as far as I have the means, and I hope the day will never come when I shall cease to think with shame of him who is said to have made it his boast that he had never given a beggar a penny in his life."

I am free to confess (he proceeds) that I draw the line somewhere. I do draw the line at the tramp—I do find it necessary to be uncompromising there. Indeed, I keep a big dog for the tramp, and that dog, inasmuch as he passes his happy life in a country parsonage—that dog, I say, is not muzzled.

We get many glimpses into the narrowness and the peculiarity of the rustic outlook, some pathetic, others which we hardly know whether to describe as pathetic or humorous. Said one old countrywoman, who had been married five times, when asked if she didn't "mix up" her husbands now and then if talking about them:

"Well, to tell you the truth, sir, I really du! But my third husband, he was a man! I don't mix him up. He got killed, fighting—you've heard tell o' that I make no doubt. The others warn't nothing to him. He'd ha' mixed them up quick enough if they'd interfered wi' him. Lawk ah! He'd 'a' made nothing of 'em!"

We are pleased to find a long and pertinent protest against the indiscriminate "restoration" of these splendid country churches. The essential difference between restoration and preservation is insisted upon—a difference which many experimentalists in architecture seem to ignore:

You can't reproduce the carvings you are going to remove—you have no eye for the delicate and simple curves; your chisels are so highly tempered that they are your masters, not your servants; they run away with you when you set to work, and insist on turning out sharply-cut cusps, all of the same size, all of them smitten with the blight of sameness, all of them straddling, shallow, sprawling, vulgar, meaningless; melancholy witnesses against you that you have lost touch with the living past.

Let it be enacted that, whosoever he may be . . . who shall be convicted of driving a nail into a rood-screen or removing a sepulchral slab, of digging up the bones of the dead to make a hole for a heating apparatus, bricking up an ancient doorway or hacking out an aperture for a new organ, or scraping off the ancient plaster from walls that were plastered five hundred years ago—anyone, I say, who shall do any of these acts, if he have committed such an offence without the license of a duly constituted authority, shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanour and sent to prison without the option of a fine.

The author also pleads strongly for a rearrangement of our system of keeping county and ecclesiastical records, urging that instead of being interned in lawyers' offices, London chambers, or whatever it may be, they should be centralised and rendered accessible in the various cathedrals of the country—an alteration which would have its advantages if a system of indexing could be arrived at, as anyone will know who has spent a week muniment-hunting for some special purpose.

The literary style of the book approaches too nearly to the colloquial or conversational at times to be wholly satisfactory, but it is on an average good, and the reader interested in village life and in speculations on subjects akin to churches and church management will thoroughly enjoy the volume.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE KING'S ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The reasons given by the authors of "The King's English" in defence of their bad syntax are insufficient and unconvincing. Their letter in THE ACADEMY of the 30th ult. has, by the way, a certain resemblance to the leg of mutton off which Dr. Johnson dined on one occasion while travelling from London to Oxford, and now that they have disposed of all the points which I submitted, to their evident satisfaction, I may be allowed to submit one more passage from that same lumbering letter. Here it is: ". . . indulgent enough to refer our condemnation to the very common abuse . . ." I should correct that phrase in a boy's essay thus: ". . . to refer to our condemnation of, etc., but doubtless 'The Authors' will have some subtle but unavailing defence for their words as they stand."

I would respectfully point out to "The Authors" that the quotation which they give from Macaulay in his chapter dealing with the Rye House Plot, viz.: "Great hopes were entertained at Whitehall that Cornish would appear . . ." does not support their contention. Plurality is understood here. The hope of each individual partisan of James II. from an influential quarter amounted to "great hopes." Macaulay uses hope and hopes, each in its proper place, and he would not be likely to say that he had "considerable hopes." Where Macaulay here uses "hopes" one can feel the surge of the multitude. Shakespeare is equally correct in his use of hope and hopes—e.g., "I have hope to live, and am prepared to die."—Measure for Measure, Act III., Scene I. "Was the hope drunk wherein you dress'd yourself?"—Macbeth, Act I., Scene VII.

"His bark is stoutly timber'd, and his pilot

Of very expert and approved allowance:

Therefore my hopes, not surfeited to death,

Stand in bold cure."—Othello, Act II., Scene I.

Cassio's hopes for the safety of the Moor rest firstly in the stoutly-built ship, and secondly in the excellent judgment of the pilot.

I am still convinced that "The Authors" did not express themselves in good English when they wrote ". . . but we have considerable hopes that no one else has been deceived." "The Authors," in defence of their use of deceived, quote Froude as follows: "Wolsey . . . was too wise to be deceived with outward prosperity." The word is quite properly used here. "Outward prosperity" is an abstract condition touching society in general. The phrase logically considered has great extension. "The Authors" used the word deceived in a concrete sense, touching a point of personal rectitude which was not in question. Despite what "The Authors" say, I am convinced that the phrase which I submitted, viz.: but we hope that no one else has been misled, is better English. "The Authors" maintain that they are correct in using the words "seduced into buying . . . a book." I would respectfully suggest to them that the word has become obsolete in the sense in which they use it. It has lost its character through associations with the law courts, and to use it in its original sense is sheer pedantry. In syntax propriety has to be observed; and, despite the ruling of "The Authors," I hold that it would be distinctly improper for anyone to declare that he or she had been seduced into buying a book. If "The Authors" will use ducere let the word be induced.

I would say in conclusion that I have no enmity towards "The Authors." I am told on the best authority that their book has good points, and "The Authors" themselves say in their letter that they "cannot fairly complain if any statement they make is pressed to the utmost."

W. McC.

Glasgow, February 22nd, 1909.

THE SUBTLETY OF SUFFRAGITIS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—As a Conservative, will you allow me to protest against the introduction of a fresh element of discord into the ranks of the party in the shape of an organisation describing itself as a Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association.

As there are already three associations working with unremitting and monomaniacal zeal on behalf of the establishment of petticoat government, the reason for the existence of a fourth is hard to discover. To judge from the nature of the speeches delivered under the presidency of a renegade Radical, at an opening meeting held in the Westminster Palace Hotel, there is not a particle of difference to be found between this latest blossom from off the tree of suffragitis and the branches of which the respective flowers are Mrs. Pankhurst, Mrs. Despard, and Lady Frances Balfour. Upon the basis of the principle now recognised, we may confidently anticipate in the near future the formation of Conservative and Unionist Women's Temperance Associations, Anti-Vivisection Leagues, Anti-Vaccination Leagues, Vegetarian Alliances, Vigilance Leagues, and Faith Healing Associations.

It is high time that the type of Unionist who advocates female suffrage because "it will pay the party" should adduce some evidence in support of his extremely disingenuous statement. At present it is impossible to extract anything from him save reiteration. Like the beaver in the "Hunting of the Snark," he opines that the thing must be true because he has said it thrice. Australia, New Zealand, and Finland have afforded strong proof of the very opposite of his contention, and the fact that the Socialists, not only of this country, but also of France and Germany, are unanimously in favour of the enfranchisement of women should give him pause in his progress towards the shooting of Niagara.

As a sample of the muddle-headedness of the Conservative Suffragette in trousers, nothing can be more illuminating than his opposition to the Licensing Bill. It requires only the most shadowy modicum of an intelligence to perceive that the first use made by women of the franchise would be the abolition of the public-house, yet so hopeless is the density of this would-be strategist that he actually believes that Bung can be balanced on the same string as Mrs. Pankhurst and Mrs. Carrie Nation.

As to the Millite, Ibsenite, and Shavian Conservatives who advocate the conversion of the British Empire into a gynocracy upon abstract grounds, their position is one of an utterly untenable description. There is no room for the supporters of the most revolutionary proposal which has ever been brought forward in the world's history, save with the revolutionary party, and the sooner these befogged politicians range themselves side by side with Mr. Keir Hardie, Mr. Victor Grayson, Mr. Philip Snowden, Mr. "Willie" Redmond, Mr. W. T. Stead, Mr. George B. Shaw, Mr. R. J. Campbell, Mr. Silvester Horne, Mr. Byles (of Bradford), Mr. Isaac Zangwill, and other Socialistic, Hebraic, and Nonconformist feminists, the better it will be for the defining of parties on a clearer and more intelligible basis than exists at present.

F. DALRYMPLE DUNCAN.

"Woodhead," Kirkintilloch.

A PHENOMENAL GENIUS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Caleb Porter: I raised a purely impersonal question affecting our national honour, and for the purpose of enriching our Pantheon with a phenomenal genius—John Martin. This appeal, which should have called forth a generous response, called forth Mr. Porter, who used it to make personal attacks on me. In my last there was a slip of the pen for which I apologise; I spoke of Tintoretto's "Last Judgment" instead of his "Paradise," the picture under discussion. All Mr. Porter's other charges, such as the recklessness of his assertions, I meet with an emphatic denial. With remarkable ingenuity, by means of irrelevant quotations, he hints a series of petty little malicious libels that he would not have dared to utter directly. He hunts over the whole period of my public activity for points that can be twisted to discredit me, and shows the weakness of his position and the strength of his animus. Knowing that his personal misrepresentations must recoil on himself, he attacks my English. While grammarians differ, such charges, like mud, may be thrown at any writer; but until Mr. Porter himself shows a truer sense of style, gives more point with less verbosity, he is out of court. All my scathing charges against the decadents who have brought so much demoralisation into the art world he allows to go by default; he shirks the larger issues, and he cannot rise above personalities which belittle himself more than they do his opponent. He favours me with much advice gratis, forgetting that advice, like charity, should begin at home, and, in his case, stay there.

Distrusting all opinions that agree with, and may be prompted by, my pocket interests, I have sacrificed such interests for a public good. I have never made a personal enemy, but have made many pen-enemies while fighting for good causes, and against injustice; yet for one enemy I make in this way I make a dozen friends; and the glowing letters I have received, even from great writers in America, would compensate me for ten thousand pen-pricks. My crusade against anarchism in the art world is prospering royally, the whole trend of thought is in my direction, critics are taking my standpoint, and artists see that my work was prophetic. My position is founded on root principles: the alternative to these principles is anarchism and blank insanity. I have merely given an advanced reading of them to meet the progressive needs of the time. So for "Modernity" critics to try to upset my position is, as a wag put it, like the action of an insane grasshopper trying to compass the destruction of London by butting its head against the cupola of St. Paul's!

E. WAKE COOK.

[This correspondence must now cease.—ED.]

JONATHAN SWIFT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In your issue of the 13th inst. there appeared an essay on Swift which contained a mis-statement of fact so flagrant that one naturally expected to find some explanation of the lapse in the following issue. But I have looked for it in vain in your number of to-day. The writer of the article asserts that Addison and Sheridan were the warm friends of Swift. Addison was never his warm friend. When Addison left Dublin after his short term of office as Irish Secretary, all the historian can find to say of the relations of the two men is that "Addison escaped without having had any serious quarrel with Swift." While, as to Sheridan: that eminent man was not born until six years after the Dean of St. Patrick's was buried.

I claim the privilege of an old subscriber in pointing out an error the publication of which in a journal of literary criticism occasions some misgiving to the most indulgent reader.

WILLIAM MACKAY.

Oulton Broad, Suffolk,
20th February, 1909.

[In reply to our correspondent we quote from W. J. Courthope's "Addison" in the "English Men of Letters" series:

During his residence in Ireland Addison firmly cemented his friendship with Swift. . . . Swift's admiration for Addison was warm and generous. To Archbishop King he wrote:—"Mr. Addison, who goes over our first secretary, is a most excellent person, and being my intimate friend, I shall use all my credit to set him right in his notions of persons and things." On his side, Addison's feelings were equally warm. He presented Swift with a copy of his "Remarks on Several Parts of Italy," inscribing it: "To the most agreeable companion, the truest friend, and the greatest genius of his age."

As to Sheridan, the reference in our article was, of course, to Sheridan the elder.—ED.]

SCHOPENHAUER AND WAGNER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I thank you for the opportunity to destroy the impression I fear Mr. Ellis has formed that I placed his house in Surrey rather than Sussex out of intentional discourtesy. It was an unnoticed error on my part, for which I willingly apologise.

I cannot see that these pretty paradoxes of Berlioz and Wagner, with regard to a "sounding silence," give moral support to Mr. Ellis' own paradox of clothing the unfleshed soul in a garment of Time. I would like to say that I had, although your correspondent would throw doubt on it, paid due regard to the utterance of Schopenhauer, "True, we can carry out no idea of the above entirely without employing terms of Time. Such terms should be excluded where the Thing-in-itself is concerned (according to his master Kant), only it pertains to the unalterable confines of our intellect that it can never quite dispense with this first and most immediate form of all its operations." Observe that "should." Schopenhauer plainly points to the desirability of excluding the idea of Time from the Thing-in-itself, while frankly recognising the impossibility. Whatever idea we have formed of the Thing-in-itself, in so far as that idea is dependent on Time for its realisation, it is likely to be wrong. If I, like Mr. Ellis, cannot think without an elementary notion of sequence, I can at least deplore that limitation of my intellect rather than acquiesce in, and even feel complacent about it; I can at least say, "If I cannot imagine the Thing-in-itself in its non-phenomenal state, where pleasure will be positive and pain negative, without attributing Time to it, I can nevertheless know that Time is imposed on the conception by my intellect, and that when my particular Thing-in-itself is set free from my particular intellect, it will also be freed from Time." I can go so far as to see it might happen in the sense that there will be no memory of a past time, no anticipation of a future time, no consciousness of a passing of time, but merely an unutterably blissful immovable Now. If we could remember no past and anticipate no future, it is not beyond our power to imagine an everlasting Now! Let me, in turn, direct Mr. Ellis' attention to the following beautiful and most luminous passage from Schopenhauer's "Fragments of the History of Philosophy":—"One can establish a priori respecting all motion in general, no matter of whatever kind it may be, that it is primarily perceptible by the comparison with something resting; whence it follows that the course of time, with all that is in it, could not be perceived were it not for something that has no part in it, and with whose rest we compare its motion. We cannot imagine that if everything in our consciousness at once and together moved forward in the flux of time, that this forward movement would nevertheless be perceptible, but in order to do this we must assume something fixed, past which Time with its content flows." And what else is this innermost "something fixed, past which Time flows," but that very same timeless Thing-in-itself, or Will—of whose "time-possibilities" Mr. Ellis sees fit to speak?

I note Mr. Ellis asks why I assume he does not suffer from eyestrain. The retort is obvious.

Mr. Ellis is not a pessimist, ergo, Mr. Ellis does not suffer from eyestrain!

J. T. PRESSLIE.

5 Edith Road, Peckham, S.E.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The subject of Schopenhauer and Wagner having come up in your columns, will you kindly allow me to put a question to Mr. Ellis for the express purpose of obtaining from him a public answer which elsewhere failed to be recorded. It is this: What in his Wagner "Life" does Mr. Ellis mean, in Schopenhauerian parlance, by the "immediate appearance of the will"? This question is not put to raise any further controversy; but, for present purposes, to allow of the answer appearing either in accord or in disagreement with what I take to be Schopenhauer's meaning, please allow the following quotations. They are from the philosopher's first volume of "World as Will": "Appearance (Erscheinung) is object for the intellect (Vorstellung) and nothing else besides. Every object for the intellect, no matter of what kind, is appearance. The thing-in-itself, on the other hand, is solely will. As such, it absolutely is no object presentable to the intellect, but toto genere different from it. The will is that of which every intellectual object, the appearance, the visibility, is the objectivation." (Sec. 21.) "The will, as thing-in-itself, is wholly different from its appearance, and completely free from all of its forms, which precisely, first on appearing, it takes on." (Sec. 23.) "This thing-in-itself, which as such is never object, purely because every object is anew its mere appearance, no longer itself, must, should still it be thought of objectively, borrow the name and conception of an object, of something, in one way or another, given objectively, and in consequence from one of its appearances. But in order to serve as an explanatory point, this ought to be nothing else than the most finished among all of its appearances—i.e., the most explicit, the most unveiled, and directly illumined by knowledge. Now this is precisely the will of the individual." (Sec. 22.) "The knowledge which I have of my will, although immediate, is not, however, to be separated from that of my body. . . This will, apart from my body, I cannot really present to my intellect." (Sec. 18.) "Therefore, here to us the body is the immediate object—i.e., that object for the intellect (Vorstellung) which affords the subject's knowledge its point of departure." (Sec. 6.) "My body and my will are one—or, what I term my body as object perceptible to the intellect (Vorstellung) I call my will, in so far as I am conscious of it by a wholly different method comparable with none other; or, my body is the objectivation of my will." (Sec. 18.)

DAVID IRVINE.

National Liberal Club,
21st February, 1909.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

A Bishop in the Rough. Edited by the Rev. D. Wallace Duthie. With a preface by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Norwich. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.

Samuel Pepys: Administrator, Observer, Gossip. E. Hallam Moorhouse. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.

Eliza Brightwen; The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson. With an introduction by Edmund Gosse. Unwin, 5s. net.

The Gate of Death: A Diary. Arthur Christopher Benson. Smith, Elder, 6s. net.

FICTION

Sandford of Merton. Belinda Blinders. Edited by Desmond Coke. Chapman & Hall, 2s. net.

Lil of the Slums. Dick Donovan. Laurie, 6s.

The Dukedom of Portsea. Alice Maud Meadows. Laurie, 6s.

The Happy Elopement. E. H. Lacon Watson. Brown Laugham, 6s.

The Innocence of Isobel. Winifred Wynne. Sisley's, 6s.

The Firing Line. Robert W. Chambers. D. Appleton and Company, 6s.

The Greater Power. Harold Bindloss. John Long, 6s.

Noblesse Oblige. M. E. Francis. John Long, 6s.

The World, the Flesh, and the Casino. Gertrude Warden. John Long, 6s.

Life in a Garrison Town. Lieutenant Bilse. Lane, 1s. net.

Someone Pays. Noel Barwell. Lane, 6s.

The Merry Heart. Frank A. Swinterton. Chatto and Windus, 6s.

Seekers: A Romance of the Balkans. Frank Saville. Arnold, 6s.

Daphne in Fitzroy Street. E. Nesbit. Allen, 6s.

Thou Shalt Not. Newman Harding. Milne, 6s.

Banzai. Parabellum. Paul, 6s.

The Leveller. A Musical Romance by Alexander McArthur. Paul, 6s.

JUVENILE

Books for Young Readers: The Three Monkeys; The Story of a Cat; The Two Parrots. George Bell, 6d. each.

MISCELLANEOUS

Ladies, Fair and Frail; Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century. Horace Bleachley. Lane, 12s. 6d. net.

Natural Monopolies. In Relation to Social Democracy. Charles Derwent Smith. Fifield, 2s. 6d. net.

The Poor Law Report of 1909. Helen Bosanquet. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.

The Economic Interpretation of History. Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers, 2s. 6d. net.

Russia's Message; The true World Import of the Revolution. William English Walling. Fifield, 12s. 6d. net.

The Public Health Agitation, 1833-1834. B. L. Hutchins. Fifield, 2s. 6d. net.

The Economy and Training of Memory. Henry J. Watt. Arnold, 1s. 6d. net.

St. Nicotine of the Peace Pipe. Edward Vincent Heward. Routledge, 5s.

Heat and Other Forces. Colonel W. F. Badgley. Routledge, 5s. net.

The Fallacy of Speed. Thomas F. Taylor. Fifield, 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

God With Us: A Study in Religious Idealism. W. N. Boyce Gibson. Black.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

DARTMOOR.—BOARDING-IN, PRIVATE HOUSE; Men only from November to March; very suitable for reading parties; lovely country, warm, and sheltered position.—Apply "CANTAB," Middlecote, Ilminster, S. Devon.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS, &c.
32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.
NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.
AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
DIRECTORIES.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 50s. net, for 32s. Bartholomew's Survey Gazetteer British Isles, 17s. 6d. net, for 5s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale

THE ART OF GARDEN DESIGN IN ITALY, by Inigo Triggs; 73 Photographic Plates in Collo type, 27 Plans and numerous Sketches in the Text; 4to, buckram; published Longmans, 1906, at £3 13s. 6d. net; for 21s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE FORTUNE PLAYHOUSE,
41 Brewer Street, W.

MADAME DE PERROT
WILL GIVE

FIVE LECTURES (IN ENGLISH)
ON FRIDAY EVENINGS, AT 8.15.

March 5. Héloïse and Abélard.

.. 12. Mademoiselle de Lespinasse and d'Alembert.

.. 19. Madame de Staël and Benjamin Constant.

.. 26. Madame George Sand and Alfred de Musset.

April 2. Madame de Récarnier and Chateaubriand.

Subscription Tickets, 21s. and 10s. 6d.; Single Tickets, 5s., 2s. 6d., and 1s.; of the usual Agents and Chappell & Co., Ltd., 50 New Bond Street, W.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The READING ROOMS will be CLOSED from MONDAY, MARCH 1st, to THURSDAY, MARCH 4th, inclusive.

E. MAUNDE THOMPSON,
Director and Principal Librarian.

British Museum,
24th February, 1909.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIATHE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE FEBRUARY BOOK MONTHLY

WHICH IS NOW ON SALE, 6d. NET,
CONTAINS A SYMPOSIUM BY THE
LEADING PUBLISHERS ON WHY THE
WINTER PUBLISHING SEASON WAS
BAD. THIS IS A MATTER WHICH
INTERESTS WRITERS AND READERS
ALSO, AND THEY SHOULD MAKE A
POINT OF READING THE SYMPOSIUM.

Publishers of the "Book Monthly," SIMPKIN, MARSHALL
& CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

LORD ROSEBERY
MR. BENJAMIN KIDD
AND
PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Wardens, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London E.C.

Specimens free on application.

From Everett & Co.'s List

NEW FICTION.

MRS. WHISTON'S HOUSE PARTY

By THOMAS COBB.

THE DEVIL'S ACE

By FERGUS HUME.

"A 'mystery' novel of the first water."—Western Mail.

FELIX STONE

By A. & C. ASKEW.

THE DEGENERATE

By FRED WHISHAW.

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON.

"The Iron Heel" is a book for all to read, and its insight, large sympathy, clear reasoning, and high aims are in evidence in every chapter."

Fall Mall Gazette.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"A justifiable attack on those who seek to honour God by dishonouring His methods. . . . Miss Graham tells the story with charm and pathos."

Daily Telegraph.

"Deserves the attention it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM.

"Mr. Wyndham at his best."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Wyndham always writes of military life as one who knows it, and his slight sketches of officers are happy and unexaggerated."—Globe.

London: EVERETT & Co., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

A GREAT novel in GREAT demand is PRIESTS OF PROGRESS

By G. COLMORE. (Second Edition.)

It throws a searching ray of light on a great public question.

The SPECTATOR says: "The book is powerfully written, and its subject demands attention."

DID SHE DO RIGHT?

By A. J. MACDONNELL.

A Story of Modern Rome and a Mixed Marriage.

FIRST TWO OPINIONS.

"An interesting romance. The authoress's pictures of present-day life in Rome are excellent."—BIRMINGHAM POST.

"The characterisation is on broad lines and is quite effective, while the plot runs merrily through 400 pages."—MANCHESTER COURIER.

THE BROKEN SNARE

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN.

A powerful, psychological study of the marriage relation by a new writer, portraying the struggle and ultimate surrender of a man and woman of high ideals who do not believe in the marriage ceremony. "Beautifully and brilliantly written."

TOM GALLON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN

READY NEXT WEEK at all Libraries and Booksellers.

OTHER NEW 6/- NOVELS.

THE TRICKSTER . . . G. B. Burgin.

THE LEVELLER . . . Alexander McArthur.

THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE

E. Everett Green.

BANZAI! . . . "Parabellum."

AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE. Richard Duffy.

ANOTHER LARGE EDITION NOW READY.

THE DEVIL IN LONDON, by Geo. R. Sims. 1s. 3d.

London: STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community.

Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net.

A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 82 2s. net. [Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.d., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

{ Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST

Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century

By G. HERMINE MARIUS.

Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS, with a Photogravure and 130 Reproductions in Half Tone.

Royal 8vo, panelled cloth gilt, 15s. net.

The Author of this work—herself an artist—is well known in Holland as a critic of great individuality. Her studies of Ruskin, the three brothers Maris, and her book on Rembrandt have been much appreciated for their sound judgment, a quality not always allied to such enthusiasm as she displays in dealing with her subject.

OLD LONDON

A Series of Fifty Reproductions of Old Engravings Illustrative of the London of our Ancestors.

Compiled by WALTER L. McNAY.

Large 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"Architects and readers of antiquarian tastes will take note of Mr. McNay's 'Old London' The Plates are extremely interesting and carefully reproduced."—Westminster Gazette.

"Old London" is a book which will appeal to all lovers of old prints."—Daily Mail.

THE ESSAYS OF MEREJKOWSKI

Translated from the Russian by G. A. MOUNSEY.

Fcap. 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net each.

THE LIFE-WORK OF HENDRIK IBSEN.
THE LIFE-WORK OF PLINY THE YOUNGER.
THE LIFE-WORK OF MONTAIGNE.
THE LIFE-WORK OF CALDERON.
THE LIFE-WORK OF FLAUBERT.
MARCUS AURELIUS. Just Published.

Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A MANUAL OF COSTUME, AS ILLUSTRATED BY MONUMENTAL BRASSES. By HERBERT DRUITT.

Indispensable handbook for all interested in Brasses and Costume and Mediæval Archæology.

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo. 8s.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

By Professor H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH. With diagrams. Square 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each. Sold separately.

These books are intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. For this purpose they will be found a valuable aid to a practical working knowledge of the German language. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the reading examples and diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments will help to fix the names in the memory.

MY LITTLE FRENCH FRIENDS.

By LINA OSWALD. Containing many Illustrations by JEAN BAKEWELL and others, also from Photographs. Demy 8vo, cloth. 2s.

A First book in French written in everyday speech and containing songs with simple music, as well as stories and verse. This is issued uniform with "Little German Folk."

A complete Catalogue will be sent on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD.

The De La More Press, 32 George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

Macmillan's New Books

LORD AVEBURY'S NEW BOOK.

Peace and Happiness.

By LORD AVEBURY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Lincoln College, Oxford, Author of "The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic," &c. With Map and Plans. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Ancient Greek Historians

(Harvard Lectures). By J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Mars as the Abode of Life.

By PERCIVAL LOWELL, A.B., LL.D., Author of "Mars and its Canals," &c. Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Jimbo. A Fantasy. By ALGERNON

BLACKWOOD. With Decorated Half-Titles to Chapters. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This is a striking study of the mind of an imaginative child during consciousness, and also through a period of physical unconsciousness. It is remarkable for its beautiful descriptive passages, its weird suggestions, and its fine implied teaching of sympathy and courage and truth.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

TONO-BUNGAY.

The Standard.—"It is the best book that Mr. Wells has written, and it carries the English novel a stage further in its history."

By H. G. WELLS.

One Immortality. By H. FIELDING HALL,

Author of "The Soul of a People," &c.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

ORDER FROM YOUR LIBRARY

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

[Ready March 4]

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only pathos from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

[Ready March 4]

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

THE CENTURY PRESS, 6-9 Surrey St., Strand, London.

NEW BOOKS at the BODLEY HEAD

ON THE TRACK OF LIFE.

The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of LEO. G. SERA by J. M. KENNEDY, with an introduction by DR. OSCAR LEVY. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Sera is a physician who has deeply studied literature and historical science, and the object of his book is, in the opening words of the preface, "to establish our conception of social life on its original basis." He holds that the diffusion of democratic principles is vulgarising science and art, and that present social conditions, especially work and Christian teaching, are leading to the intellectual and moral degeneration of the race.

A SISTER OF PRINCE RUPERT: Elizabeth Princess Palatine, Abbess of Herford.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY, Author of "English Children in the Olden Time," &c. With numerous Illustrations Reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"No historical biography published during the last few years surpasses this one in the minuteness of its research and the width of the field it has covered."

BRITISH MALAYA.

An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. By SIR F. A. SWETTENHAM. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ASPECTS OF MODERN OPERA.

By LAWRENCE GILMAN, Author of "Phases of Modern Music," "Strauss," "Salome," "The Music of To-morrow, and Other Studies," "Edward MacDowell," &c. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH.

Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Nephew of THOMAS CARLYLE, Editor of "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," "New Letters of Thomas Carlyle," &c. With Two Portraits in Colour and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 2 vols. 25s. net.

These are the letters that passed between Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh from the time of their first meeting in May, 1821, until their marriage in October, 1826. There are in all 176 letters, arranged chronologically in the form of "letter and answer." The account of the courtship contained in these letters is more fascinating than a romance. They are brilliant and pathetic by turn, wise and witty; light and grave; and they tell for the first time the story of the early association of this remarkable pair, and the influence of one character upon the other is clearly indicated. [Ready shortly.]

UNDER PETRAIA, With Some Saunterings.

By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Globe.—"Purely conversational in style as this book is, it possesses that indefinable literary charm which holds fast the reader who has once opened its pages, so that he cannot put it down till he has reached the end. Even then it will be taken up again and again, to be dipped into here and there as the fancy seizes us."

Daily Telegraph.—"The kindliness and geniality of the whole thing are irresistible. . . . It recalls the spirit of Borrow, to whom sun, moon, and stars were all good things."

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL.

Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century. By HORACE BLEACKLEY, Author of "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess." With numerous Portraits Reproduced from Contemporary Sources. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE: During a Tour on the Continent upon its Reopening after the Fall of Napoleon, 1814.

Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A FOOL OF QUALITY.

Or the History of Henry Earl of Moreland.

By HENRY BROOKE (1703-1783). With an Introduction by FRANCIS COUTTS. 2 vols. (New Pocket Library.) Leather, 4s. net. Cloth, 2s. net.

MARIA EDGEWORTH and Her Circle in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon.

By CONSTANCE HILL. Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," "The House in St. Martin's Street," etc. With numerous Illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

Miss Hill's new book deals with episodes in the life of Maria Edgeworth during the first twenty years of last century, for the development of which much unpublished material has been acquired. [Ready shortly.]

MADRID.

An Historic and Descriptive Account of the Spanish Capital, with 450 Illustrations. By A. F. CALVERT. (The Spanish Series). 3s. 6d. net. [Ready shortly.]

JOHN LANE'S NOVELS FOR 1909

"Youth, with its sunlit, passionate eyes,
And ruseful velvet skin,
A plea to cancel a thousand lies
Or a thousand nights of sin."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH

A NEW AND STRIKING NOVEL BY ALICE HERBERT

YOUTH—with its hopes and despairs, its loves and griefs, its triumphs and disappointments, its illusions and revelations—is the theme of Mrs. Herbert's daring novel. Francie finds his illusions destroyed, his idols with feet of clay, and his wife a mere doll, to whom he proposed in the glamour of the moment. Still, through everything he preserves his faith in the ultimate fitness of things, and the novel's close finds him "blistered and buffeted, unbuffed still."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH

A NEW AND STRIKING NOVEL BY ALICE HERBERT

ON SALE EVERYWHERE. SIX SHILLINGS.

LITTLE DINNERS WITH THE SPHINX.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. 6s.

Observer.—"It is the quaintest, oddest conceit, told with an enchanting simplicity."

BALTHASAR.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. A Translation by Mrs. JOHN LANE. 6s.

Being Vol. VI. of the Works of Anatole France in English.

SOMEONE PAYS.

By NOEL BARWELL. 6s.

LANE'S SHILLING LIBRARY.

LIFE IN A GARRISON TOWN: The Suppressed German Novel. By Ex-Lieutenant F. O. BILSE.

DEAR FATHERLAND. By F. O. BILSE.

A WHIRL ASUNDER.

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

"A very enjoyable book; unconventional in its treatment and revolutionary in its plot. The present popular edition should have a wide circulation."—Irish Independent.

With Illustrated Paper Covers, 1s. net each.

JOHN LANE - THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1922

MARCH 6, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent 'to sleep' with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

'A second sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at the Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His votresses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and hands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!

But, spite of them, the music's very nice.

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each. 2/6

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. MYNART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDARIUM LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 154x114. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghostly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.
"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 2s. net.

"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little to call to mind of his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbedness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.]
"The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of great poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."
First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 2s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HAZON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.

"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge its merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrain-spinners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.
"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TASSER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 2s. net.

"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bisleghie.
"Had Browning written pieces instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.

"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a whoddy. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EORRIS CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EORRIS LYTTELTON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"A little play of a poor cottager, father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions."

"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by the adulteries of art that take the eye and not the heart. Mr. Lyttelton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.]
"These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.
"His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearian quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 2s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EORRIS CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 5s. net.

"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GRIMMOND. With Cover-design by ARTHUR O. STANTON. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.

"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.

"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 2s. net.

"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. . . . They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.

"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.

"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musie.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 2s. net.

"An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman."

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 2s. net.

"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.

Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.

"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TYSON.

"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

GEDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

YOK OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page	Page
Life and Letters 843	American Universities . . . 850
A Dedication 845	Psychic Philosophy 851
Tono Wells 845	Shorter Reviews 852
Poppycock and Sniggs . 847	An Outdoor Breviary—
The Common Sky 848	II.— 854
The Revision of the	Correspondence 856
Prayer Book 849	Books Received 858

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

The Cambridge Review announced last week that the ex-editor of the Granta would reply to Lord Alfred Douglas's strictures on the Granta's editorial methods in the next issue of the Cambridge Review. The reply of the ex-editor of the Granta has duly appeared, and it proves to be not a reply at all, but a sheer libel upon Lord Alfred Douglas. Writs are being issued upon the printers and upon the ex-editor of the Granta to-day. Meanwhile, the publisher, Mr. Elijah Johnson, of Trinity Street, Cambridge, has telegraphed to us as follows:

Yesterday early closing. No more sold after wire. All being called in.

ELIJAH JOHNSON.

We make no comment; but we desire that Editors who may have received review copies of the Cambridge Review should take notice of the above-mentioned facts.

Our recent remarks respecting the poetry of our literary contemporaries appear to be gravely resented. We are flooded with correspondence on the subject, but we remain unmoved and unshaken in the position we have assumed. In no instance do the angry friends of the "poets" concerned take it upon themselves to assert over their names that our comments are unjustifiable. On the other hand, their plea is that the blemishes to which we have objected are blemishes which occur in the writings of Shakespeare and Pope and Keats and "other English poets," the which, of course, is not argument. Shakespeare can be proved to have concluded passages of blank verse with a rhymed couplet. Shakespeare happens to have been in a position to do what he liked. We shall not humour the ribald by asserting that he was wrong in this particular. But if Binks adorns blank verse with rhymed couplets in the Outlook it will be very awkward for Binks. A correspondent, for whom we have the sincerest respect, informs us that after reading "our words" as to the dissyllablizing of "hour" and "our" he "at once took down from his shelves volumes of Pope and Cowper, of Shelley and Tennyson, and had no difficulty in finding numerous examples of this rhyme." And immediately he goes on to beg the question as follows: "But it should be noted that although 'hour' may rhyme with 'power' as it does in the Dunciad (IV., 627-628), we have here no dissyllablization of 'power,' as is clearly shown by the spelling 'pow'r' in the older editions." Which merely proves what we have asserted—namely, that a person who rhymes "power" with "hour" is doing his best to dissyllablize "hour." Our correspondent adds that "words ending in -ower can never be dissyllabic when ending a line in Pope's heroic verse." We quite agree; but it happens that Pope was careful always to elide the "e" in -ower, which indicates plainly that Pope knew what he was about. Another correspondent, who is a distinguished authority on metrical matters, asserts that "hour," while not a dissyllabic word, is a word of rather more than one syllable, and that its value is a syllable and a half. This is a point; but for ourselves "half a syllable" is a refinement which suggests hair-splitting, though of course a syllable is really capable of division. Yet when all is said, one and a-half is not two, and the inferior poet who wishes to rhyme words ending in -ower with "hour" should, in our opinion, take Pope's precaution and elide his "e"'s. The general disposition to quote the slips of genius as justification for the muddleheadedness and ignorance of mediocrity does not amuse us in the least, inasmuch as it is sophistry and wickedness. One of the major weaknesses of the modern poet is that he happens to be born idle. The gentleman who wrote in the Saturday Review:

When she-goats begged from Jove a beard,
The he-goats sad began to rage,
Because their dignity they feared
Would rivalled be by female sage—might readily have avoided "he-goats sad," "because their dignity they feared" and "would rivalled be" if he had taken the smallest pains. Little boys at school are quite properly birched for this kind of slackness, and it certainly ought not to be forgiven in a presumably full-grown "man of letters." Neither should editors who lend themselves to the promulgation of such illiteracy be forgiven. The Saturday Review has a great reputation behind it. The unthinking take it for an authority, and we can well imagine that on being reproved for writing "rivalled be," the indolent versifier of the next generation may cite the Saturday Review of February 20th, 1909, for his justification. It will be just as reasonable of him so to cite Mr. Hodge's illiterate sheet as it is reasonable, in people who should know better, to cite Keats and Tennyson in justification of equally obvious illiteracies.

Messrs. Odhams, the printers, appear to be frantically desirous of dissociating themselves with John Bull in the proprietorial sense. They have sent us a letter in which they assert that they have no proprietary interest in either John Bull or the Guardian. We never supposed for a moment, and we never suggested, that Odhams, Ltd., hold shares in John Bull, Ltd. But we have invited Messrs. Odhams to assure us in writing that the principals in their firm are not shareholders in John Bull, Ltd., and as they have failed to give us this assurance we shall continue to assume that Mr. Odhams, senior, and Mr. Elias—a director of John Bull, Ltd., by the way—are in point of fact sufficiently interested in John Bull and sufficiently interested in each other to warrant our paragraph of last week. Meanwhile, we have again to note that the rejected of Deptford and Bagdad would still appear to have failed to muster up enough grace to apologise to Field Marshal Earl Roberts, K.G., who happens to be of Kandahar and other more heroic places than either Deptford or Bagdad, and who has a son whom he loved buried in a region called South Africa. When Vivian and Bottomley manage to do something for their country, instead of for themselves, they may begin to carp viciously at their elders and betters. There are times when an apology becomes "cleverer" men than either of them.

The March number of the English Review contains an article entitled "The Source of Information." The article is signed, but we shall not mention the author's name, because his friends are quite capable of making a sufficient show with it in articles of their own. The editor of the English Review, in collusion no doubt with our wonderful author, has interspersed the article with rows of black "quads," and appends the following cryptic footnote:

This article by Mr. —, which we print after submitting it to a censorship mindful of the Law of Libel, contained certain accusations against certain public persons—accusations which we believe to be true. Mr. — was exceedingly unwilling that we should publish his article without these accusations. In order to prove that he, at least, has the courage of his convictions, we have adopted the form in which the article at present appears. We do this the more willingly since it demonstrates how in this country the Law of Libel aids that very obscuring of facts to which Mr. — refers—that obscuring of facts which is the most serious of modern tendencies."

The editor of the English Review is an ingenious young person, and in this footnote he over-reaches himself as ingenious young persons will.

We do not doubt for a moment that "The Source of Information" has been written out of a sort of sincerity. "In general," says the author, "the whole mass of public information on which Englishmen depend for the nourishment of public opinion has long been, and is now everywhere admitted to be, tarnished at the source. We do not get a true picture of the world in which we live. We get a picture which now warps, now enflames our imagination, which breeds sudden fanaticisms upon petty things and a dulness upon important things." This is the truth and the obvious truth. As it stands it bears reference in the main to political matters. But it applies with equal and probably greater force to literary affairs—a fact which seems utterly to have escaped the minds of the author of the article and his enterprising editor. In his footnote, as we have seen, Mr. Hueffer assures us that the article "has been submitted to a censorship mindful of the Law of Libel, and that, in consequence, certain charges against public persons—which charges could be substantiated—have been blacked out. In the first place, we should like to remind Mr. Hueffer that, if it comes to sheer law, practically all expressions of adverse opinion on all subjects are libellous. To take an example: A writes a book; B reviews it, and in the course of his review remarks that A's book is a bad book, that A is a clumsy and incompetent writer, and that, before he adventures on publication again, he should furbish up his grammar and endeavour to make himself acquainted with the elements of his subject. This is done every day; yet a lawyer will tell you that it is libel. Of course, if you are an unreasoning person you will be frightened by the lawyer's pronouncement and proceed solemnly to blue-pencil B's review. You may argue that what B has said is true, but there is a saw to the effect that the greater the truth the greater the libel—and there you are again. It is open to any man to issue on any other man a writ for libel, even if the other man has praised him rather than blamed him. If you say in print, or otherwise publish, of one Jones, that he lives at Surbiton, or, for that matter, at Mayfair, Jones may, if it so pleases him, issue his writ. The consequence is that, when you apply to the average solicitor for an opinion as to possible literary or journalistic libels, the solicitor invariably assures you that your article is "full of libels," and that he would advise you to take them out. And because they have suffered from time to time through the absolute inability of many editors to distinguish between severe criticism and actual libel, the printers—and no editor can move without printers—invariably keep their nerves in a fine state of rawness on the subject, and every now and again offer you legal advice and admonishment free, gratis and for nothing. So that, on the whole, the editor not over-blessed with backbone, has a harrowing time of it, and he is apt to suppose that it is quite impossible for him ever to be able to say what ought to be said about this, that or the other person who happens to be a clear enemy of the public interest.

Of the relations of the English Review and the persons who write the English Review with political affairs we know nothing. Politically considered, the English Review appears to be very mild indeed, though dangerous, in the sense that it is tainted with Socialism; and as to the persons who write the English Review a serious publicist possibly winks at the thought of them. But, on the other hand, the English Review has already and most palpably cast in its lot with a group of authors and journalists who delight, we believe, in being known generally as "intellectuals" and who appear to us to be engaged—consciously or subconsciously—in the flagrant obscuration of literary opinion and the "tarnishing of public information" upon literary matters at the source. In effect they have introduced into journalism and into letters the principle of party. Quite a number of them are either soft-shelled and ingrained Socialists or pretenders to Socialistic beliefs for business purposes. And while letters and Socialism are as the poles asunder, your "intellectuals" make a point of basing the whole range of their pronouncements as to contemporary writing on the rough and rotten plank of Socialistic intention. Mr. Tifts, for example, writes a "novel" in which he expresses idiotic and, it may be, libidinous views about marriage. In his spare moments Mr. Tifts happens to be a Socialist or a hanger-on of some Socialist club or society, or a gratuitous contributor to some Socialist magazine. Consequently it is quite impossible for the "intellectuals" to whisper "bo" to his goose of a book. Not only so, but they must needs encourage Tifts by assuring the world that he is a "fine" author and probably "our only great novelist"; that his silliness is wisdom and his libidinousness courage. Of course, we do not propose to say that the English Review has actually embraced these methods. But there can be no doubt that its sympathies are with the "intellectuals" and that the methods we have indicated are the methods of the "intellectuals."

The English Review would have us believe that the journalism of to-day is gagged by the libel laws. We say that this is not so. We have proved in THE ACADEMY that the Law of Libel cannot prevent an honest expression of opinion, or an honest and even severe statement of hard facts about any person or any company of persons. The law of libel is not intended to protect either fools or rogues, and no honest journalist need take it into his calculations for a moment. The man who goes before an English judge and jury with a request for damages for libel must have milk-white hands and exceedingly well-washed milk-white hands. If you know that his hands are dirty, and particularly if he has himself proved by his own acts or words that his hands are dirty, the Law of Libel is a dead letter. But you must be sure of your man. Furthermore, you must not reprove or expose him for the mere sake of reproving or exposing him, and, above all, you must not bear him malice. It is very seldom the attack which provokes a libel action. Ordinarily it is the reply to the attack. Here is your smug literary charlatan, full of beans and "bounce." On a day you point out his more pronounced blemishes in sharp and explicit language. He knows that you have spoken the truth about him and he immediately falls into a violent soapy-fits kind of rage. To your suggestion that he cannot rhyme properly, or that his verses are derived, or that his friends scratch his back when they call him poet, or that his novel, while pretending to be written in the interests of art or high morality, is really a bid for the financial support of the garbage-lover, he replies with paragraphs in which, out of sheer rage and without the slightest reference to facts, he accuses you of as many criminal offences as he can remember. And this, of course, is where the libel comes in. Your lawyers explain it to him, and down he goes on his silly knees like a smacked baby. If the accusations which Mr. So-and-So has brought against "certain public persons" in the English Review are, in the elegant language of the editor of the English Review, "true" the English Review's chaos of "quads" amount to so much cowardice. And if Mr. So-and-So will send these accusations to the editor of THE ACADEMY with proof and substantiation for them we will undertake to print them in the teeth of all the lawyers in Norfolk Street. It must be noted, however, that the editor of the English Review is guarded in his assertions as to truth. He says not "accusations which are true"; but "accusations which we believe to be true." It may be, of course, that this is a mere rotundity of phrasing and that the editor is in possession of the proofs. But if he is not so fortified his beautiful black "quads," and his undignified tremors before the Law of Libel, are quite superfluous. For, clearly, not even an editor should make accusations which he is not in a position to substantiate.

Apart from all questions of libel, the average scribbler indulges in a great amount of cant about criticism. This is because he sets friendship and the desire to please above all other literary considerations. When he, for his part, goes out of his way to praise and exalt the middling writings of somebody whom he calls friend, he expects that friend always to praise and extol the writings of his friend's friend, or, in other words, the writings of himself. It is high treason to condemn or, for that matter, even to hint at the metrical blemishes of the poet whom you happen to have met at dinner. And it is arson, embezzlement, petty larceny and murder in the first degree to say a single unflattering word of the man who once gave you a "kindly" and altogether over-laudatory paragraph in his obscure literary column. The name of one Lucius Junius Brutus is remembered with respect amongst schoolboys because, in the interests of justice he "attended at the execution of his own sons." A Judge of the High Court would be applauded for sending his brother to penal servitude for fraud or manslaughter. But if your friend outrages the Muses, and you fail to find a flaw in the indictment and dismiss him without a stain on his literary character, you are a brute and an ingrate and no gentleman. Fortunately, literary turpitude is not quite a hanging matter. If it were the executioner might make himself exceedingly busy. As for the common view of the Law of Libel—tut!

A DEDICATION

WHAT shall I say, what word, what cry recall,
What god invoke, what star, what amulet,
To make a sonnet pay a hopeless debt,
Or bind a wing'd heart with a madrigal?
Weak words are vainer than no words at all:
The barrier of flesh divides us yet;
Your spirit, like a bird caught in a net,
Beats ever an impenetrable wall.

This is my book, and there as in a glass,
Darkly beheld, the shadow of my mind
Wavers and flickers like a flame of fire.
So through your eyes, it may be, it will pass,
And I shall hold my wild shy bird confined
In the gold cage of shadowless desire.

A. D.

HORACE

BOOK III. ODE 13.

O WELL, whose waters as the crystal shine
Bandusia, worthy vintage to be shed,
And not without a flower visited,
A kid with swelling brow to-morrow is thine,
Whose horns to war and wantonness destine
In vain; in vain, for his dark blood shall spread
Child of the frolic fold, in thy chill bed;
When the hot Dog-star's hours to rage incline,
They pierce thee not, that profferest pleasant cold
To flocks that range, and labour-weary bulls;
Thou, too, from all time forward shalt be told
Great among wells of name, by me that sing
The ilex shadowing thy stone-bound spring
Whence issues all the tumult of thy pools.

BOOK III. ODE 30.

Not brass eternal, nor the monument
Of princes shall outlive this powerful strain
Where never the loose wind in rage is spent,
Nor flight of ages, nor the wasteful rain;
The Earth can have but earth, which is his due;
I shall not wholly die; best part of me
Shall ever live young, destined to renew
And to be praised of ages yet to be,
While climb the Hill the Priest with Maid sedate:
Loud Aufidius' son shall Fame describe—
How the once lowly base, now grown to great,
From where parched Daunus ruled a rustic tribe,
The first to our Italian modes conveyed
The Æolian strains! So take deserved praise,
The deeds have won, and thou, Pierian Maid,
Of thy free grace bind me thy Delphic bays.

M. JOURDAIN.

TONO WELLS

WE shall propose that for the future Mr. Wells be known among his friends as Tono. We say this in no spirit of sarcasm or ribaldry, but out of the simplest compliment. For we are of opinion that Mr. Wells has a career behind him which may conveniently be forgotten. Until lately—almost until the other day, in fact—our friend figured in the eyes of persons who read as a fantastic Socialist and an unblushing advocate of free love, who would fain be taken for a philosopher and a man of letters. The fact that he had made no legitimate bid for consideration whether in the department of philosophy or in the department of letters concerned nobody. As a would-be Sociologist he was allowed to put his quack nostrums on the market without let or hindrance, and his fictional efforts were designed to excite delight and admiration in the bosoms of constant readers of Pearson's Magazine. It has become evident of late, however, that Mr. Wells's Socialism, not to mention his advocacy of free love, are more or less half-hearted affairs, and we have been able to demonstrate in these columns that really he is an individualist, and that he yields to no man in his practical respect for the marriage laws. And it has evidently occurred to Mr. Wells that, as his reputation among the "comrides" for a whole hogger and an amorphic firebrand is on the wane, he might with advantage endeavour to compass a little more credit in the harmless, necessary business of letters. The result is with us in the shape of "Tono-Bungay"—a novel which has appeared serially, not in Pearson's Magazine, but in the English Review, and a novel not intended so much for the gaping multitude as for the exiguous and exacting minority. From Mr. Wells's point of view, the adventure has no doubt been a noble one, and as he is not the kind of writer who goes forth to adventures, noble or otherwise, for mere adventure's sake, the nobility of his already accrued rewards will, no doubt, delight him. The enormity of those rewards will be patent to anybody who is acquainted with the meaning and effect of modern criticism, or, to be more precise, modern reviewing. Since Messrs. Macmillan turned out "Tono-Bungay" in its admirable green and gilt covers the reviewers have done little else but belaud it, and the public has been reading it with such understanding as it can bring to bear upon the situation. The only dissentient voices have been those of Dr. Robertson Nicoll and the genial editor of Vanity Fair; so that, on the whole, Mr. Wells can afford to laugh the cheerful laugh of the gentleman who is well out of the wood. That Dr. Robertson Nicoll and the genial editor of Vanity Fair should both of them despise "Tono-Bungay" is in itself the finest possible tribute to the quality of the book. We can well understand Dr. Nicoll's distaste for the whole performance; because to a man of the worthy doctor's journalistic connections and associations "Tono-Bungay" may well come in the nature of a personal slap in the face. The editor of a paper which is dependent upon the patent medicine vendors for a considerable portion of its advertisement revenue must not be expected to acclaim vociferously the fictional executioner who makes a show of burning one of the great company of "boosters"—we believe "boosters" is the term—at even a metaphorical stake. Dr. Nicoll informed us that he expected "Tono-Bungay" would "turn out to be a patent medicine." Not only was he correct in this wonderful surmise, but he also had the satisfaction of discovering that one of Mr. Wells's heroes, of the name of Ponderevo, was by way of being a patent medicine vendor, and that Mr. Wells's other hero, also called Ponderevo, not only assisted hero number one in the patent medicine vending, but actually succeeded in committing every crime in the decalogue during the period of his early manhood. We may note at this juncture that the two-hero innovation appears gravely to have misled the reviewers. Mr. Wells will have it, if only by implication, that it is the younger Ponderevo who should rank as his principal figure. In point of fact, the great and only person of consequence in the book is Ponderevo the elder, inventor of Tono-Bungay. And it is out of the elder Ponderevo that he has made the body and power and strength of the book. Over this stumbling-block Dr. Nicoll naturally comes to grief. And he comments upon the sins of Ponderevo the younger, which are really of no consequence, and are not intended to be of consequence, with almost ludicrous disapproval. The genial editor of Vanity Fair, on the other hand, finds "Tono-Bungay" to consist of the "rinsings and dregs of Mr. Wells's personal experience" and "not worth while writing." We surmise that this is because our author has refrained from certain touches of pornographic realism which are the fictional fashion nowadays. "There are three women concerned with the hero," wails the genial editor of Vanity Fair; "one he marries, another he kisses, and a third he adores from a distance." This is not spicily enough for the palate of the author of "The Bomb," though it has set Dr. Nicoll babbling about "orgies." Thus doth the tongue of sectional criticism waggle and confound confusion. The Nonconformist, as Nonconformist, is outraged by Ponderevo's love affairs. Our anarchist considers them the affairs of a mooncalf and a milksop. "Tono-Bungay" is an excellent novel, not because of, but in spite of Ponderevo the younger. Of Ponderevo the elder and his Tono-Bungay and nightmare finance and gaudy palace building Mr. Wells gives us a recital which is sheerly epical. The inventor of "Tono-Bungay" is in effect the embodiment and exemplar of the commercial and advertising spirit of the times done in large and to the life, like a drunken elephant. Mr. Wells himself affects to despise him; and the reasons for this ostensible contempt are not difficult to comprehend. But in his heart of hearts Mr. Wells knows that he has given us a mammoth and abiding figure, and that it is a figure which nobody can afford altogether to condemn. For when you indulge scorn for Ponderevo you will find yourself in effect scorning quite a number of people who, though their lives may have ended in disaster, would appear to have set the fashion in methods for practically all successful Englishmen, and who are in effect the gods of most Englishmen's idolatry. The fact is that England is choke-full of would-be Ponderevos. One discovers them in every walk of life, and it is civil and indeed necessary to look upon them as useful and important persons. There are not half-a-dozen newspaper businesses in London, to take an example, which are not being conducted on lines copied clean out of the vade mecum of Edward Ponderevo; and that Ponderevos abound in politics, finance and in every species of enterprise which is based upon advertising goes without saying. The persons most directly concerned may not have attained to Ponderevo's magnificence; they may not possess his splendid imaginative gifts; they may not possess his faith or his hope or his charity or his common-sense or his fearlessness or his sense of decency, and they may be utterly incapable of his innocent delight in his own madness; but they are Ponderevos for all that, mute, inglorious, and, it may be, unsuccessful Ponderevos; but still Ponderevos, and there is not a man amongst them who will read "Tono-Bungay" without feelings of admiration, exhilaration and satisfaction. Herein, we consider, lies the tremendousness of Mr. Wells's book. He has collected and assembled the more admired characteristics of the modern Englishman and hammered them into a giant at which only gods and little fishes may reasonably laugh. He has set up a mirror for Nature and a looking-glass for London which refuses to be dimmed. And in spite of Dr. Nicoll he has read out a moral lesson of the most apposite character. Though his moral is sound, however, we consider that Mr. Wells makes an artistic mistake in bringing his Ponderevo to a miserable and ignominious end. While there have been signal instances to the contrary, your average successful Ponderevo does not, as a rule, finish in disgrace. Usually he dies in the peerage and more or less of an odour of sanctity, and his heirs are fain to follow in his footsteps.

POPPYCOCK AND SNIGGS

THERE are two classes of persons who imagine themselves to be associated with journalism, and even with literature by prescriptive right, the one class being the lawyers and the other the undergraduates of Oxford and Cambridge. We are disposed to believe that in his day and generation the man who is elaborating a practice at the Bar may accomplish useful and satisfactory work as a reviewer, leader writer, or purveyor of fiction, as the case may be. When he comes into his forensic kingdom, however, literature—he calls it literature—usually goes by the board, though when he attains to the ermine he is not at all averse from being described by the hapenny reporters as “our literary Judge.” The Cambridge undergraduate, of course, is slightly different, for while your lawyer takes to writing for the mere purpose of eking out a miserable income, your undergraduate is supposed to take to it for the pure, unadulterated love of letters. We consider that nothing could be more creditable to a university than the existence in its midst of a reasonable, non-commercial review or magazine, written by undergraduates for undergraduates, and consecrated to the furtherance of the literary arts. We can remember the time when at Oxford, at any rate, there were wealthy youths, not to mention youths not quite so wealthy, who regarded the establishment and more or less persistent maintenance of some sort of literary periodical as part of a man’s duty to himself and to his fellows, and who, of course, invariably lost a good deal of their fathers’ money in pursuance of this fair white literary ambition. All such youths were rather looked up to by the average, and what they lost financially they no doubt gained in swagger, to say nothing of experience. In point of fact, of course, the undergraduate magazine is really the school magazine carried out of boyhood into hobbledohyhood. Its tone should therefore be innocent and unworldly, if a little sarcastic; its intentions should be soaringly ambitious; and its proprietors should do all that in them lies to cloak their business instincts with a lavish show of indifference to financial considerations. We may take it for granted, however, that the unimaginable touch of time is not without its effects even in the scholarly fastnesses of Oxford and Cambridge. And in our opinion those effects become most singularly palpable when one looks a little closely into the undergraduate journalism of the day. At Oxford, in this present year of grace, a firm of printers and stationers continues to bring out the Isis, while at Cambridge somebody not specified performs a similar service for the Granta. One has merely to glance at any number of either magazine to appreciate at once the journalistic situation in both cases. The Isis is full of advertisements—chiefly cigarette advertisements—and the Granta is full of advertisements—chiefly cigarette advertisements. Where the cigarette advertisement is lacking, you have the announcements of the tailor and outfitter, or the wine and spirit merchant, or the banjo, mandoline, and guitar merchant, or the hairdresser and perfumer, or the dancing master, or the enterprising hustling publisher. In short, your amateur, innocent, well-intentioned, ambitious literary sheet has become the puppet and lure of the advertising tout who begs to inform every huckster in the directory that “this old-established journal has a large circulation among the young gentlemen at Oxford [or Cambridge] University,” which young gentlemen, need it be said, are full of money and absolutely panting to purchase cigarettes, banjos, grand pianos, flannel trousers, digestive biscuits, fountain pens, spicy novels, and, in fact, all objects of exchange and barter whatsoever. As for the “editors” of these precious publications, one is filled with a wondrous awe of them. And this largely because they would appear to be the most transitory and ephemeral and anonymous and carefully hidden Grand Llamas in the world. So far as we can make out, the Isis of Oxford appears, as of yore, to be edited by a Mr. Poppycock, while the Granta of Cambridge is edited by a Mr. Sniggs. We should imagine that both gentlemen are passing rich on what is known in Cornmarket Street and in Trinity Street as “thirty bob a week.” Neither gentleman would seem to own his paper as a gentleman should, and if either gentleman does own his paper we can only say that either gentleman is to be commiserated. We have the current number of the Isis and the Granta before us and we shall apply to them the perfectly legitimate test of poetry. The Granta contains two sets of verses; in one of which we get a reference to tobacco and in the second a reference to cigarettes:

Here, apart from dons and “duns”
Is the end of my desire,
Breakfast; and a pipe of Lunn’s
O’er the fire.

On the inside of the blue cover of the Granta Mr. A. Colin Lunn advertises his, doubtless excellent, tobaccos. Poem number two commences:

With a number seven “Abdulla,”
And boots that are painfully new;

and on page four of the Granta Messrs. Abdulla and Company quite appropriately advertise their doubtless excellent cigarettes. The Granta is feelingly described in its sub-title as “A college joke to cure the dumps.” The current number of the Isis, and we say it to its credit, is devoid of the flagrant puff, at any rate in verse. Furthermore, it prints under the caption of “Sonnet” the following lucubration:

The lord Florentine of the bitter wrong,
By worship of his love’s divinity,
From Hell’s deep whirlpool and the cruel sea
Of red-flaked fire was borne on pinion strong
Out o’er that ocean where the waters throng
Unto the Mount of clear felicity;
Until, by service of love’s radiance,
He moved in the supernal arc of song.

Not so to us; when he whose only crime
Is love too deep of beauty and those eyes
More fair, more pure than the lucidities
That Dante hymn’d, must suffer in this time:
Who worships loveliness with latest breath
Wins in this adverse hour, not heav’n, but death.

Florentine is excellent for Oxford, as also is the rhymed couplet at the end of what purports to be a sonnet in the Italian form. Of the rhyming of “divinity” with “felicity” and “sea” with “radiance” we will say nothing.

During the year 1893 there was published in Oxford a magazine, “æsthetic, literary, and critical,” entitled The Spirit Lamp, and edited by Lord Alfred Douglas. We have three numbers of that magazine before us as we write. It is a magazine of the shape of the Isis, though somewhat smaller. Each number contains forty-eight pages of letterpress, and not a single advertisement. In one of the numbers we find the following sonnet, written by the late Mr. Oscar Wilde:

The sin was mine, I did not understand,
So now is music buried in her cave,
Save where some ebbing, desultory wave
Frets with its restless whirls the meagre strand.
And in the withered hollow of this land
Hath summer dug herself so deep a grave,
That hardly can the leaden willow crave
One silver blossom from keen winter’s hand.

But who is this that cometh by the shore?
(Nay, love, look up and wonder!) Who is this
Who cometh in dyed garments from the South?
It is thy new-found Lord, and he shall kiss
The yet unravished roses of thy mouth,
And I shall weep and worship as before.

In other numbers there are poems and articles signed "Lionel Johnson," "John Addington Symonds," and "Alfred Douglas." The present writer is not the editor of THE ACADEMY, and he is not in the least disposed to place an exaggerated value upon the contents of these three numbers of The Spirit Lamp. But he ventures to ask Mr. Poppycock and Mr. Sniggs—which is to say all the editors of the Granta and all the editors of the Isis whoever were—to produce a number of their respective journals which is capable of comparison with the aforesaid Spirit Lamp. The late Mr. Oscar Wilde came to great grief in this life, and this through his own fault. We shall not say that the late Mr. John Addington Symonds was an altogether admirable and perfect man of letters. We shall not say that the late Mr. Lionel Johnson was a finer poet than Tennyson, or a greater master of the art of "getting on" than Mr. E. V. Lucas or Mr. Clement Shorter. We shall not assert that the whole of the verses Lord Alfred Douglas published in The Spirit Lamp were impeccable, faultless and distinguished verses. But we do say that the worst piece of writing contributed to The Spirit Lamp by any of these four was a thousand miles ahead of the Granta's metrical tobacco puffs and quite appreciably and substantially ahead of any other kind of writing the Isis and the Granta combined have found themselves in a position to publish since the day when The Spirit Lamp flickered out. Mr. Poppycock and Mr. Sniggs, and, for that matter, the whole universities of Oxford and Cambridge, may quite conveniently take these facts to their private bosoms. The universities of Oxford and Cambridge are either the fostering places of high letters or they are nothing. That their institutional journals should be procured and bawled out for the purposes of commercialism is an offence before the Muses. And that your Poppycocks and your Sniggses should sneer at a man who, despite all the handy slurs, is the one editor in England to-day who stands for poetry and high letters and straight, fair and square criticism is a scandal and a reproach to anybody who has at any time been connected with either university. And particularly is it a reproach to Oxford, and a reproach which posterity will not be slow to bring up against her.

T. W. H. CROSLAND.

THE COMMON SKY

AN eminent journalist upon one of those occasions when he wrote in metre lyrically asserted that he was the captain of his fate. Let us hope that in an heroic sense this is true of most of us. The fact is not thereby obscured that it is hard to kick against the economic pricks. A man who has little love for the quiet country, like Charles Lamb, may be enforced to keep sheep in New Zealand, and a man who objects to the striking ugliness of a town, like John Ruskin, may be permanently domiciled in bachelors' chambers hard by the Strand. Such a man will do well to emulate Milton's Belial, a very wise devil with the talent for making the best of things. In this case, instead of making the best of hell, he is strongly urged to make the most of heaven.

Few people seem to have realised the possibilities latent in a persistent and enthusiastic cultivation of a taste for the "scenery" of the sky. Those who live in an untidy suburb or have the even bitterer misfortune to dwell amid the tidy prettiness of a country village have here a perpetual refuge. There is seldom a day in the year when there is not something to be seen that will repay a little stiffness in the back of the neck. There are certain days when the beauties of heaven are palpable to the most vulgar, when a succession of cloud palaces are for ever being built and for ever tumbling to ruin. The wind is the most fantastic and inventive of architects. He delights in his plastic medium and he never repeats himself. Then, too, there is his brother artist the sun, who has learned all the secrets of light and shade and is the most incomparable of the great masters in colour. These things may be apprehended of all and they will be happening upon any day blessed with a fresh Atlantic breeze that has contrived to avoid the hopelessly Philistine mountains of Wales. Then there will be a feast of light and colour and form.

But what is to be done when November skies are dull with uniform grey. The answer comes as a quick retort: There is no such thing as a sky dull with uniform grey. Vegetarians aver that by careful training of the sense of taste exquisite pleasure may be derived from the delicate and varied flavours of bread. The musical ear finds as much delight in the subtle modulations of Bach as it does in the drastic and flamboyant antithesis of more modern composers. The connoisseur in wine remains incomprehensible to the inexperienced. All these facts simply prove that there is no such thing as monotony, and that the perception of small differences is the beginning of good taste. There are not many people who are connoisseurs in November skies, but the fact remains that there are never two of them alike. That uniform grey resolves itself into a marvel of shifting light and shadows, the abode of perpetual change and a source of ecstatic delight to the beholder who has cultivated the habit of looking up.

There is only one possible occasion when the heavens are dull. The brazen blue of a cloudless June day is not very interesting. Keats seems to have felt this when he was writing "Endymion," and he finds comfort in the fact that even on such days as these a little cloud will sometimes steer a forlorn course from rim to rim of the barren heavens. The enthusiast will have to confess himself beaten. If he be of a scientific turn of mind he will wonder why the sky is blue, and ponder upon the influence of ultra-violet light in the formation of nuclei in the atmospheric envelope.

Then, of course, there are the stars. Everybody knows that the stars are beautiful. Poets, good and bad, have always insisted upon the fact. Some of them institute absurd comparisons concerning the eyes of the one or more young women who excite in them the mild emotion that induces this type of lyric. But there are few, even among the poets, who have contracted a personal friendship with particular stars, who can call to them all by name, who know all their moods and glances as they would those of a comrade. Here, again, intimacy reveals infinite variety. The wintry sparkle of Vega, the warm glow of Capella, the hectic glare of Aldebaran—each has its peculiar message. With concern we note that from a post of vantage the bull presses Orion hard to-night, and that his uplifted shield seems but a frail defence. It is for ever an eternal procession of old friends, and it is good to feel at home in those great wide spaces, to read old-world stories of a banished mythology scrawled across heaven itself. Of those nights when moon, wind and cloud make a phantasmagoria of their own, through which come glimpses of this familiar world which we have learned to know, it is unwise to speak. Shelly knew it well, and he was not silent.

The other poets have known it also. To the seeing eye the barest patch of the heavens is as much as a whole Cook's tour. The person who cannot be moved except by mountains or volcanoes in eruption, or Niagaras or canyons or the "illimitable prairie," is in pretty much the same æsthetic condition as one who requires four-and-fifty pipers or a couple of hundred cornets-à-piston before he is troubled with a sense of music. Messrs. Cook and Richard Wagner are excellent to think about, but the effect of their labours on the general taste has not been in the nature of an unmixed blessing. The portentous is not necessarily more beautiful than the commonest beauty.

REVIEWS

THE REVISION OF THE PRAYER BOOK

The Ornaments, Rubric and Modifications of the existing Law relating to the Conduct of Divine Service: Convocation of Canterbury, Lower House. First Report of Committee. (London: Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press, 1s. net.)

If we regard this Report as the outcome of two years' hard labour the result is very disappointing. It is not too much to say that the majority of the proposed modifications or alterations are trivial and in many cases altogether unimportant. On the other hand, there are a few of paramount importance, which can be considered only as signals of danger and treated as such.

We are prepared for what is to follow by the amazing addition which it is proposed should be made to the Preface of the Book of Common Prayer, and which we cite in full:

Inasmuch as it is to be desired that changes, even within the bounds of what is legal (the italics are ours), should not be made in the customary arrangement and conduct of Divine Service arbitrarily or without the goodwill of the people, any question which may arise between the minister of a parish and the people with regard to such arrangement and conduct of the services shall stand referred to the Bishop of the Diocese, who, after such consultation as he shall think best, both with the minister and with the people, shall make orders thereupon, and these orders shall be final, provided they be not contrary to anything contained in this Book.

Here is, indeed, a via turbulenta: a method of perpetual friction between bishop, priest and layman. The Prayer Book (even though revised) is no longer to have the force of law; no sure standard of order is left. There is no court nor tribunal of appeal. The bishop is to be an absolute pope in his own diocese. A priest moving a few miles from one diocese to another can be compelled to entirely alter his procedure, even in the face of what is legal, and be deservedly exposed to the charge of manifest inconsistency. The layman can be forced to acquiesce in a conduct of Divine Service which he knows to be illegal. And all this is to be done on the "final order" of one man, the Bishop, who, although he is as much bound to obey the law as any other man, yet can thus over-ride the law. Where, we ask, is the Church, where are the people, who are prepared to accept such unmeaning illegal tyranny? There is no manner of doubt that the "customary arrangement and conduct of Divine Service" really means slovenly and even illegal methods of celebrating the Holy Communion. For example, there are many churches where the first part of the office is habitually left out, and the service is made to begin in the middle, either at the offertory (so as not to lose the collection), or, in case of Evening Communions, at the exhortation, "Yet that do truly," etc., a flagrant illegality, and a most serious and unwarrantable interference with the due order of the service. This improper performance might have gone on for twenty years, and, though illegal, have become "a customary arrangement." A new vicar desires to restore the legal and right order. Some parishioners object. The bishop is called in, and decides that this very proper change is against the "goodwill of the people." So he makes "orders that shall be final," viz., that the lax and careless arrangement shall be perpetuated, against the law and also against the conscience of many. Where is the real finality in this? Where any prospect of peace? The only course open to hundreds of priests, if placed in such a position, would be resignation. Such cases are in no way improbable. We know a church where the first half of the Holy Communion Service is said on one Sunday and the latter half on the next, doubtless with the ignorant "goodwill of the people," and this where there is a large population. Another arrangement, the most common of all, and especially in the country, is this: Morning Prayer and the first half of the Communion Office are sung and made to appear as one distinct service. In the middle of the Communion Service a loud voluntary is played while the main congregation goes out. Then the latter part of the Communion Office is read as a separate service. A new rector may wish to alter this, and to treat the Holy Communion Service as a complete service from beginning to end, altogether distinct from Matins. This would be quite legal, and more than that, perfectly reasonable and right from every point of view. But a wealthy squire or a few aggressive and aggrieved parishioners intervene. The bishop, after consultation, makes a "final order" preventing the rector from making a legal change.

Similar cases might be multiplied almost indefinitely. Once the power to over-ride the law is given into the hands of one official in his administrative capacity nothing can be expected but chaos and confusion. What would be thought of a Government which proposed to invest the judges and magistrates of the State with like power? What sort of security would be left for the citizens? To what sort of chaos would the civil administration be reduced? And yet here are a body of men, presumably sane, who, after two years' deliberation, calmly suggest that the security of the law shall cease, and that the bishops shall become, by some astounding sort of paradox, simply licensed outlaws. The Canon Law and the Civil Law, built up through centuries of progress, are to be abrogated in favour of arbitrary judges. After all, Cecil Rhodes was perhaps not so far wrong when he left, in addition to his money, the legacy of his humorous dictum that the clergy were mere "babes in business." Fortunately for the Church, the laity have to be reckoned with. They will hardly allow this summary setting aside of the law. It is true that the Committee who issue this Report say that "they have done their work in the conviction that if its results are to stand good they must be submitted to a wider tribunal than that either of the Lower House or of the whole Convocation, viz., the tribunal of the whole Church."

But no one can be surprised if we ask the question whether the Archbishop of Canterbury and other bishops will be as unwilling to listen to the voice of the Church as they were in the case of the recently-proposed Education compromise. What is to be said of the attempt to muzzle the clergy, or what of Canon Henson's grievance against two great Church societies for their noble stand against the Archbishop-Runciman policy?—a gravamen supported by four bishops, several deans and archdeacons, but ignominiously defeated by a large majority. The Dean of Canterbury's spirited answer applies in some measure as well to the case before us, that "on at least two critical occasions in the history of the Church it had to be saved from its own bishops, in order to be saved from ruin." By whom? By the priests and the laity.

On November 13th, 1906, the Archbishop of Canterbury, addressing a Full Synod, said that:

Rules clear in principle and yet elastic in detail we do absolutely require, if the Church, in its manifold activities, is to be abreast of modern needs and yet loyal to ancient order.

How have the Committee interpreted this high-sounding but plausible direction?

So far from clear and definite rules for the ministers' guidance, the unfortunate parish priest is now to find rubrics of vague and uncertain tendency, and that in matters of grave importance. The definite "shall" of the present Prayer Book is to be replaced by the weak and timid "may." Imagine the rules and regulations of a club or a regiment of soldiers drawn up in similar fashion, and the resultant confusion and breaking up of discipline and order.

If only "may," why trouble to have a so-called rule at all? There can be absolutely no principle, clear or obscure, in "rules" of this kind. "Elasticity of detail" practically amounts to absence of principle and an invertebrate weakness of action.

Even so, of what avail is it whether the rules say "may" or definitely and legally "shall," when it is expressly provided that the bishop of his own sole power, without assessors, with no further possibility of appeal, can intervene and say absolutely that "shall" is to be read "shall not," and that a change (to quote again the absurd and preposterous clause), "even within the bounds of what is legal," shall not be made? Why have any law at all?

We shall no doubt be told that this sweet, reasonable elasticity will be stretched in both directions. We see little in the proposed revisions which gives room for such sanguine hope. Nor would it be politic.

Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

What, for example, might be expected from those bishops who are at present doing all they can to stamp out vestments, if they were invested with absolute power? What would be the value of a "rule" saying that a vestment "may" be worn, if a bishop could say it "may not"? We could name several bishops who, in this matter, would be little likely to consider the "goodwill of the people." We know of one who directed a new incumbent to discontinue the use of vestments. On what ground? That "the people were not ready for them." It will hardly be believed that vestments had been in use in that parish for a whole generation, thirty-three years. But such is the actual fact.

And what shall we say of the cases where whole congregations desire the use of incense—the demand of the laity? Are they considered, or is their goodwill consulted? The cruel boycott to which some good men who use incense at their people's request have been subjected by certain bishops is sufficient answer.

We contend that this subtle and plausible addition to the Preface contains all the elements of anarchy, tyranny, chaos and confusion. It would place one class or order of men in a position extra legem. It would give them a power which no individuals could hold with safety to a State, a power subversive of true freedom, a power liable to dangerous abuse, a weapon fit rather for tyrants than constitutional rulers. The existence of such an arbitrary veto, so far from making for peace, would certainly place an intolerable strain upon the relations between parson and people. For, after all, people do still understand the difference between "may" and "shall" and between "shall" and "shall not." They do understand that a law is a law, and that in definite law there is some security of order. But the position that in any and every parish someone may step in and say that it matters not one jot that the incumbent is strictly and accurately obeying the law of the Prayer Book of the Church and of the State, because now someone has come to set that law aside in favour of certain persons who dislike that law, while the said someone is equally prepared to give an exactly opposite direction in the next parish—such a position is the very negation of all order and the high road to perpetual strife in the Church. It is unintelligible to men of sound common-sense. It is certainly not likely to prove loyal to ancient order, any more than are loyal many details of the suggested Revision, which we propose to examine in a subsequent article.

AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES

University Administration. By CHARLES W. ELIOT.
(Constable and Co., 6s. net.)

It may naturally be supposed that a book published in London, bearing the title "University Administration," is about those great seats of learning which are called in Europe "Universities"; and since it appears at this time, its title suggests those questions of reform at Oxford and Cambridge which have been recently discussed. It must, therefore, be explained at the outset that this book has nothing to do with English universities, much less with their reform; indeed, it refers but twice to Oxford and Cambridge only, quite incidentally, by way of comparison. It is a book about American institutions, the majority of which, the author, presumably an American also, points out, are not, in the proper sense of the word, universities at all. They consist of single colleges "around which have grown up an undergraduate department of applied science, including agriculture and engineering, finance or commerce, and, in a few cases, divinity." Mr. Eliot describes, in many respects, clearly, the organisation of the large American institutions, such as Harvard, as the best means by which these numerous detached technical colleges can be developed into institutions of the Harvard type; and he regards it as part of the functions of the large institutions to encourage their development. Yet all the institutions are called "universities," and to Europeans there is much in those, even of the Harvard type, to justify a common nomenclature, if Mr. Eliot may be taken as a faithful representative of their spirit. His book, therefore, has not much particular application to universities in these islands, least of all to Oxford, Cambridge, Trinity College, Dublin, and their corresponding universities in Scotland.

Nevertheless Mr. Eliot makes many shrewd and even wise observations concerning corporate administration generally and methods of education. If he had written his book at half the length it would have been a suggestive and useful little treatise. It does possess those qualities to a certain degree as it stands, but they are obscured by his habit of worrying his subject. He will not take the smallest or most obvious point for granted; he discusses each hair under all its conditions, in every light, and from every point of view; he enunciates as discoveries courses so familiar as to have become almost instinctive, and argues to the bare bone propositions which no one disputes. He devotes a whole tedious chapter to little else than proving quite superfluously that as many different courses of study should be provided as possible, in order to allow students to select those best suited to the individuality of each. This he calls "The Elective System," and he tells us there are experts in "Election." He is such a slave to system that it is difficult to attend to anything in his book except the systems in which it is entangled. He leaves the impression that, if American "universities" are so much systematised also, American youths can have no time or intelligence left to learn anything else after mastering their intricacies. If those institutions really are so terribly over-organised they go far to account for the peevish expression by which American boys from about fifteen to twenty-two can be recognised in Europe among boys of all other nationalities.

Mr. Eliot's first sage remarks concern the trustees of universities, and are equally applicable to administrative bodies of all sorts. The members must be few enough to sit round a table and discuss, without making speeches. They must carefully avoid elderly control and must always co-opt a younger trustee than the retiring one. They should prefer for their purpose—though not for a technical office—"a child of the house," who will give his services with more devotion. They must be "men able to get their facts through others, and to form their opinions through a process of comparison and judicious sifting," "since they will often be called upon to decide on matters beyond the scope of their own experience." Unfortunately it is not yet superfluous to add, even in England, that they must not be interested in politics. But is it necessary to insist, since they have entire control of the finances, that some of them at least must know how to invest the money? Mr. Eliot reminds them to buy land for the enlargement of their buildings long before they want it, so that their front door may never be flush with the public pavement, like Westminster Cathedral; to be prodigal in the upkeep of their buildings and grounds; and never to fall into the fallacy of supposing that it pays in the long run to give any preference to local dealers, even though the institution is exempted from rates. He insists that scrupulous regard should be given to the wishes of benefactors, and that all accounts should be carefully published. His recommendation that all the available income should be spent seems advice of more doubtful expediency, but it is a suggestive and arguable proposition. Perhaps, in a country devoted to advertisement, lack of ready money, if judiciously managed, can be made the source of further endowment, and Mr. Eliot says that it is. The Harvard Board of Overseers seems also to deserve Mr. Eliot's commendation, as a large body of graduates, somewhat resembling Convocation, but more effectual, keeping the trustees in check, and particularly desirable in smaller universities.

As regards the intellectual training of students, it scarcely seems necessary to insist now, in the case of institutions so largely technical, on the value of practice in all branches of study in which it can possibly be introduced. Museums serve this purpose less obviously, by illustration in studies which hardly admit of practice. In the collections which they contain Mr. Eliot draws a sensible distinction, not always recognised. There must be objects and books for free use and renewal, and treasures to be jealously guarded. But Mr. Eliot adds that there must be no "dust, insects, crumbs, and accumulations of rubbish." The students and custodians will also presumably wash, but he does not explain on what system. He duly praises a method of teaching law, which he calls the Case-System, invented—it might be safer to say introduced into American universities—by Professor Langdell. This consists in arguing with the students leading cases decided in the American courts, and thus teaching them the points of law which they establish—an excellent method of teaching, but surely not peculiar to American universities. Nevertheless, Mr. Eliot recommends it appropriately. He praises, rightly, too, if rather unnecessarily, any expedient for making the students think for themselves, so he condemns their trusting too much to manuals in making experiments in chemistry. Why he seems to distrust quotation in essays is not so evident, nor why he stigmatises the non-delivery of essays on the appointed day as "a very great evil." If an idea or a fact has already been expressed in the best possible way, the words had better be quoted, rather than the idea worse expressed. The question is: What is quoted? and, from the point of view of the instructor, whether the quotation is sufficiently apposite to show that the student understands it. In the second case it is difficult to find any evil except unpunctuality. Work of all kinds which is delivered late, whether from postponement or scrupulous correction, is often peculiarly excellent and often inferior; there can be no rule.

Though Mr. Eliot is very sympathetic to students as regards their discipline, he is somewhat illusive. English public schoolboys should approve his excellent dicta: that no official should on any account try to make a naughty student incriminate himself, nor "require students to testify against each other," nor punish the students wholesale for the undiscoverable offence of one of their number—a flagrant injustice too often committed in English schools; and again, that "the record of actual censures and punishments should be made as little condemnatory as possible." But he considers one of the advantages of the innumerable clubs which American students are encouraged to form—some of them "small, exclusive and secret groups"—is "that they can be utilised by college officers in confidential ways" for control and reform. And though the student's records, kept with the utmost accuracy, are "held to be confidential," there are "many proper uses to which they can be put by request of friends," etc. Not very long ago the headmaster of an English public school put such a record to a use which he considered proper, and was heavily fined as the result of an action for libel. American universities may still have something to learn from English judges in this respect. Mr. Eliot would certainly not approve of such a use of a student's record, but his idea of the duties of university officials make such a use very likely. Apparently discipline in American universities lies entirely in the hands of the Faculties, and since American youths are encouraged to follow courses under several Faculties, they are subject to the moral control of them all. Since Mr. Eliot evidently disapproves of any dogmatic and, consequently, ascertainable basis of morals, which is indeed contrary to the spirit of American universities, the wretched youths must be amenable to several unknown codes.

Finally, to one of Mr. Eliot's ideas direct exception must be taken. He regards a university as fulfilling its functions only when it meets a public demand. Like a shop, it must store goods that the public will buy. On the contrary, the essential of a university is the cultivation of all knowledge, exact or speculative, whether the public wants it or not. Teaching is merely an extension of its functions. An institution such as All Souls' College, which did not teach at all, might constitute a university; a technical college could not. The whole spirit of American educational institutions, or at any rate Mr. Eliot's conception of it, seems to be so much more like that of technical colleges than of universities proper that they seem unlikely to develop in that direction.

PSYCHIC PHILOSOPHY

Psychic Philosophy as the Foundation of a Religion of Natural Law. By V. C. DESERTIS. (William Rider and Son, Ltd., 4s. 6d. net.)

THE late Professor Huxley once remarked that whenever he came across the word "polarity" in a book he shut the book up, never to re-open it. We confess to a similar prejudice with regard to the word "psychic," and it was, in consequence, with feelings of distinct apprehension—grounded on previous experiences—that we approached the study of the above volume. In many respects we were agreeably surprised. We must record at the outset our appreciation of the motives which have obviously inspired Mr. Desertis in the production of this book. It is quite evident that he is a sincere and intelligent man. He is no crank. Still less does he belong to that odious confraternity of quacks and charlatans who have succeeded, while providing very comfortably for themselves, in making the very name of spiritualism a synonym for everything that is fraudulent, odious, and base. No; the place of Mr. Desertis is not with these. He is free from the least suspicion of disingenuousness. He is what is sometimes vaguely termed a "seeker after truth." Dissatisfied with the conventional creeds, he has turned aside to fashion one for himself, and, in doing so, he has, it appears, found intellectual peace and salvation. We do not begrudge Mr. Desertis his happiness, and shall merely content ourselves with stating a few of the reasons which make it impossible for us to accept his conclusions.

We observe that one of our author's main quarrels with orthodox Christianity is its claim to be the repository of THE Truth. (For the capitals Mr. Desertis is responsible.) Truth, we learn, is attainable by mortal man: THE Truth, presumably, resides in the bosom of God. But surely this is a distinction without a difference. Unless there be an authoritative standard of Truth, how shall we declare that any belief we hold possesses any elements of truth? Truth is either absolute, or—possible falsehood. Mr. Desertis has himself expended much ingenuity in exposing some of the errors (as he believes them to be) of popular religion. He can only do this by applying to them the test of a standard of truth, which must necessarily be absolute, for otherwise it precludes Mr. Desertis from the exercise of any judgment on the question. Infallibility is, in fact, a dogma by no means peculiar to the Roman Church. It is a quality the existence of which we assume every time we venture to pass a judgment on any event in history or in the lives of our contemporaries. The only question is, Where does this infallibility reside? And, that question once asked, the waters of theological strife are stirred to some purpose.

Mr. Desertis has raised so many interesting points in the course of this book that it is quite impossible to touch on all of them. We shall therefore confine ourselves to those arguments which deal with the phenomena of "occultism." Mr. Desertis is a convinced occultist. He believes firmly in the existence of a spirit-world, and in the possibility of what perhaps he will allow us to call "supernatural visitations." And here we are entirely at one with him. The New Testament (to say nothing of the Old) abounds in records of such occurrences, and the numerous accredited "miracles" in the history of the Early Church are not lightly to be waived aside. Indeed, we will go further. We are quite in agreement with Mr. Desertis when he maintains that it is folly to accept the various supernatural stories related in the Bible and, without weighing the evidence, to refuse to give credence to the similar phenomena which modern spiritualism claims to have produced. It is necessary to walk warily, however. The subject is one of such tremendous importance that the evidence must be of no ordinary character, if we are to accept as genuine the stories which reach us from the séance and from the spiritualist lecture-room. Now, it is somewhat significant in this connection that in the only first-hand piece of evidence recorded in this volume, the "medium" furnished some information which proved, on investigation, to be demonstrably false. Mr. Desertis, indeed, finds it necessary to warn his readers against accepting too glibly the communications conveyed by the spirits:

It may be stated broadly that all communications which deal with the recipient in a manner calculated to flatter vanity, to imply a special privilege, or to recommend any creed or system, or which profess to give special and reserved truths not for the mass of mankind, are at best of very doubtful value; and all who foretell events and prices, for whatever alleged motive, are to be entirely distrusted.

It appears, then, that the utterances of these dwellers in the spirit-world are to be received with considerable reserve. And for what reason? Because of the general unreliability of the so-called "intelligences." The whole of the evidence in this book goes to prove that while it is perfectly easy to communicate with the blackmailer, the debauchee, or the sensualist, the saint and the philosopher almost invariably refuse to answer to our summons. Let us listen to Mr. Desertis once more:—

Those who materialise, speak, and cause the usual phenomena at séances are generally, though not always, the earth-bound, who are glad to wile away some of the tedium of eternity (and to those whose only idea of life is personal enjoyment there is tedium, how great none can know who know nothing of the complaints of the sufferers), who return to their old haunts for conscious intercourse with men. Some few return through unselfish love, some through duty, having a mission of help and guidance to carry out, and these latter, as a rule, do not manifest; but generally the purpose is merely trivial, and there is usually but little elevation of thought or nobility of language.

Well, we would like to ask Mr. Desertis whether he thinks it at all probable that if Eternal Providence had intended to enlarge men's knowledge with regard to the future life, He would have selected such sorry instruments for His purpose. And in truth what have we learned by all these table-rappings, darkened rooms and planchettes? The testimonies are incoherent, inconclusive, and self-contradictory. Before the portals of the future there hangs an impenetrable veil, and to attempt to lift it is to court disaster. We of the older faith may well rest content with the Divine assurance, "In My Father's House are many mansions," and, while we are ready to accord to every new creed or philosophy a respectful hearing, we shall not be greatly disturbed by the failure of this or the temporary triumph of that, seeing indeed that all things come to an end, but that to "love God and keep His Commandments" is "the whole duty of man."

We are bound to say, in conclusion, that there is much in this volume which we have found both helpful and stimulating, and with which we are in entire agreement.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Seekers. By FRANK SAVILE. (Edward Arnold, 6s.)

THE "secret treasure" story has taken many forms, and while novels are written we suppose it will continue to be the basis of a respectable proportion of their number. And if all tales of hidden gold and jewels were as exciting and as clever as this one, there would be small reason to complain. "Seekers" is a capital yarn, if "yarn" be not too disparaging a word to use when the literary quality is so high. The author knows the phrase he wants, and finds it, and he has a style with him when a bit of fighting has to be described that carries the reader into the scene—which is the finest kind of arm-chair adventure one could wish. The little kingdom of Montenegro is the background of the romance, disguised slightly as "Montanera"; into the plot love enters, of course, but not with a very strong interest. The dialogue is quite of the Anthony Hope school, and, indeed, the whole scheme is not unlike the "Ruritanian" affairs. Perils by intrigue, escapes from the dungeon of a fortress by means of a rope that hangs down the interior of a well, several foreign ambassadors, and a curious mixture of modernism with a mediæval atmosphere—all these things are bound to recall the famous "Prisoner of Zenda." Says the Crown Prince to his father, the King of Montanera:

"I wish to goodness this tampering with the mails might be given up; it is an anachronism in the twentieth century."

"There you go again, with your radical nonsense," retorted the Strong Man. "Is the Russian post-office not used politically? Do the Austrians never open the correspondence of suspects?"

The conflict between the forward party and the party which favoured conservatism in such delicate matters is amusingly dictated. The love affair of Gilforth, the rather jolly Englishman, forms a pleasant interlude, and, altogether, most readers will spend a couple of profitable hours and enjoy several "thrills" if this book comes their way.

The Leveller. By ALEXANDER McARTHUR. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

RUSSIA, for some inscrutable reason, possesses an extraordinary fascination for the English and American writer of romances, and it would probably be no exaggeration to assert that Mr. McArthur is about the hundredth novelist who has fled to the country of Tolstoi and Turgenev for inspiration. From his spelling we judge Mr. McArthur to be an American. His outlook on life is certainly that of a cosmopolitan. His style of writing is not that of a man of letters. Here, for instance, is an atrocious sentence:—

Conversation was general and ranged over a variety of subjects: Tolstoi's book of the hour, the "Kreutzer Sonata," which, having been proscribed by the Russian Censor, a copy in manuscript had been passed round among the author's friends, and having been read by Rubinstein and several of those at the table, was made the subject of an especially hot discussion.

This, it is only fair to add, represents Mr. McArthur at his very worst.

For the rest, the story is readable, but by no means remarkable. It is the oft-repeated tale of two lovers who, separated by a series of cruel mischances, are finally united to live happily ever after. An element of variety is imparted in this instance by the fact that the heroine is a Jewess, while her lover is the proud scion of one of the noble Russian families. Despite, however, the general conventionality of the theme, the story is told in a convincing manner, and there are no awkward pauses in the narrative. To us the chief interest centres round the figure of Rubinstein, who hovers like a shadow about the background of the picture. The great pianist has been sympathetically delineated, and the result is a study, both subtle and acute, in the strange vagaries and hidden tragedies of the artistic temperament.

No novel dealing with Russian life is considered to be complete which does not contain a personal interview with the Czar. There is, of course, one in this volume.

Lil of the Slums. By "DICK DONOVAN." (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

AFTER reading this novel we feel as if we had witnessed a lurid transpontine melodrama, with a villain who strides about shading his eyes, and a heroine who poses and weeps on every propitious occasion. For although the story is not a bad one, it is irreparably injured by the manner of its writing; the unadulterated "journalese," the ready-made phrases of the newspaper reporter, occur on page after page; and the characters talk to each other in this manner:

"My God! I'd forgotten Foster," cried Rowland, pressing his hands to his head; "now I see through it all; now you have given me the key, and I'll solve this mystery or perish."

"Foster has been watched, and nothing can be proved against him."

"But I'll prove something. I'll wring his secret from him even if I have to tear his heart out to get at it."

"Bert, my beloved, we will journey to the new land together and work for each other, cling to each other, until in God's good time we sink away to rest." Then did he answer to her amazement, "The story is not yet told, and it may so chance that when you have come to your own, you may bid me go from you, and see you no more."

The gentle and good and long-suffering hero, too, has been reading penny horrors, for he writes to his sweetheart in the style of an errand-boy veneered with the fearful politeness of his favourite dashing desperado:

"As you have chosen to place an insurmountable barrier between us, our paths will now lie far apart. We might have been happy in our poverty had you shown yourself less indifferent to my wishes. However, you have willed it otherwise, and all that is left for me to do is to say farewell, though my heart breaks in writing the word, for I have loved you. Farewell! When this reaches you I shall be far away. Once more, farewell."

When the girl read this, the paper "fluttered from her nerveless and trembling hands." We knew it would.

The story is "written round a true incident arising out of the loss of the steamship Princess Alice in the Thames," but the description of the collision is very poor, and the whole thing becomes boring long before the last chapter is reached. We happen to see that "Lil of the Slums" is appearing in a West Country daily paper at the time we write this notice, which goes to explain a good deal of its character.

Someone Pays. By NOEL BARWELL. (John Lane, 6s.)

THERE are many objections to the method of allowing a story to evolve itself by means of letters supposed to be written by the various characters. For one thing, the reader, as a rule, has a sub-conscious sense of the artificiality of the device; he feels that in real life the epistles written by participants in a chain of incidents such as this would never so precisely and beautifully expound the story to an outsider who should chance upon them. And, again, unless the author is exceptionally adept, and the reader preternaturally attentive, there is likely to be a somewhat hazy notion of what all the pother is about—the clarity and sequence of the plot suffer. To set against these and other disabilities of the epistolary novel, we have an advantage or two; one is that we usually escape the long and limp descriptions of people and scenery which so often dilute the ordinary romance; another, that character comes out in personal letters as sharply as in actions. This, however, necessitates the proviso that the author be very competent.

Recognising the inherent drawbacks of the manner, we cannot regret that this story has been told by the letters of the persons chiefly concerned, for Mr. Barwell has carried his task through excellently, and kept his characters consistent—a difficult feat. The theme is unpleasant, but it is not unduly intruded; indeed, we might truthfully say that the greatest interest comes from the side-issues, and from the disclosures of rather charming relationships which bear on the main position only incidentally. The residence of Jack Orr, the exasperating young hero, in the household of Kershaw, the hypocritical and impetuous vicar, for purposes of "coaching," is provocative of amusement; later on, of tragedy. He introduces a friend of the "boulder" class, through whom one of the servants loses her reputation, and in the complications which follow the author has not been quite careful enough to indicate the real culprit among the three possible ones; the reader is left at the last moment slightly in the dark. These things, however, will be to many of less importance than the glimpses of the Cambridge don and his girl friend, Kitty Strowdley (who, it seems to us, was far too good for Jack), and other letters of people who are at a tangent to the immediate circle reveal some pretty by-play of episode and of thought. We are of the opinion that Mr. Barwell might justifiably give us another book in the same manner with a rather less sordid central incident than the betrayal of poor Emily; he is certainly capable of something good in a lighter vein.

A Short History of the English Stage. By R. FARQUHARSON SHARP. (The Walter Scott Publishing Co., 5s.)

WE are bound to feel a considerable amount of sympathy for the author who attempts a concise history of the stage and its art in this country, for quite naturally and inevitably a large portion of his task will consist of catalogues of theatres, actors, authors, managers, and the plays which have been performed. This, of course, has happened to Mr. Sharp's volume, and, while making it valuable as a work of reference, detracts from its interest as a book to read; there is no room to spare for the digressions, the comments, the author's own asides which would have raised the subject out of the arid regions of mere history; the leaven of anecdote, too, must be sparingly used.

The general reader, however, will find plenty of pleasing matter in the first few chapters. It is curious to note how in the cycle of years we sometimes revert to ancient customs—the old-time "Pageant Master" gradually developed into the theatrical manager, as we now know him, but to-day we have a craze for pageants and pastoral plays, and once more the "Pageant Master" has become a necessary person. The love of a spectacle per se seems to form a notable line of demarcation between human beings and the animal creation; if a cat watches a mouse, or a dog surveys the garden, it is not with the mere object of seeing; and it is rather an illuminating thought that that desire of eye-pleasure has led us so far—led us from the primitive wooden movable structure on which in mediæval times the actors strode and the spectators intruded to the elaborate and imposing theatres of the present, with their accessories of music, scene, and song.

The simplicity of those early pageant-plays was perfect. "Tapestries were hung at the back for the purpose of scenery; 'halfe a yarde of Rede Sea' is one item recorded." Even the splendid Elizabethan drama was presented under conditions which we can hardly realise to-day—part of the audience on the stage, smoking and interrupting; protection from the weather of the rudest; the floor covered with rushes; scenery as we know it practically non-existent. Not until Garrick assumed a firm attitude was the stage resolutely kept free from the fops and gallants, who sometimes "so encumbered the actors that these were obliged to shoulder their way through to gain a clear space in which to perform." Dresses, too, were conventional:

It is difficult for us to bear in mind, in these days of historical "accuracy" on the stage, that ever since the drama had emerged from its beginnings the actors had worn every-day dress, intensified in certain directions and made fanciful in others, but still without an attempt at synchronism. . . . Garrick played Macbeth in a Hanoverian military uniform to a Lady Macbeth in hoops and feathers, but that fact disturbed no one's appreciation of their performances.

This was not altogether a drawback. The modern idea that scenery must be gorgeous and settings ornate does not make for good art or its sane comprehension, as anyone will acknowledge who remembers the annoying flutter of astonishment that for some minutes pervades His Majesty's Theatre when the curtain rises on one of Mr. Tree's presentations of Shakespeare's plays. When the eye of the beholder is seduced into approval, his ear too frequently becomes less critical and his brain anæsthetised into pleasant languor.

It is a great pity that the author has seen fit to deal with the rubbishy stuff written, and sometimes produced and acted, by mediocrities of the last ten or twenty years; ninety per cent. of it was not worth even a passing allusion, and in a book of 318 pages, which only allows half its space to the important periods that pre-date Henry Irving (we reach Irving and Ellen Terry on page 161), there seems a grievous lack of proportion; the condensation has been carried too far in the first half, not far enough in the latter. To adduce only one instance: the plays of Wilde ("that witty writer") are taken as they come, just mentioned with a nod of approval, lumped with all the rest; whereas a single production of his pen was worth all the thin and meretricious "smartness" of some of our later playwrights put together. In a book where compression is a sine quâ non this inattention to values is a fault.

This is, however, the most serious complaint we have to make, and we do not wish to end on a note of dissatisfaction. The account Mr. Sharp gives of Garrick, the Kembles, Macready, Phelps, and many others, is worthy of all praise. Of Foote, the irrepressible, he writes well, with one or two brief anecdotes:

He was a dramatist of considerable merit, and wrote a number of plays and comedies that reflected contemporary manners with great spirit; but it is as a mimic that he will always be remembered. No one escaped his satire; and the town flocked to see him, everyone eager to laugh at the reproduction of his friends' peculiarities while dreading an exhibition of his own. . . . He bore the loss of his leg, and the tragic-comical result of the necessity for a false one, with considerable pluck. Someone had the ill-taste to make fun of his misfortune, whereupon Foote snapped out, "Make no allusion to my weakest part; did I ever attack your head?"

Of Sheridan, too, we have a good impression in these pages. We can appreciate the amount of care and labour which has gone to the writing and compiling of this history. Although in the nature of things it is a book which must be open to the charge of omissions, these are not numerous, and Mr. Sharp, with the one exception which we have emphasised, has executed his task in a sound and literary manner.

AN OUTDOOR BREVIARY—II.

On the arc of the bay, upon the slowly-rising land behind it, upon the pale, buff-coloured, divided fields for the plough, the gulls sweep out in great flocks over the sea. They feed together upon the edge of the falling tide, making curving bands of white that mix with the ribbon of the breaking surf; they follow the plough, and float above the ribbed field; they flit like a sudden scudding drift of snow against a dull grey sky; now and then they rise in a cloud, and so rising disappear, and as they turn and wheel they send flashes of delicate light from their vibrating wings, like a note struck upon a silver bell. The glimpse of their evanescent shining is like the rapid turning of a polished blade; they vanish, like bands of light fading across the downs.

Upon this hill that surveys the expanse of wide fields, divided by white lanes and low plashed hedges, the atmosphere is colourless, and the soul seems to escape from the languid and minute business of men, in contemplation of the unfaltering strength of the fresh and sleepless skies, and the "central peace subsisting for ever at the heart of their endless agitations." There is but little sound upon this hill-solitude of pale, short-grassed turf but the whispering of the sibilous wind in the greater gorse, whose warm flowers are set about with dry, sharp spines. It patches the shoulder of the upland with cloth of gold, this shrub with its tawny, aromatic blossom, before which Linnæus fell to weeping, and knelt for joy, the first time he saw it yellowing with "heavenly alchemy," the crisp turf of some English mountain of myrrh and hill of frankincense.

On a dry heath, a bare down, upon the places of wide prospect and the stony seats of Pan, it seems enough that the light is unimpeded, that the clear stream of the wind flows without a bar, and there is nothing between us and the sun. "You never enjoy the earth aright" (wrote Thomas Traherne, in his "Divine Raptures") "until the sun itself floweth through your veins, till you are clothed with the heavens and crowned with the stars, and perceive yourself to be the sole heir of the whole world."

Birds seem the loosened souls of a tree. Is there not some tradition that the first birds were made out of "a rose, and a blade of grass, and a breath of the winds"—the souls of the trees winged and voiced?

Now and again, in the grey-limbed, leafless orchard, above the cold agile wind slipping by on either hand, is to be heard the cold treble notes of birds that seem to swim and float upon the stream of the air, and distil from it like water-drops, as the birds' wings trace their innumerable paths across the earth. There is no sound in Nature like a bird's voice, from the inflected cry of the playing plover and the blackbird's oboe voice—a note blown through a glass flute, dulcis, durabilis, clara, pura, secans aera et auribus sedens—to the hedge-bird's pittering note of meditation, then zee, zee, tsui, tsui, clink, clink, and a thin chipping and tapping upon a miniature whetstone; and the notes that are like the chiming of pebbles upon a sheet of smooth ice. Southey, indeed, found the finch's note in the sound of a stone thrown over ice. He writes that he and Coleridge found out that stones flung upon a lake when frozen make a noise like singing birds, and when you whirl on it a large flake of ice "away the shivers slide, chirping and warbling like a flight of finches."

St. Augustine speaks somewhere of the "luminosus limen amicitiae," and the phrase, "the luminous threshold," recurs to one just now upon the doorway of the remote and fragrant region of spring, both in the dry days of protracted light, and again, during one of the sudden showers of the season, when washing the threadbare woods, and coming towards us with that peculiar rushing sound, rain-drops bright as sparks sprinkle the threshold of spring with lustral waters. And when the rain is over-past, there follows the sound of tiny runnels in the grass, the fresh "suck" of the ground as it drinks the moisture, as of one over-hastily drinking from a cup; while draughts of wind shake down the shining drops from the twigs of the thorn upon the lustrous mat of last year's leaves.

There is a deserted avenue of oaks, carpeted with pale grass and tufts of bluish-green gorse, and soaked red bracken. Buff sheep, indistinguishable in colour from the litter of dry oak leaves, are lying upon the wintry grass, and under the short, sturdy trees with green, mossy plinths and powdered shafts. Overhead, against the pale sky, their branches spread into a net of fine twigs, sun-shot with pale olives and fawns, and like Circe's web, "imperishable such as is the handiwork of the goddesses, fine of woof and full of grace and splendour," for in winter oaks, especially old oaks, gain a fresh grandeur when leafless, as the vast weight of their athletic branches is more easily guessed when their contours are no longer hidden away among the dense foliage. Through the moist turf, bright channels of water ramify like the twisted shoots of an old vine, and tick among the grass. To the left is the wide flat level of the plain, with low, wave-like hills rising on its verge; to the right a channel of luminous flood-water reflecting the leafless bushes that fringe it; and from the bushes, from the fawn-coloured ploughland, from the threadbare copse, from the clear patch of springing wheat, the wild, rain-laden essence of spring rises like an exhalation.

On the flat roof of the hill, where the sunshine is now and again overcome with blots of cloud, the bright rushing of the wind passes over the sleek bents and close grass sprinkled with small white snail-shells no bigger than a nail-head. There was a scattering, too, of ochre-tinted boulders, each with its sharp shadow shot out right in front of it, and in among the green grass, germs of plants—miniature bird's foot trefoil, infinitely small silky-centred plantains, embryo daisies. There is no sound but the wind whistling, like shaken silk, or the surf thrown up by a miniature sea upon a miniature shore, in the grass bents, and a lark, bright bird, splashing in the light, as in water.

Round the roof of the hill the clouds stream, very slowly on the rim of the blue, and swiftly overhead in the mid-stream of its flowing glaze—some thin as a grey foam bubble, some impenetrable, shadowed, and solid as a reef; some smaller, like swans, drifting down the stream. Far below, from this Olympian height, shine the habitable roofs of the village, the green and buff divided fields, the thread-like highways, the yellow sheep crowded in a gateway, the horse-pond no bigger than a silver spangle, the fine loop of a stream vibrating like a shining wire. The bright distance, the bareness of the hill, its flowerless turf, gives a fineness to what is seen, as if the recollection had been strained to clearness through the hour-glass of Time.

The many-weathered month is full of undescribed sounds. The aimless brown leaf scratches the white road and brushes the neighbour tree, and the dry-tongued wind patters in the ivy. Where last year's leaves lie bedded under beech-trees they are stirred by "a running that could not be seen of skipping beasts"; and there is a crisp rustling in the dry grass and dead leaves, as dozens of little black spiders run into it, a creaking of bough against bough, a strong humming in the yellow-powdered bee-alluring shallows, almost as loud as the phantom of a sullen song that comes and goes among the wires of telegraph-poles.

"Pure colour almost always gives the idea of fire, or rather it is perhaps as if a light shone through as well as the colour itself. The fresh green blade of corn is like this." So is the lilac and syringa, pricked with upward-pointing, transparent leaves, looking as if it had been held to a fire, until a flame had caught upon every twig, a very "hand of glory."

By the Buddhists of the Zen teaching, stress was laid upon the contemplation of Nature in all her aspects, as a discipline to the soul and as a means of purging the spirit of all the calls of the flesh. The beauties of Nature were but the mirror in which the disciple should see the miracles of his own soul repeated. But not the disciple's soul is the mirror in which he should see the miracles of Nature repeated. We shine with the sun. "Let the shadow advance upon the dial, I can watch it with equanimity, while it is there to be watched. It is only when the shadow is not there, that the dial is terrible." Light clarifies us, height raises us; the bareness of a poor hill-pasture has some of the effect of personal austerity.

Looking down upon the tree-tops of a wood or copse from a height, some weeks ago, there seemed to come a greyish tinge, upon the branches, then a thickening until the eye could not see down into the wood, dense and veiled with its narrow buds. Then this gave place to a reddish-purple, very vivid against the enamel-blue of cloudless March, and certain light points, like lighted wicks, showed themselves—the enormous pale cone-like buds of the horse chestnut. Then the larches lifted their boughs and dipped themselves in their flawless colour, as of "green silks but newly washed," and now followed by the first fine fledgling leaves of each tree, all beautifully distinct in colour. But even when leafless each tree is as strange and wonderful a thing and as distinct as in June. The chandelier-curves of the ash branches, the rutted bark of elms, the creased grey elephant-hide of the oak, the aspen-bark that looks as if it had been slit up and down with the point of a knife, the rosy-fingered willows, the pale-skinned smooth shaft of the beech, with its snake-like undulations, pleasant to see and to touch. Burke was assuredly right in maintaining that there exists a very close connection between sight and feeling, and in tracing the agreeable sensations arising from the sight of soft, smooth surfaces to this connection. What we see, we touch, as with our hand. From the smooth columnar beech we get that "something peculiarly sweet" that Gilbert White notes in the "shapely-figured aspect" of chalk hills in comparison with the angular broken hills of stone.

CORRESPONDENCE

LINE-LENGTHS IN POETRY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In Mr. Omond's letter in your issue of September 26th he lays stress on the necessity for proving that short and common measures are not more than varieties of long measure, and suggests that proof would be afforded could we find a poet using the three forms interchangeably without apparent consciousness of alteration. I can recollect only one poem where the three forms are used together—Shelley's "Lines," of which the first stanza follows:

"The cold earth slept below,
Above the cold sky shone;
And all around, with a chilling sound,
From caves of ice and fields of snow,
The breath of night like death did flow
Beneath the sinking moon."

Shelley was probably conscious of the alteration, as the first three stanzas follow this model, and only in the last is the opening short measure, or Alexandrine, amplified by the word "below" to common measure, or ordinary ballad. This amplification seems to be a breathing out of the suppressed passion of the first part of the poem, and the whole combination appeals to me intensely as a technically perfect stanza. In analyzing the stanza, I assume that each pair of lines is a complete verse, the three verses being respectively in Alexandrine, romance, and ballad, or short, long, and common measures. The following is my division:

The cold / earth slept / below /, / above / the cold / sky shone /;
And all / around /, with a chill / lug sound /, from caves / of ice / and fields / of snow /
The breath / of night / like death / did flow / beneath / the sin / king moon /.

When speaking of an Alexandrine I mean the original verse so designated—that is, a verse of six stresses divided into two equal parts by a distinct pause. I believe this pause to have been a necessary and characteristic feature, and a pause plays as important a part in a foot as a syllable.

The step from the romance metre of eight stresses, or feet, since stresses may be suppressed, to the ballad metre of seven feet seems fairly evident. In his first volume of "English Prosody," Professor Saintsbury points out that the romance metre showed a constant tendency to drop a foot. This tendency was strengthened by the necessity to gasp in taking breath at the end of a verse, and the foot may have been dropped either at the beginning or at the end of the verse, resulting in unequal verses, some divided with the four stressed half coming first, some with the three stressed half coming first. Examples of the latter are of fairly frequent occurrence—in Chapman's "Homer," Book i., verses 134 and 249, and Book ii., verse 155, are the following:

"Persuade me to my wrong. Wouldst thou maintain in sure abode

My counsels with respect? Mine eyes yet never witness were

That followed him, took up. Himself to Agamemnon went.

In the ballads the romance and ballad metres constantly combine: in the first part of "The Hunting of the Cheviot," out of twenty-four stanzas, eighteen are ballad, six romance. The following form is common:

"I wish I were where Helen lies;
Night and day on me she cries;
Oh, that I were where Helen lies,
On fair Kirkconnell lea!"

The blending is very spirited in "King Cophetua and the Beggar-Maid":

"The blinded boy, that shootes so trim,
From heaven downe did heie;
He drew a dart and shot at him,
In place where he did lye:
Which soon did pierse him to the quicke,
And when he felt the arrow pricke
Which in his tender heart did sticke,
He looketh as he would die.
'What sudden chance is this,' quoth he,
'That I to live must subject be,
Which never thereto would agree
But still did it defie?'"

It will be noted that after every ballad verse of seven stresses there is a distinct pause, whilst there is none, or only the slightest, at the ends of the romance verses. The length of the pause cannot be determined with certainty—it may not have the full value of a foot, probably has not, as a pause tends to shorten, to collapse on itself as it were—but this pause following ballad verses is without doubt much longer than that following romance verses. In the following stanza, however, a curious fact may be observed:

"We played at love in Mulga town,
And O, her eyes were blue!
We played at love in Mulga town,
And love's a game for two.
If three should play, alack a day!
There's one of them will rue,
Dear Heart!
There's one of them will rue!"

This is from Ogilvie's "In Mulga Town," and the device at the end is one frequent use. The fact to be noted is that the stanza could be rounded off at the first "rue," and all its verses then would be ordinary ballad verses; but the addition of "Dear Heart" converts the line of three stresses into one of four, followed up by another of three:

"If three should play, alack a day!
There's one of them will rue, Dear Heart!
There's one of them will rue."

The result is, as it were, a telescoping of two verses, one romance and one ballad; so that the first two lines form a romance verse, or the last two a ballad verse. Furthermore, the pause at the end of the ballad verse disappears when "Dear Heart!" is introduced, the metre running on smoothly and naturally, so that the pause is evidently of sufficient duration to allow of the insertion of two syllables—in fact, of a foot. The conclusion, then, appears to be, that a ballad verse is a romance verse with a silent foot at the end. This telescoped verse has been exceedingly popular in its double form, as seen in "Dowsabel":

"This mayden in a morn betime
Went forth, when May was in her prime,
To get sweet cetywall,
The honeysuckle, the harlocke,
The lilly and the lady-smocke,
To deck her summer hall."

A curious reference to the claims of the two forms, romance and ballad, to popular favour, appears in A Midsummer Night's Dream, Act III., scene 1, v. 24, etc.:

Quince: Well, we will have such a prologue; and it shall be written in eight and six.

Bottom: No, make it two more; let it be written in eight and eight.

It is easier to show that the Nibelungen is closely related to ballad metre. The following stanza from Miss Rossetti's "He and She" combines a verse of each:

"Should one of us remember,
And one of us forget,
I wish I knew what each would do—
But who can tell as yet?"

This is the basic metre of Macaulay's "Horatius," and in forty out of its forty-five stanzas the two metres occur side by side. It has been called Nibelungen, as it forms the principal metre of the German epic, the "Nibelungen Noth." The verses of that epic do not uniformly conform to this type, syllables being freely dropped or inserted. Often the last section of the verse closing a stanza is lengthened out in the manner of the Alexandrine at the close of a Spenserian stanza:

"Now came the lovely maiden, as morning comes in rose
From sullen cloud forth-stealing; then sundered many woes
From men's faint hearts, new gladdened to have old aches dispelled;
He saw the lovely maiden, her gracious splendour he beheld."

As if recognising the fact that a syllable has been dropped from the middle, the verses will sometimes be found printed as above, divided into two parts. The Nibelungen verse has a most distinctive lilt, which has been brought about by the dropping of a stressed syllable. Printed at length, Miss Rossetti's verses would be divided as follows:

Should one/ of us/ remem/ber, / and one/ of us/forget/,
I wish/ I knew/ what each/ would do/—but who/ can tell/ as yet?/

A considerable number of short poems have been written in the Nibelungen metre by British poets, but one must turn to the poetry of Germany and Denmark to see the amount of variation of which this metre is capable. In the first place, the long terminal verse reads, in English, rather awkwardly at first. It very rarely occurs in British poetry; the following is an example from that metrical master, Burns:

"Sae flaxen were her ringlets,
Her eyebrows of a darker hue."

The slight awkwardness is caused by the pause which takes the place of the dropped stressed syllable; restore the syllable, and the verse reads smoothly enough:—

"Sae flaxen were her ringlets,
Her eyebrows of a darker hue."
Bewitchingly o'erarching
Twa laughing een o' bonie blue.

"Such was my Chloris' bonie face,
When first that bonie face I saw,
And ay my Chloris' dearest charm—
She says she lo'es me best of a'!"

The result is a romance verse. Instances occur where a dropped syllable is restored, and a ballad verse results:

"Da sprach der Fürste Sigmund: 'Deine Rede ist mir leid'; ('Prince Sigmund spake in answer: 'Woful is thy speech to me');")

"Da wuchs in Niederlanden eines reichen Königes Kind."
('In Netherlands was fostered once a wealthy monarch's child.')

The same metre, the Nibelungen, is widely used in the Danish ballad. Celenschlaeger uses it in "Hrolf Krake," an heroic poem in twelve books; and Winther also uses it in a series of poems entitled "Woodcuts." The metre varies almost in the same way as in the German, but it contains a much greater number of pure ballad verses. The lengthened end-verse of the German appears to be absent, but, on the other hand, a verse is common in it that I do not remember seeing in the German. The following is a stanza from Winther's "Steffen og Aune":

"Naar Aftensolen slog sit Blik mod Havet ned,
Og vort Kirketaarn og Husene de rødmede derved,
Han holte sine Arme paa Dørens grønne Braet,
Og skued ned i Dalen, og blev dog aldrig traet."

("When on the ocean fell the sun's low evening beam,
And our houses and church steeple were rose-tinted from the gleam,
Upon the door's board mossy his folded arms he laid,
Whilst down the vale below him his glance unwearied strayed.")

Here the last two verses are of the normal type, the Nibelungen, the second is ballad, whilst the first is Alexandrine, having dropped the unstressed as well as the stressed syllables of the fourth foot. It is to be supposed that as the pause is always present in the ordinary Nibelungen verse, it is also present when it takes the form of the Alexandrine. This type of verse is of very frequent occurrence in the Danish Nibelungen, and it tends to show that there certainly is a verse divided into two equal portions by a silent foot. Were this occasional verse to form the normal verse of a poem, the pause would probably be shortened, or even disappear, as it apparently has done in one form of the English Alexandrine.

I should not have resorted to foreign poems could I have found examples in our British poetry; but, owing to its much wider range, the German and Danish Nibelungen metre shows its close connection with the ballad, romance, and Alexandrine metres much more decidedly than the British form does.

The Alexandrine appears in the British ballad, the following being from the Robin Hood series:

"And yf I toke it twyse,
A shame it were to me:
But trewly, gentyll knyght,
Welcom arte thou to me."

"Robyn," said our kyng,
'Now pray I the
To sell me some of that cloth,
To me and my meynè.'"

I think it can hardly be doubted that each Alexandrine is here divided by a pause:

"And yf I toke it twyse, a shame it were to me":

and the Danish ballads show that a syllable at one time occupied that pause; whilst the German and Danish both show, in the Nibelungen verse, that that syllable is also accompanied by a pause.

I do not for a moment deny that the Alexandrine, as now used, runs on without pause: my contention is that originally it was divided, and is, like the ballad and Nibelungen, a variety of romance metre. I submit, however, that even in poems like Browning's "Abt Vogler," the mid-pause is still evident in many of the verses; it may be atrophied, but it is there.

This brings me to the second important question in Mr. Omond's letter. He asks why the law of eight stresses to a full natural line only applies to writers of our own or kindred races, and why the Greeks so markedly favoured lines of six beats. I do not know the classical metres sufficiently to say much concerning them; but of the hexameter this much may be said: that whilst it had only six feet, these feet might be said to bear not six stresses, but any number from seven to twelve; that is, allowing the long syllables to be the equivalent of the present stressed syllables—and if this be not allowed, then it cannot be allowed that they had even six beats. There is, perhaps, no doubt, however, that a foot of Greek poetry was much longer than a foot of present iambic or even anapestic poetry; so that an hexameter would more than equal, in breath-volume, a romance line. Howbeit, the hexameter is an early development, in the same way as the Icelandic stave or the Anglo-Saxon alliterative couplet. These metres are no longer living, and whilst it is to be presumed that they all perfectly satisfied the reciters and listeners of their time, they have become extinct types, and cannot again be revived in their old forms. The modern imitation of the hexameter has nothing of the majesty of the hexameter itself, but that majesty is of the past; and it is a law of growth that a type once perfected and lost can never appear again. I do not suppose that we have by any means reached the ultimate form of our verse; but I am confident that whilst the world-poets of younger growth were striving for the natural form along such varying lines as hexameter and stave, these have evolved to and crystallized in the common or ballad measure of seven beats.

In conclusion, I would express my sincere thanks for the courteous consideration given to me, an outsider, both by Mr. Omond and yourself.

JOHANNES C. ANDERSEN.

Government Buildings, Christchurch, New Zealand.

December 21st, 1908.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Your courteous comments on my letter of the 20th ult. have left me—unconvinced. May I tell you why?

1. As to Addison. You quote Mr. Courthope as your authority for the statement that Addison and Swift were "warm friends." Mr. Courthope bases his opinion on two documents: a letter of the Dean's to Archbishop King, in which Swift compliments Addison; and a dedication to Swift, in which Addison flatters the Dean. These documents do not—in my humble judgment—justify the inference which Mr. Courthope is disposed to draw. They prove nothing. It is necessary to read them in the light of the circumstances under which they were written. Addison was a Secretary of State, exiled in Dublin, the representative of the English Government. Swift was the savage castigator of statesmen and administrations, who might at any moment turn "ag'in the Government" with his accustomed devastating ferocity. At most, the writer of the letter and the author of the dedication may each be described as a diplomatist holding a candle to the devil. Addison was temperamentally incapable of conceiving a warm friendship for a man of Dean Swift's idiosyncrasies. And Swift was incapable of remaining the warm friend of any man.

2. As to Sheridan. You say: "The reference in our article was, of course, to Sheridan the elder." By "Sheridan the elder" is meant, equally, of course, Sheridan's father, who wrote a "Life of Swift." But Sheridan the elder was a youth in his early twenties when the Dean died. It was Sheridan's grandfather who was a favourite of the Dean. Dr. Sheridan was a Dublin schoolmaster, an accomplished scholar, an eccentric divine and an inveterate wag. He achieved a degree of intimacy with Swift permitted to no other man. He had become necessary to the Dean's mental comfort. Swift kept him about his person in the same way and for much the same reasons that kings kept court fools. In those black intervals of tragic gloom and incipient madness which ushered in the end, the lonely, disappointed, embittered satirist found solace and stimulus in the unflagging spirits and abounding jests of the reverend author of "The Art of Punning."

Permit me to add that when ordinary readers—of whom I confess myself—find cited in a critical article the names of a number of the greatest lights in English literature, commencing with Congreve and Dryden and ending with Addison and Sheridan, they have but one identification for the last-named writer. They do not read into the name "Sheridan's father" or "Sheridan's grandfather." And the ordinary readers are right, I think.

WILLIAM MACKAY.

Oulton Broad, Suffolk, March 1st, 1909.

[1. I am in agreement with Mr. Mackay on one or two points: viz., that Swift was incapable of remaining the warm friend of any man. But that does not prove that he was unable to feel a warm friendship at all: friendships, as everyone knows, are not always permanent. Also, I agree regarding the difference of the two characters. But to say that Addison was "temperamentally incapable of conceiving a warm friendship for" Swift is rash: persons of widely differing temperaments and tastes frequently become close comrades. In any case, one is entitled to assume that W. J. Courthope is at least the equal of Mr. Mackay as an authority, and would not have made such definite statements in a standard work without due deliberation. 2. As to the other point at issue, I need only say that the "ordinary reader" who is as well-informed as your correspondent would not doubt for a moment which of the Sheridans was indicated.—THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.]

MR. HARDY'S NOVELS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Those of your readers whose interest in the Wessex novels has been aroused or revived by your article on "Thomas Hardy" may be glad to know of three stories which have not been reprinted since their appearance in periodicals many years ago.

They are: (1) "An Indiscretion in the Life of an Heiress," published in the New Quarterly Magazine, July 1878; (2) "The Waiting Supper," in Murray's Magazine, January and February, 1888; and (3) "The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid," in the Graphic Summer Number for 1883. This last is obtainable in a cheap pirated edition, published in New York.

I am unable to offer any explanation why these charming stories have not been included in Messrs. Macmillan's new eighteen-volume pocket edition of Mr. Hardy's works.

STUART MASON.

March 1.

"THE KING'S ENGLISH."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—W. McC. quotes our words "... indulgent enough to refer our condemnation to the very common abuse ...," and thus comments: "I should correct that phrase in a boy's essay thus: to refer to our condemnation of."

We are as clay in the hands of a critic who treats these two expressions as synonymous, and gravely offers one as a substitute for the other; he moulds us as he will. We withdraw from the unequal combat, profoundly impressed by "W. McC.'s" genius for correction, and assuring him (in trembling anticipation of possible future achievements in the way of synonym) that we really mean "correction," not "correctness," however strong his preference for the latter word on æsthetic or other grounds.

It is a pleasure to us to be able to add that we are in cordial agreement with "W. McC." as to the quantity of the middle vowel in ducere.

THE AUTHORS OF "THE KING'S ENGLISH."

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

An Oxford Tutor: The Life of Rev. Thomas Short, B.D. C. E. H. Edwards. Elliot Stock, 1s. 6d. net.

Life and Work of Lord Rosebery. James Renwick. Mitford Publishing Co., 1s. net.

DRAMA

Joan of Arc. A historical drama in five acts. John Presland. Simpkin, Marshall, 5s. net.

FICTION

Within Four Walls. J. Bloundelle-Burton. John Milne, 6s.

Dear Fatherland. Ex-Lieutenant Bilsle. John Lane, 1s. net.

The Prince's Franks. Charles Lowe. John Lane, 6s.

Geoffrey Cheriton. John Barnett. Smith, Elder, 6s.

The New June. Henry Newbolt. Blackwood & Sons, 6s.
Faith. R. B. Cunningham Graham. Duckworth, 6s.
A Castle of Dreams. Netta Tyrett. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
Teresa. Edith Ayrton Zangwill. Smith, Elder, 6s.

HISTORY

A Literary History of Persia. Edward G. Browne, M.A., M.B. Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.
Madrid. Albert F. Calvert. John Lane, 3s. 6d. net.
England. A popular history for young people. Frances E. Cooke. Unwin, 1s. 6d. net.
Malaria and Greek History, by W. H. T. Jones, to which is added The History of Greek Therapeutics and the Malaria Theory, by E. T. Withington. Sherratt & Hughes, 5s. net.
Studies in Roman History (Second Series). E. G. Hardy, M.A., D.Litt. Swan Sonnenschein, 6s.

JUVENILE

Jan of the Windmill. Juliana Horatia Ewing. Bell, 2s. 6d. net.

MAGAZINES FOR MARCH

The Fortnightly Review, The Century, Cornhill, Windsor, Contemporary Review, English Review, Blackwood's, Travel and Exploration, Socialist Review, Celtic Review, Empire Review, Book Monthly, The International, The Art Journal, The Country Home, Deutsche Rundschau, The Dickensian, Merveire de France, Scotia, Journal of the Gipsy Lore Society, Connoisseur.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Letters of John Ruskin, 1827-1869. George Allen, 25s.
The Letters of John Ruskin, 1870-1889. George Allen, 25s.
The Shakespeare Problem. E. A. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s.
National Independence. Francis Francis. Constable, 6d. net.
In re Shakespeare Beeching v. Greenwood. (Rejoinder on behalf of the defendant.) G. G. Greenwood, M.P. John Lane, 2s. 6d. net.
The Sense of the Infinite. A Study of the Transcendental Element in Literature, Life, and Religion. Oscar Kuhns. Holt & Co., New York; Bell & Son, England, $1.50.
The Wander Years. Being some accounts of journeys into Life, Letters, and Art. J. H. Yoxall, M.P. Smith, Elder, 6s. net.
Psychology and Crime. Hugo Münsterberg. Fisher Unwin, 5s. net.
Marcus Aurelius. From the Russian of "Merejkowski." G. A. Mounsey. Moring, 1s. 6d.
Psyche's Task. A discourse concerning the influence of superstition on the growth of institutions. J. C. Frazer, D.C.L., LL.D., Lit.D. Macmillan, 2s. 6d. net.
Tacitus-Germania. Edited by J. F. Stout. University Tutorial Press, Ltd., 21s. 6d.
The Russo-Japanese War. A Sketch. Captain F. R. Sedgwick. Swan Sonnenschein, 5s. net.
A Student's Text-Book of Zoology. Adam Sedgwick. Swan Sonnenschein, 24s.
A New Primer of English Literature. T. G. Tucker and Walter Murdoch. Bell, 2s. 6d.
Notes on the Science of Picture-Making. C. J. Holmes. Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.
The Immortals' Great Quest. Translated from an unpublished manuscript in the library of a Continental university. James William Barlow. Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net.
Military Needs and Military Policy. The Right Hon. H. O. Arnold-Forster, M.P. Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net.
The English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare. J. J. Jusserland. Translated from the French by Elizabeth Lee. Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.
Opinions on Men, Women, and Things. Harry Quilter. Swan Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d. net.

POETRY

Breath of the World. Starr Hoyt Nichols. Putnam, 6s. net.
The Voice in the Cliff. Arthur Maquarie. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s. net.
New Poems. Arnold Wall. Walter Scott Publishing Co., 1s. net.

Roses and Shamrock. L. Ann Cunningham. Moring, 5s. net.
Our Flag, our Rose, and our Country, with other Poems. John McDowell Leavitt. Bible League Book Company.

REFERENCE

Handbook to the Technical and Art Schools and Colleges of the United Kingdom. Scott, Greenwood & Son, 3s. 6d. net.
Drumhey's Year-Book for East Africa, 1909. Being a complete calendar, directory, and gazetteer for the British East Africa and the Zanzibar Protectorates; and containing information about Uganda and German East Africa. Arranged and compiled by J. S. A. Drumhey. Drumhey.
The Schoolmasters' Year-Book and Directory, 1909. A Reference Book of Secondary Education in England and Wales. Year-Book Press, c/o Swan Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

The Treasury of Jesus; Brief Recollections for the Forty Days of Lent. Rev. Charles C. Bell, M.A. Mowbray, 6d. net; 1s. cloth.
Church Reform. Rev. A. R. Sharpe, M.A. Mowbray, 3d.
Weeds and Flowers in the Soul's Garden. Flora Lucy Freeman. Mowbray, 1d.
A Plain Guide to the Communion Office. Ven. George Arbuthnot, D.D. Mowbray, 1d.
Prayer. Rev. Robert Lawrence Ottley, D.D. Mowbray, 1d.
Counsels and Precepts (translated from the French), with a Preface by the Rev. George Body, D.D. Mowbray, 3s. 6d. net.
Life after Death. Rev. S. C. Gayford, M.A. Masters & Co., 2s. 6d. net.
Reginald Pecock's Book of Faith. A Fifteenth-Century Theological Tractate. J. L. Morison. Maclehoose, 5s. net.
Christ's Conquest, and other Sermons. Rev. Canon Liddon. Allenson, 6d.
Dangers of the Day. Monsignor John T. Canon Vaughan. Ave Maria Press, 1 franc.
Bible League Essays in Bible Defence and Exposition. John McDowell Leavitt. Bible League Book Company.

ORDER FROM YOUR LIBRARY

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

[Ready March 4]

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only pathos from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his—worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

[Ready March 4]

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

THE CENTURY PRESS, 6-9 Surrey St., Strand, London.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss Messrs. The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

DARTMOOR.—BOARDING-IN, PRIVATE HOUSE: Men only from November to March; very suitable for reading parties; lovely country, warm, and sheltered position. — Apply "CANTAB," Middlecote, Ilington, S. Devon.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS, &c.
32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.
NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND WEEKLY PERIODICALS.
AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE DIRECTORIES.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 50s. net, for 32s. Bartholomew's Survey Gazetteer British Isles, 17s. 6d. net, for 5s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale

THE ART OF GARDEN DESIGN IN ITALY, by Inigo Triggs: 73 Photographic Plates in Collotype, 27 Plans and numerous Sketches in the Text: 4to, buckram; published Longmans, 1906, at £3 13s. 6d. net; for 21s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE FORTUNE PLAYHOUSE,
41 Brewer Street, W.

MADAME DE PERROT
WILL GIVE
FIVE LECTURES (IN ENGLISH)
ON FRIDAY EVENINGS, AT 8.15.

March 12. Mademoiselle de Lespinasse and d'Alembert.
" 19. Madame de Stael and Benjamin Constant.
" 26. Madame George Sand and Alfred de Musset.
April 2. Madame de Récamiér and Chateaubriand.

Subscription Tickets, 21s. and 10s. 6d.; Single Tickets, 5s., 2s. 6d., and 1s.; of the usual Agents and Chappell & Co., Ltd., 50 New Bond Street, W.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.
LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.
140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).
Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

A. LIONEL ISAACS,
59 PICCADILLY, W.

RARE BOOKS, AUTOGRAPHS, & MSS.

Speciality:—French Illustrated Books of the Eighteenth Century and Modern French EDITIONS DE LUXE.

* * Gentlemen wishing to dispose of any of these will oblige by kindly reporting same to me.

Catalogue of Rare Books and MSS now ready.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIATHE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

AN ILLUSTRATED BOOK NEWS MAGAZINE

MAY we draw your attention to "THE BOOK MONTHLY"—of which the March number is now ready—and its usefulness to all concerned with books?

Its information about new books—those coming out and those just out—is full and authoritative. Its articles, especially those on the book trade and on new movements in the book world, are fresh and informing. In "get-up" it is exceedingly attractive, and its illustrations are many and excellent.

There is no other monthly magazine which does the same service as "The Book Monthly"; that is, gives in a compact, agreeable way all the news and information of the current month in bookland—a pictured and picturesque What's What and Who's Who of our English Bookland from month to month.

The magazine is published at Sixpence net at the beginning of each month by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send it, post free, inland or abroad, for a year for Eight Shillings.

LORD ROSEBERY MR. BENJAMIN KIDD AND PUBLIC OPINION

Lord Rosebery, in a letter to the Editor of "Public Opinion," dated November 28, 1908, from Dalmeny House, Edinburgh, says:—"I can truly say that 'Public Opinion' is a weekly joy to me. It gives me just what I want to read."

Mr. Benjamin Kidd, Author of "Social Evolution" and "Principles of Western Civilization," writing from The Warders, Tonbridge, November, 1908, says:—"I take 'Public Opinion' every week, and find it one of the principal means of continuing my education that the world provides."

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity

EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London E.C.

Specimens free on application.

From Everett & Co.'s List

NEW FICTION.

MRS. WHISTON'S HOUSE PARTY
By THOMAS COBB.

THE DEVIL'S ACE
By FERGUS HUME.

"A 'mystery' novel of the first water."—Western Mail.

FELIX STONE
By A. & C. ASKEW.

THE DEGENERATE
By FRED WHISHAW.

THE IRON HEEL
By JACK LONDON.

"The Iron Heel' is a book for all to read, and its insight, large sympathy, clear reasoning, and high aims are in evidence in every chapter."—Pall Mall Gazette.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS
By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"A justifiable attack on those who seek to honour God by dishonouring His methods. . . . Miss Graham tells the story with charm and pathos."—Daily Telegraph.

"Deserves the attention it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

BROTHER OFFICERS
By HORACE WYNDHAM.

"Mr. Wyndham at his best."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Wyndham always writes of military life as one who knows it, and his slight sketches of officers are happy and unexaggerated."—Globe.

London: EVERETT & Co., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

A GREAT novel in GREAT demand is PRIESTS OF PROGRESS

By G. COLMORE. (Second Edition.)

It throws a searching ray of light on a great public question.

The SPECTATOR says: "The book is powerfully written, and its subject demands attention."

DID SHE DO RIGHT?

By A. J. MACDONNELL.

A Story of Modern Rome and a Mixed Marriage.

FIRST TWO OPINIONS.

"An interesting romance. The authoress's pictures of present-day life in Rome are excellent."—BIRMINGHAM POST.

"The characterisation is on broad lines and is quite effective, while the plot runs merrily through 400 pages."—MANCHESTER COURIER.

THE BROKEN SNARE

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN.

A powerful, psychological study of the marriage relation by a new writer, portraying the struggle and ultimate surrender of a man and woman of high ideals who do not believe in the marriage ceremony. "Beautifully and brilliantly written."

TOM GALLON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN

READY NEXT WEEK at all Libraries and Booksellers.

OTHER NEW 6/- NOVELS.

THE TRICKSTER - - G. B. Burgin.

THE LEVELLER - - Alexander McArthur.

THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE
E. Everett Green.

BANZAI! - - - "Parabellum."

AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE. Richard Duffy.

ANOTHER LARGE EDITION NOW READY.

THE DEVIL IN LONDON, by Geo. R. Sims. 1s. net.

London: STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community.

Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net.

A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 22 2s. net. [Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net

[Shortly

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST

Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century

By G. HERMINE MARIUS.

Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS, with a Photogravure and 130 Reproductions in Half Tone.

Royal 8vo, panelled cloth gilt, 15s. net.

The Author of this work—herself an artist—is well known in Holland as a critic of great individuality. Her studies of Ruskin, the three brothers Maris, and her book on Rembrandt have been much appreciated for their sound judgment, a quality not always allied to such enthusiasm as she displays in dealing with her subject.

OLD LONDON

A Series of Fifty Reproductions of Old Engravings Illustrative of the London of our Ancestors.

Compiled by WALTER L. McNAY.

Large 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"Architects and readers of antiquarian tastes will take note of Mr. McNay's 'Old London' . . . The Plates are extremely interesting and carefully reproduced."—Westminster Gazette.

"'Old London' is a book which will appeal to all lovers of old prints."—Daily Mail.

THE ESSAYS OF MEREJKOWSKI

Translated from the Russian by G. A. MOUNSEY.

Fcap. 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net each.

THE LIFE-WORK OF HENDRIK IBSEN.
THE LIFE-WORK OF PLINY THE YOUNGER.
THE LIFE-WORK OF MONTAIGNE.
THE LIFE-WORK OF CALDERON.
THE LIFE-WORK OF FLAUBERT.
MARCUS AURELIUS. Just Published.

Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A MANUAL OF COSTUME, AS ILLUSTRATED BY MONUMENTAL BRASSES. By HERBERT DRUITT.

Indispensable handbook for all interested in Brasses and Costume and Mediæval Archaeology.

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

By Professor H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH. With diagrams. Square 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each. Sold separately.

These books are intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. For this purpose they will be found a valuable aid to a practical working knowledge of the German language. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the reading examples and diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments will help to fix the names in the memory.

MY LITTLE FRENCH FRIENDS.

By LINA OSWALD. Containing many Illustrations by JEAN BAKEWELL and others, also from Photographs. Demy 8vo, cloth. 2s.

A First book in French written in everyday speech and containing songs with simple music, as well as stories and verse. This is issued uniform with "Little German Folk."

A complete Catalogue will be sent on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD.

The De La More Press, 32 George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

At all Libraries and Bookshops

A NOTABLE WAGNER VOLUME.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF WAGNER. By ANGELO NEUMANN. With 4 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.

"His recollections make us understand Wagner."—Daily News.

A ROMANTIC AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By FRANCIS GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism" and "The Celtic Temperament." Demy 8vo. 6/- net.

Mr. Grierson is known to lovers of critical literature by two small volumes of excellent literary criticism. "The Valley of Shadows" has all the interest and movement of a fascinating and realistic romance.

THE DAYS OF GEORGE THE FOURTH. GLIMPSES OF THE TWENTIES. By WILLIAM TOYNBEE, Author of "Vignettes of the Regency." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Plates. Demy 8vo. 12/6 net.

Mr. Toynbee has the town of that time in his mind's eye; its characters are those he lives with, their stories are his stories, and the living, flashing interplay of real life as it was lived in the twenties of last century seems to take form and colour under his pen.

THINGS AS THEY ARE.

ECONOMIC HERESIES: Being an Unorthodox Attempt to Appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things as They Are." By Sir NATHANIEL NATHAN. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.

The author terms this work a study of the economics of reality, meaning thereby an estimate of historical and actual values as opposed to the abstract theorising of the economic schoolmen of the last century. The book is written from the point of view of a shrewd, impartial, unconventional observer, whose politics are subordinated to practical sociology.

FOR SPEAKERS AND READERS.

NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE; OR, A COMMON-SENSE POLICY. By FRANCIS FRANCIS. Cloth, 1/- net. Paper, 6d. net.

"Dagonet" says in the Referee:—"I have received another excellent little book entitled 'National Independence; or, A Common-sense Policy.' It is a sixpennyworth of 'Wisdom While You Wait.' And the chapter on 'Universal Service' is a gem."

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS. By F. FRANKFORT MOORE

THE PERJURER. By W. E. NORRIS

THE STORY OF THYRZA. By ALICE BROWN

THE SHADOW OF THE CATHEDRAL. By VENCENTE IBANEZ. Trans. from the Spanish by Mrs. W. A. GILLESPIE.

THE ACTRESS. By LOUISE CLOSSER HALE

THE KING IN YELLOW. By R. W. CHAMBERS New ed.

The Oxford and Cambridge Review LENT TERM.

THE WORKING MAN AS AN UNDERGRADUATE.

THE THEOLOGY OF MATTHEW ARNOLD H. W. GARROD

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS: SOME DEFECTS IN THEIR CURRICULUM, AND A REMEDY A. R. GIDNEY

THE RELIGION OF THE UNDERGRADUATE

CANON F. FOAKES-JACKSON, D.D.

ST. ROSE OF VITERBO SIR HOME GORDON, BART.

THE LAST BULLFIGHT AT SALVATERRA

EDGAR PRESTAGE

THE OUTSTANDING BALKAN PROBLEM

V. HUSSEY WALSH

THE ABUSE OF THE WORD "SCIENTIFIC"

M. M. PATTISON MUIR

OLD HEIDELBERG H. R. PURCELL

OXYGEN FOR ATHLETES LEONARD HILL, M.B., F.R.S.

THE CLEAR VISION F. L. BICKLEY

Published once during each term.

Price 2/6 Net.

Annual Subscription 8/6, postage free.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.
10 ORANGE STREET LEICESTER SQUARE London, W.C. "THE COUNTRY HOME."

A Selection from MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SPRING ANNOUNCEMENT LIST, 1909

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, ETC.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. Jusserand. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A Literary History of Rome. From the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age. By J. Wight Duff, M.A. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Birth of Modern Italy. The Post-humous Papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited with Introduction, Notes and Epilogue, by the Duke Litta-Vicentini-Arese. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 40 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Buried City of Kenfig. By Thomas Gray. With a Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Haileybury College. By the Rev. L. S. Milford. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Sir Randal Cremer: A Biography. By Howard Evans. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

Miss Brightwen. The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson. With 2 Portraits and an Introduction by Edmund Gosse. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

History of Civilisation. By Charles Seignobos. Vol. I. Ancient Civilisation. II. Mediæval Civilisation. III. Contemporary Civilisation. 5s. net each volume.

SCIENCE AND NATURAL HISTORY

That Rock Garden of Ours. By Professor F. E. Hulme, F.L.S., F.S.A. With 8 Coloured Plates and 42 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Mysterious Psychic Forces. An Account of the Author's Investigations in Psychical Research, together with those of other European savants. By Camille Flammarion. With 21 Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net.

Psychical Research and the Resurrection. By James H. Hyslop, Ph.D., LL.D. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

How to Study the Stars. By L. Rudaux. With 79 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Psychology and Crime. By Hugo Munsterberg. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

CHEAPER EDITIONS

The Brahmins, Theists, and Muslims of India. By John Campbell Oman, D.Lit. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Economic Interpretation of History. By Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers. La. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Army Reform and Other Addresses. By the Rt. Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

The Rise and Progress of the South American Republics. By George W. Crichfield. Illustrated. 2 Vols. Royal 8vo, 25s. net.

Pre-Historic Rhodesia. An Examination of the Ethnological and Archaeological Evidences as to the Origin and Age of the Rock Mines and Stone Buildings, with a Gazetteer of Mediæval South Africa. By R. N. Hall. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Mexico. Its Ancient and Modern Civilisation; History and Political Conditions; Topography and Natural Resources; Industries and General Development. By C. Reginald Enoch, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Martin Hume, a Map, and 64 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Turkey in Revolution. By Charles Roden Buxton. With a Map and 32 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast. By W. A. Dutt. With about 40 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 6s. Vol. I. of the County Coast Series.

Through Uganda to Mount Elgon. With Glimpses by the Way. By the Rev. J. B. Purvis. Illustrated with Photographs, 6s.

The Panama Canal and its Makers. By Vaughan Cornish, D.Sc., F.R.G.S. With a Map and 63 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

POLITICS AND SOCIOLOGY

Modern Constitutions. A Collection of the Fundamental Laws of Seventy-Two of the most important Countries of the World. With Historical Introductions, Notes, and Bibliographies. By Walter Fairleigh Dodd, Ph.D. 21s. 6d. net.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. By V. R. Aronson. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

The Industrial and Commercial Influence of the English Patent System. By A. F. Ravenshear. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Towards Social Reform. By Canon and Mrs. Barnett. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Invasion and Conscription. By J. A. Farrer. Paper Boards, 1s. net. Vol. I. of Unwin's Sociology Series.

Papers for Thinking Welshmen. By A. W. Wade-Evans. Paper Boards, 1s. net. Unwin's Sociology Series.

Write for a copy of Mr. Fisher Unwin's Spring Announcement List. Sent post free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN
1 ADELPHI TERRACE,
LONDON, W.C.

MISCELLANEOUS

Town Planning in Practice. An Introduction to the Art of Designing Cities and Suburbs. By Raymond Unwin. With many Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Cr. 4to, 21s. net.

The Place of Animals in Human Thought. By Countess Martiniengo-Cesaresco. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

Chairs on English Earthenware. By Arthur Hayden. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 80 Full-page Plates. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Papacy: The Idea and its Exponents. By Gustav Kruger. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Faith of a Modern Protestant. By Professor W. Bousset. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

No Refuge but in Truth. By Goldwin Smith. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The Complete Plays of Robert Greene. Edited with Introduction and Notes by Thomas H. Dickinson. Thin Paper Edition, Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Leather, 3s. 6d. net. A new volume in the Mermaid Series.

Professions for Girls. By T. W. Berry. With a Preface by Lady Grove. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

How to Get Married. By the Author of "How to be Happy Though Married." Paper Covers, 1s.

NEW 6s. NOVELS

Henry in Search of a Wife. By Alphonse Courlander.

Transplanted Daughters. By Mrs. Barton Harrison.

The Canon's Dilemma. By Victor L. Whitechurch.

The Key of Life. By Alice A. Methley.

High Life in the Far East. By James Dalziel.

The Capture of Paul Beck. By M. McDonnell Bodkin.

Olive in Italy. (A new volume in the "First Novel" Library.)

John Broome's Wife. By E. B. Moffat.

The Ways of Men. By Herbert Flowerdew.

The Greater Love. By Anna McClure Sholl.

The Slave Girl of Agra. By Romesh Dutt, C.I.E.

THE ADELPHI LIBRARY OF STANDARD FICTION

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUMES.

Sister Teresa. (Revised Edition.) By George Moore.

Willowdene Will. By Halliwell Sutcliffe.

Tales of Unrest. By Joseph Conrad.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1923

MARCH 13, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

LATEST ADDITION TO ALLENSON'S SIXPENNY SERIES.

CANON LIDDON'S SERMONS

6d. Preached in St. Paul's Cathedral. 6d.
A Selection of Ten. First Cheap Issue. Demy 8vo, paper, 6d.;
Post free, 8d.

J. H. NEWMAN'S SERMONS

6d. A Selection of Twelve from the Author's Plain and 6d.
Parochial Sermons.
First Cheap Issue. Demy 8vo, post free, 8d.

Great Souls at Prayer

Fourteen Centuries of Prayer, Praise, and Aspiration. Selected and arranged by M. W. TILESTON. 32mo, 2s. 6d. net;
16mo, 2s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

THE PRIVATE DEVOTIONS OF BISHOP ANDREWES

Entirely New Reprints of Cardinal NEWMAN'S and Dr.
NEALE'S translation. Demy 16mo, neat purple cloth, red edges, 2s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

The Commonwealth.—"The volume is handy in shape and handsome in appearance."

The Practice of the Presence of God

By Brother LAWRENCE. Contains an Additional Letter. Paper,
6d. net; Cloth, 1s. net; Leather, 2s. net; postage 1d.

Spiritual Maxims of Brother Lawrence

First English issue since 1741. Paper, 6d. net; Cloth, 1s. net;
Leather, 2s. net; postage 1d.

A Short and Easy Method of Prayer

By Madame GUYON. First Cheap Complete Issue. Paper, 6d.
net; Cloth, 1s. net; Leather, 2s. net; postage 1d.

The Dream of Gerontius

By Cardinal NEWMAN. New Edition. Paper, 6d.; Cloth, 1s.
net; Leather, 2s. net.

Thoughts on Motherhood

By Lady COOTE of Ballyfin. Demy 16mo.; Cloth, 1s. net just out.

London: H. R. ALLENSON, LTD., Raquet Court, Fleet Street.

Macmillan & Co.'s New Books

Psyche's Task. A Discourse

Concerning the Influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D.
8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The book is "an attempt to sort out the seeds of good from the heap of evil which we call superstition, just as Psyche was given the task of sorting out the different kinds of seeds." The subjects dealt with are Government, Private Property, Marriage, and Respect for Human Life.

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Author of "The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic," &c. With Map and Plans. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Ancient Greek Historians

(Harvard Lectures). By J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Acropolis of Athens.

By Professor MARTIN L. D'OOGE. Illustrated. 8vo, 17s. net.

Jimbo. A Fantasy.

By ALGERNON
BLACKWOOD, Author of "John Silence," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Daily Express.—"Jimbo" is a perfect thing, a dainty masterpiece. I have never read a book quite like it. I have rarely read a book that has given me such unqualified delight."

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

2ND IMPRESSION.

TONO-BUNGAY.

By H. G. WELLS.

2ND IMPRESSION.

One Immortality.

By H. FIELDING HALL,
Author of "The Soul of a People," &c.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. MYNART
& CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDARUM LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 15x11½. 2s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.

"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbiness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.] "The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished life. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a relaxed and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR."

First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.

"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetic value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is one which few of the quatrains-planners share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.

"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TANNER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festín d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile.

"Had Browning written pirate instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these with a dash of vigour. They give a masterly sense of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festín d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.

"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a hobby. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE.

Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTLETON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.

"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'th' adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lytton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Pott 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.] "These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five has contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.

"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupilage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DUTTON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.

"His 'Elizabeth' takes something of a Shakespearian quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERGES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.

"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unfailing appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 2s. net.

"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.

"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvern Range, temp. twelfth century). By C. F. GRIFFITHS. With Cover-design by ARTHUR W. S. CROWE. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.

"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.

"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.

"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HAYNES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.

"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.

"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musical.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman.

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.

Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.

"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TRUMAN.

"Their sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

CÆDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

VOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

Page	Page
Life and Letters . . . 867	On True Simplicity . . 876
A Dream . . . 869	An Outdoor Breviary,
A Cornhill Poet . . . 869	III. 877
Mr. Archer's Two	Franiel 879
Guineas 871	Meetings of Societies . 879
Cicero Made Interesting 873	University College . . 881
Discursions 874	Correspondence . . . 881
Shorter Reviews . . . 875

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

We announced last week that the "reply" of the ex-editor of the Granta to Lord Alfred Douglas's criticism of the Granta's editorial methods, which reply appeared in the Cambridge Review of March 4th, was in the nature of a libel upon Lord Alfred Douglas. We issued writs on the printers of the Cambridge Review, Messrs. Fabb and Tyler, and on the ex-editor of the Granta. We are pleased to be able to state that the editor of the Cambridge Review has apologised in fitting terms, and that Messrs. Fabb and Tyler have also apologised, while Mr. Johnson, the publisher, assures us that the whole of the issue of the Cambridge Review of March 4th has been withdrawn.

The Archbishop of Canterbury's dear, kind, peace-loving, compromising friend, Mr. Runciman, made a very pretty exhibition of himself in the House of Commons on Thursday night. The case of the Swansea Oxford Street Church School will be familiar to our readers. It is not a case that admits of argument. The facts are not denied, and cannot be denied. The local authorities at Swansea were guilty of the most flagrant and malicious injustice to the school, which they have done their best to starve out of existence. In their distress the managers of the Church school appealed to the Board of Education, and Mr. Runciman sent down Mr. Hamilton, K.C.—now Mr. Justice Hamilton—in the capacity of Commissioner to make the fullest enquiries and to report. Mr. Hamilton, after going into the matter at length, reported that the local authorities were in default. Did Mr. Runciman thereupon proceed to put into force the power of the Board of Education to compel the authorities to make good their default? Not a bit of it. Mr. Runciman, like Mr. Birrell, is the proud possessor of "Liberal principles," and "Liberal principles" do not allow Ministers to take action of any kind which may result in the loss of votes. Consequently Mr. Runciman, in the face of Mr. Hamilton's report, and sheltering himself behind the legal quibbling of the Attorney-General, took no action at all. Here are the words of the Attorney-General in the House of Commons on Thursday night: "The authorities can pay teachers as little as they can. It may be most ungenerous and harsh to do so, but it is not illegal." And it is on the strength of this "legal opinion" that Mr. Runciman endeavours to excuse his flagrant breach of common fairness and impartiality. Mr. Balfour, while hotly denouncing Mr. Runciman's inexcusable conduct, said that he recognised Mr. Runciman as "a man of honour." This is the sort of thing that is always said on these occasions, and no doubt it is right that the amenities of debate should be observed; but for our part, we must confess that we entirely fail to see anything honourable in such gross misuse of authority for party purposes. The action of the local authorities at Swansea, and the support given to their illegal conduct by the Board of Education under a Nonconformist Government, throws a lurid light on the value of the "right of entry," in exchange for which the Archbishop of Canterbury was ready to hand over the Church schools. Meanwhile, in Swansea itself, on the same day as that on which the debate we have referred to took place, "the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches" was engaged in the sweet task of forming a "Free Church Socialist League." We are surprised to hear that the Archbishop of Canterbury did not take the opportunity of attending and saying a few words. The "Free Churches" supply the only suitable field of activity for an Archbishop who has so little regard for religious education as Dr. Randall. He is not popular in the Church of England. In the Free Churches he would soon no doubt become as popular, as beloved, and as brotherly as "Dr." Clifford.

The friends of the imperfect poet would appear to be innumerable. They continue to address us scathingly through the post and they continue wittily to cite chapter and verse "in the great masters of English poetry" for every fault of which a bad poet is capable. Out of a large number of such correspondents, however, only one ventures to retort by addressing himself to a review of our own poetical blemishes and failings. We print his letter in another column, with suitable editorial comment. It will be noted that our critic lays himself out to discover lapses which in the main are not entirely obvious. He has not succeeded in making out a case, but, even if he had so succeeded, his tu quoque would not be either just or complete. It is all very well for him to tell us that the Saturday Review would not have printed Miss Jourdain's poems, inasmuch as he may have inside information on the subject. The awkward fact remains, however, that, despite the altitudes of superiority now claimed for the editor of the Saturday Review, that gentleman did print and publish in his paper a couple of weeks ago, or thereabouts, a set of verses, which contained the following lines:

When she-goats begged from Jove a beard,
The he-goats sad began to rage,
Because their dignity they feared
Would rivalled be by females sage.

* * *
And this the moral of my tale,
For ever bear with those who try
To ape your manly mien, but fail
In worth to reach your standard high.

We have printed in italics the more palpable illiteracies of the Saturday Review's poet or translator, and, while we quite admit that it may appear smart of Mr. Hodge's champion to retaliate by pretending to point out flaws in the work of our own poet or translator, we shall take leave to assert that there is a mighty deal of difference between the work of the two parties. The charges brought against Miss Jourdain are not, in our opinion, honest charges. The best that can be said for them is that they might conceivably be capable of discussion by scholars. But the blemishes we have italicised above could not be discussed, even by schoolboys. That is to say, while there may be people in the world who would contend, and as we believe quite improperly contend, that it is not open for a poet to translate "fons" into "well," no person possessed of the smallest claim to literary acumen would contend that "would rivalled be" or "standard high" are other than clumsy and unpoetical English. The issue is the thing, after all, and the false issue and the red herring do not become even a contributor to the Saturday Review, which honourable position in the world we assume our correspondent to hold because of his cocksure statement as to what the editor of the Saturday would or would not have done. In our view, the issue for our correspondents is not in the least a question as to whether Shakespeare rhymed "hour" and "power," or as to whether our poet has mistranslated "fons," but rather a question as to whether verses such as those quoted above should be allowed to appear in a paper like the Saturday Review. We say that this question admits of only one answer, and if Mr. Hodge disagrees with us it is his plain business and duty to say so in his own columns.

For another class of correspondent we are constrained to confess an amused contempt. We refer to the brave defender of the faith who writes to inform us that he himself is a contributor to the Saturday, the Athenæum, the Outlook or the Spectator, as the case may be, and that he believes his editor to be a gentleman and the possessor of the highest literary gifts, and that it is "only too obvious that THE ACADEMY's criticisms are dictated by envy and malice." This kind of epistolary honesty is somewhat discounted by the fact that the persons who indulge in it are most careful to conclude by explaining that as they do not seek advertisement we must please refrain from publishing their letters. It seems to us that when an unbiassed person wishes to discuss a public matter with the editor of a public journal it is fairly astute of him to mark his letter "private and not intended for publication." And as for envy and malice, who in the name of goodness would envy the professor of mathematics who added two and two together to make five, and who in the name of goodness should be accused of malicious intention for that in all probability and by the rules of the game two and two make four? We find ourselves utterly incapable of envying the editors of any of our contemporaries whatsoever. And our malice for the whole boiling of them could repose comfortably and with a large margin on a threepenny-piece. In point of fact, we are their best friend, inasmuch as we have already succeeded in spurring them on to nobler ideals. Take last week's Saturday Review, for example. It is utterly devoid of a scrap of verse. The Outlook has had no poetry for weeks; the Athenæum is in the same case. We presume, to their credit therefore, that the editors of these redoubtable journals have begun to appreciate the excellence of our axiom to the effect that it is better to appear without poetry than to print middling, indifferent or bad poetry. What is more: this sudden access of a due and proper severity of judgment on the part of the editors of the literary weeklies will not be without its beneficent effect upon the imperfect poets, who, we hope, will remember for the rest of their lives that if they wish to appear in the Saturday Review they must at least endeavour to achieve something that will pass for English in the Board Schools, or in the cases of the other journals we have named, something that would be passed for poetry by the "eminent expert" who runs the Literary Help

Column in T. P.'s Weekly. And no matter what happens or who cries "malice," we, for our part, will never tolerate "down, six inches down" or "the pane entitled 'smoking'" from the Athenæum, or "passionate feet" and "hours" and "powers" from the Nation, or English sonnets in the German idiom from the Outlook. We rejoice that the editors of these journals have at length set their "passionate feet" in the right path, and we hope and trust that our "standard high" will "rivalled be" for all time in the future by them, even though their journals may have fallen "down—six inches down" in the estimation of the literary public.

A fortnight ago we called attention to the appended paragraph by Mr. Clement Shorter:

I believe it is a theory of many eminent men of letters that our age cannot produce good poetry—that this is a scientific period, and that commercialism and science have killed the poet. I am waiting for the critic to arise who will smash this theory to atoms, who will show that there never was a more poetic age than ours, who will make it clear that Tennyson's theology transmitted in verse, and Mr. Browning's philosophy given to us more or less in the same medium, were by no means the high poetry that the last generation thought them. Someone will also have to prick the bubble of Palgrave's "Golden Treasury," and challenge the ready acceptance of an earlier generation and of the middle-aged people of to-day of the mechanical verse that appears in that anthology. It is quite remote from great poetry.

Leaving out the question of Tennyson's theology and Mr. Browning's philosophy, we invited Mr. Shorter to give us the titles of the pieces in the "Golden Treasury" which would appear to him to justify his remarks. Two issues of the Sphere have appeared since then, and Mr. Shorter is too dumb to plead. That is to say, he finds himself unable "to prick the bubble of Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury.'" So that he stands confessed for a rash and hazardous critic, and for a critic, moreover, who is as devoid of pluck as a clothes-prop is devoid of muscle. Of course, Mr. Shorter and his friends will murmur among themselves that in his failing to justify his impudent assertions about English poetry Mr. Shorter is merely treating THE ACADEMY with silent and well-merited contempt. It will never occur to them that Mr. Shorter makes no answer because he has no answer and is incapable of inventing an answer that would pass muster in the sight of reasonable people—"middle-aged" or otherwise. And as it may be that Mr. Shorter is afraid to print in the Sphere his list of mechanical and inferior pieces of poetry from Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" lest he might in the choice parlance of his craft "give THE ACADEMY a gratuitous advertisement," we are quite willing to accord him the necessary space in this journal, the literary advertising strength of which is quite as great as that of the Sphere. Meanwhile, we are glad to recognise in our friend's current Literary Letter the old, sure touch. "The publishing business of Hurst and Blackett," he writes, "has been purchased by Hutchinson and Co. It includes the still valuable copyrights of Edna Lyall and George MacDonald's novels. This is slightly 'rocky' English—Mr. Shorter must forgive us the shock which 'rocky' is bound to create in his sensitive breast—but it is eminently Shorterian and eminently useful. We heard of the transference of the business of Hurst and Blackett to Hutchinson and Co. weeks ago, and we have maintained an unfortunate silence on the subject. We are abundantly reproved by C. K. S.'s business-like, opportune and graceful paragraph. If he would stick to such paragraphs, instead of posing on silver tip-toe to prick such radiant bubbles as Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury,' we might continue as a whole to put up with our Mr. Clement Shorter.

The Englishwoman is scattering broadcast among ladies free copies of its first number, to which we have referred on two occasions; accompanying this handsome present is a letter, signed "The Editorial Committee of the Englishwoman," in which letter it is set forth that "The Englishwoman intends to show how earnest women are in their efforts to arrive at a sound opinion, and, incidentally, how well they are able to form accurate judgments on established facts." We have already given our readers a few specimens of the logical methods of the writers in the Englishwoman, and we are delighted to think that so many people over and above those who bought it are to have an opportunity of judging for themselves of the quality of this feeble and futile publication. From a literary point of view the Englishwoman has already, in its first number, stamped itself with the brand of illiteracy by the character of the fifth-rate doggerel it serves up under the guise of "poetry," and by the unconscious comicality of its would-be serious contributions to the art of fiction, from the hands of Mr. Galsworthy and Miss Cicely Hamilton. So far from proving that how earnest are "women" (by which, of course, the Englishwoman means women who want votes) "to arrive at a sound opinion, and how well they are able to form accurate judgments on established facts," it succeeds merely in proving that the particular women who have written in the first number of the Englishwoman care nothing whatever about sound opinion or established facts, unless they happen to fit in or be capable of being made to appear to fit in with their own wild and wonderful "cause."

For some months past we have been engaged in a tussle with a baronet and a firm of solicitors. Needless to say, our sufferings have been intense, and during the course of the argument we have received from the baronet and his advisers quite a number of graceful epistles. As examples of the literary art, the letters in question are much valued by us, and the fact that they contain practical exemplification of their authors' skill in other arts not quite so graceful renders them doubly interesting. We, therefore, propose to regale our readers by reproducing the correspondence in these columns side by side with a running comment. Number one of the series will appear next week.

An interesting performance of Mrs. Percy Dearmer's play, Nan Pilgrim, was given last Sunday and Monday at the Court Theatre. The play is founded on Mrs. Dearmer's fine novel, "The Difficult Way," and it had a most friendly reception and is commendable as a piece of serious and at times brilliant writing. That it would, however, be successful for any length of time in filling a theatre we very much doubt. The subject is not by any means morbid, though some might be tempted to so call it, and, spiritually speaking, the play ends happily, though with a rather unnecessarily painful death-bed scene. This is all right in a novel, but in a play, which, when all is said and done, should not be a sermon, except in the most indirect fashion, it is otherwise. Mrs. Dearmer should certainly feel encouraged to write another play, for her relative failure seems to us to be bound up with the unsuitability of her subject-matter, rather than with the use she has made of it. Miss Lilian Braithwaite gave a winning and powerful rendering of the principal part, and Mr. Holmes Gore, as the idealistic and saintly but tragically wrong-headed clergyman, was excellent, though we incline to think that his "make-up" was faulty. He should have been younger and better-looking to carry off what most women would describe as his "tiresomeness." The "Miss Gripper" of Miss Thomas was a triumph of sure acting in a very delightful comedy part.

SONNET.

I DREAMED we walked together, you and I,
Along a white and lonely road, that went
I know not where . . . and we were well content.
Our laughter was untroubled as the sky,
But all our talk was delicate and shy,
Though in that cage of words wild thoughts were pent
Like prisoned birds that some sweet accident
Might yet release to sing again and fly.

We passed between long lines of poplar trees . . .
Where, summer comrades gay and debonair,
The south wind and the sunlight danced . . . you smiled,

With great glad eyes, as bright as summer seas,
To feel their twinkling fingers in your hair . . .
And then you kissed me, quickly, like a child!

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

A CORNHILL POET

ONE by one the poets are being discovered to us. There is Mr. J. M. Barrie and there is Mr. Graham Robertson—both true poets, by intention if not by execution. The Sphere has vouched for Barrie and for Graham Robertson, and we may take it that quite shortly "What Every Woman Knows," and "Pinkie and the Fairies" will range with that marvellous romance, "Aylwin," in the world's classics, one of them prefaced by Shorter, and the other by "that brilliant publisher-critic, Alan Northman." Children who have been taught in their schools to lisp Mackenzie-Bell instead of Milton, and Watts-Dunton instead of Wordsworth, will no doubt be compelled in the near future to recite portions of "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" in the belief that it is poetry, and that Jerome Klapka Jerome, that mightiest of Cockneys and concertina-swingers and literary hat-swappers, is also a true poet. We live, let us remember, in an age of progress; letters and journalism are no longer affairs of themselves but the mere stalking-horses of the pill merchant, the rat-poisoner, and the cheap furniture manufacturer, and the souls of the agile company of lubricators who "cater" for the "intellectual public" of the day, are simply running over with poetry. Among other true poets, of whose accession to seats besides Shakespeare we may expect momentarily to hear, let us mention Dr. Nicoll, Mr. Frank Richardson, Mr. Max Beerholm, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. D. S. Macoll, and the gentleman who writes the advertisements for The National Share Exchange. It is obvious that all these personages have their private and very proper human feelings and aspirations, and that a great part of their leisure is given over to exercises with the pen. Consequently, they are just as good and true poets as Homer or Dante or Keats, and though they may seem to lack the accomplishment of verse, this is really an intellectual illusion, for if any of them cared to try he could probably astonish Mr. Swinburne and sprinkle a sudden show of fear upon the ruby lips of Mr. Binyon. The National Share Exchange gentleman in particular is a poet both by birth and grace, for under a very large "£174580 Paid to Clients," we find him writing:

Week follows Week, Month succeeds Month, the Years pass swiftly by.—Yet, although we have advertised in every important journal and newspaper in the United Kingdom, there must still remain thousands of people who do not believe that we have paid away the amount which heads this announcement.

Which disposes of the theology of "In Memoriam," and the philosophy of Mr. Browning, and pricks the bubble of Palgrave in one fell swoop, as it were:

Week follows week, month succeeds month,
The years pass swiftly by.

Truth, oh you who are not yet middle-aged, and consequently beauty and consequently true poetry! Not only so, but it hath a dying fall. There are poignancy and tears and a crie-de-cœur in it; as also a voice and some magic and a certain amount of haunting melody. Who, after reading such lines will give a fig for all Mr. Swinburne's "Garden of Proserpine." "Week follows week, month succeeds month, the years pass swiftly by," and "even the weariest river winds somewhere safe to sea." Wherein lies the difference?—at any rate, for Mr. Shorter. The one poet offers us a beautiful and consoling horological fact in terse and melting language. The other poet offers us an equally beautiful and equally consoling physiographical fact in equally terse and equally melting language; and there you are. Anybody can write poetry, and the modern world is full of it. We will not labour the palpable moral.

It will no doubt exhilarate the polite world to know that the editor of the Cornhill Magazine, not to be outdone by Mr. Shorter, has discovered a true poet; and not only has he discovered his poet, but he goes the length of giving us a ravishing sample of his poet's wares. The prose works of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle are believed to be in huge demand. Readers of the Strand Magazine find life next door to insupportable when you deprive them of their Arthur Conan Doyle, and when the good knight "assembles" for parade, as it were, a selection of his "round the fire stories," literary England is moved to its profoundest depths. Having been taught that Mr. Meredith is a poet, and that Mr. Thomas Hardy is a poet, Sir Arthur Conan has very naturally done his best to keep himself from trespassing on the Mountain. But when he is told in cold minion solid that Mr. J. M. Barrie is also a poet, Sir Arthur recollects that he, too, is not without the divine spark, and he sets to work valiantly to produce a piece of true poetry. What is more, he goes one better than Mr. Barrie and puts his passionate utterance into what he conceives to be poetic form. The result is dispatched to the editor of the Cornhill Magazine, a respectable monthly published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., and the editor of the Cornhill Magazine forthwith springs upon his millions of readers Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's poetic gem. The said gem occupies a front position in the March Cornhill. It covers two and a half pages, and it is entitled "Shakespeare's Expostulation." We have looked in vain in our contemporaries for the expostulation which should jump to the critical lip when a gentleman of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's kidney is discovered solemnly and seriously putting words into the excellent mouth of William Shakespeare. Consequently, we here and now take leave to expostulate emphatically on our own account. We do not suggest that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's verses are discreditable to him. Probably with a view to showing up the defects of the Swan of Avon he insists, it is true, upon garnishing the blank verse of "Shakespeare's Expostulation" with an over-generous supply of rhymed couplets. But, taking it on the whole, his blank verse is correct, and it bears every indication of having been beaten out with a fat thumb on a solid mahogany dining-table after supper:

Masters, I sleep not quiet in my grave,
There where they laid me, by the Avon shore,
For that some crazy wights have set it forth
By argument most false and fanciful,
Analogy and far-drawn inference,
That Francis Bacon, Earl of Verulam
(A man whom I remember in old days,
A learned judge with sly adhesive palms,
To which the suitors' gold was wont to stick)—
That this same Verulam had writ the plays
Which were the fancies of my frolic brain.

Here, truly, you have beaten gold:

Terum terum terum ter-tumpty tum, or, as Thackeray had it—

Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh!

This is art and metre and scansion and correctness and smoothness and oleagenousness and the top of form. The absolute brilliance of the passage as a whole will be obvious to the least literate, and, for once in his life, the editor of the Cornhill has clearly rendered the editors of the Athenæum, the Saturday Review, the Spectator, and the Outlook green with envy. And for the enterprise of Messrs. Smith, Elder and Company in securing such a poem at enormous expense we can have nothing but unreserved admiration. We are compelled to enquire, however, in the interests of truth, and consequently in the interests of beauty, and, therefore, in the interests of poetry, upon what authority it is that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle advises us that William Shakespeare sleeps "not quiet" in his grave. Our own information is that he sleeps just as quietly and just as comfortably as the rest of them. We quite recognise that if ever a buried poet has reason for uneasiness in his sepulchre, Shakespeare is that buried poet. The people who eat pea-nuts and raise hogs have done their best to rob him of his fame. Miss Corelli has gone to live in his birthplace: Mr. Hall Caine is the victim of a striking resemblance to some of the Shakespeare pictures: Mr. George Bernard Shaw brags that Shaw is a better playwright than Shakespeare. Yet somehow William Shakespeare has contrived to sleep on. What he will do if he should get wind of this unkindest cut of all in the shape of the defence and patronage of Conan Doyle is another pair of horses. We should not be surprised if he were to get up and frighten the life out of the Vicar of Stratford. We shall wait events with keen and unflagging interest, and if nothing happens we may rejoice, because herein we shall have at length clear and unmistakable and incontrovertible evidence that it is impossible to provoke the silent dust or engage the attention of the dull cold ear of death. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle is doubtless a well-meaning person. If he had written "Shakespeare's Expostulation" in somebody's scrap album nobody could have blamed him. And perhaps we ought not to blame him for its appearance in the Cornhill Magazine. The horror of the situation lies in two circumstances—namely, that a magazine of the Cornhill's traditions should print such verses, and that it should survive their publication. We trust that Messrs. Smith, Elder and Company may be depended upon to spare us "Milton's Animadversion," by William Le Queux, and "Shelley's Objurgation," by Alice and Claud Askew. Tilly-fally, thou temerarious Sir Arthur.

It were well for all of us to have a due appreciation of our small successes in this world. To be knighted for one's literary performances is nowadays in itself a bitter criticism on one's literary performances, and one would have thought that pretty well the only recipient of such an "honour" in modern times would have gone the more humbly and the more softly all his days in consequence. But vainglory is a vice of the blood which apparently even a knighthood cannot cure.

MR. ARCHER'S TWO GUINEAS

FROM the advertisements columns of the Author of March 1st it is our duty to cull the following advertisement:

We have pleasure in announcing that we have made an arrangement with MR. WILLIAM ARCHER by which, upon request of the author, he undertakes to read, criticise, and advise upon any plays entrusted to us, and he will read no manuscript plays which do not reach him through us.

The reading fees are fixed as follows:—

	£	s.	d.
For scenarios of not over 2,000 words ...	1	10	0
For plays of one or two acts ...	1	10	0
For plays of three or more acts ...	2	10	0

The payment of these fees entitles the author to a written opinion from 300 to 800 words in length, dealing with the theme, construction, characterisation, and diction of his play, suggesting alterations where they seem called for, and (so far as possible) conveying both theoretical criticism and practical advice.

The fact that a play has been submitted to Mr. Archer will be treated by him, and by us, as confidential. On the other hand, the author is at liberty to show Mr. Archer's opinion to managers, actors, etc., if he so desires. It would manifestly be misleading, however, to quote detached phrases or make garbled extracts from a detailed criticism. Mr. Archer therefore leaves it to the author's sense of fairness to show to managers, etc., the whole opinion if he shows any part of it.

If, in addition to the opinion, the author should desire a personal interview with Mr. Archer, a further fee of two guineas would be charged.

Plays re-submitted after alteration are subject to the same fees as plays submitted for the first time.

Manuscripts should be addressed to:—

Messrs. Curtis Brown & Massie, 5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., and, if Mr Archer's opinion is required, they should be accompanied by the reading fee in advance. Cheques should be made payable to Messrs. Curtis Brown & Massie. If, as may sometimes happen, a play does not seem to call for serious consideration, but can be adequately dealt with in three or four lines, half the reading fee will be returned.

Plays should in all cases be type-written (or printed), and a copy should be retained by the author. While all reasonable care will be taken of manuscripts, we cannot be responsible for their loss in the post, or otherwise.

Mr. Archer will endeavour to give his opinion of any play within two weeks of receiving the manuscript.

It is not necessary that plays entrusted to us for placing with managers should be submitted to Mr. Archer, and, on the other hand, it is not necessary that plays sent to us for Mr. Archer's inspection should be entrusted to us for placing, although we have many openings for good plays. Our agency for playwrights and our arrangements with Mr. Archer are not interdependent.

Especial attention is called to the advantage of expert criticism on scenarios. On the other hand, we find it practically impossible to interest managers in plays not complete in every detail. It is our practice to send to actors and managers only plays of which it can be said they are worth the manager's personal and immediate attention. Plays placed by us are subject to a commission of ten per cent. of the receipts. We can undertake arrangements for only such plays as are left exclusively in our hands.

CURTIS BROWN & MASSIE.

Now, from a certain point of view the essence of this advertisement is Mr. William Archer. In other words, if, say, the name of Mr. Brown or Mr. Massie were substituted in place of the name of Mr. Archer, Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's invitation to trade would lose a great deal of its point and attractiveness. We have to remember that Mr. William Archer was formerly the dramatic critic of the World newspaper and formerly the dramatic critic of the Tribune, and that he is now the dramatic critic of the Nation. We have to remember also that he writes regularly on art and morals in the Morning Leader; that he delivers lectures on the drama in Copenhagen; and that he is credited with having introduced Ibsen to the English stage. These facts are generally known, and the general effect of them upon the minds of would-be playwrights cannot in the nature of things be other than stimulating. Furthermore, it is important for us to reiterate that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's advertisement appears in the Author, which is an organ run ostensibly in the pure interests of authors and authorship. So that the amateur playwright may be excused for assuming that in this advertisement he is offered, at a reasonable charge, the opportunity of a lifetime. We are not concerned to deny that a criticism of one's dramatic writings from the pen of Mr. Archer is worth two pounds ten, nor are we concerned to deny that the author who desires a personal interview with Mr. Archer should be charged an extra two guineas for the honour and privilege. We believe that the advice Mr. Archer will have to offer in return for his fees must always be honest and useful to the recipient. At the same time, we pillory and deplore Mr. Archer's connection with Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's advertisement on general principles and in the interests of letters. We say that if Mr. Archer permits himself to be held forth as an inducement to the literary aspirant to part with fees, it is his duty to be sure that before those fees are paid the literary aspirant is made fully aware of the precise literary situation. We hold that the fact of Mr. Archer's eminence in his profession of dramatic critic and the fact of the appearance of Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's advertisement in the columns of the Author are jointly calculated to excite in the bosom of the amateur, hopes and expectations which are not by any means sure of being realised. The advertisement is couched in language which will lead the inexperienced to assume that Mr. Archer's opinion of a play by an amateur will have great weight "with managers, etc.," and may, therefore, of itself result in the acceptance and production of dramatic works which in other circumstances would not be accepted. We base this statement on the paragraph in the advertisement which runs: "On the other hand, the author is at liberty to show Mr. Archer's opinion to managers, actors, etc., if he so desires. It would manifestly be misleading, however, to quote detached phrases or to make garbled extracts from a detailed criticism. Mr. Archer, therefore, leaves it to the author's sense of fairness to show to managers, etc., the whole opinion if he shows any part of it." Let us enquire, from the point of view of the amateur author, why it would be manifestly misleading to quote detached phrases or garbled extracts from Mr. Archer's detailed criticism? The suggestion and implication is that if Mr. Archer were to say of a dramatic work: "This is a fine play, but it could never be made successful on the stage," the author who showed a manager or an actor the first part of Mr. Archer's criticism and suppressed the latter part might delude a manager into accepting an altogether hopeless and unstageable play. We do not suggest that this is what Mr. Archer or Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie intend by the paragraph we have quoted, but we think that the amateur author will undoubtedly put such a construction upon it and will part with his fee in the belief that with Mr. Archer's favourable criticism in his pocket he will be much more likely to succeed with managers and actors than if he went to them with a bare manuscript. In point of fact, of course, Mr. Archer is perfectly well aware that this is not the case, and for that matter Mr. Archer is equally well aware that instances might arise where so far from his praise being helpful, it might prove positively disastrous, while the very animadversions which he would leave to the author's sense of fairness not to suppress might prove a recommendation. We are glad to believe that there is a class of play much sought after by managers which would be condemned at sight by Mr. Archer. Furthermore, we know that, taking them in the lump, managers are not ultimately to be affected by Mr. Archer's criticisms of any play in the world. Ultimately these affairs are not settled by critical opinion or critical introduction, but depend simply on the taste, views, and goodwill of the managers of theatres. It is safe to presume that during the course of his connection with Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie, Mr. Archer has received appreciable sums of money in the shape of fees for criticisms and fees for personal interviews. Is he in a position to point to a single play by an amateur, or even professional author, which has been produced in London as the direct or indirect result of the approval or disapproval he has handed out in return for fees? We do not doubt for a moment that his advice will have enabled Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's clients to improve their work or to secure a reading of it from certain managers. But the whole suggestion of the advertisement is that Mr. Archer and Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie between them can procure the acceptance of plays by inexperienced authors by virtue of Mr. Archer's position as a critic of the drama. As a matter of commercial ethics no tradesman—and the dramatic agent is after all a tradesman—can be expected to cry stinking fish. We do not expect the dramatic agent to inform his clients that he cannot hope in any conceivable circumstance to place more than ten per cent. of the plays entrusted to him for negotiation. This would be to shut up his business and deprive him of an honest means of livelihood. But we do expect from a professional man of Mr. Archer's standing a reasonable sense of professional dignity. In the first place, it is considered among members of the recognised professions quite infra dig to advertise or lend oneself to the purposes of advertisement at all. And in the second place, if a literary man—and we suppose Mr. Archer calls himself a literary man—is so far forgetful of what he owes to his profession as to associate himself and his good name to the literary and dramatic agency business, it behoves him to be very frank with the simple, if ambitious, aspirant to literary fame. In our opinion, while it may be sufficient for Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie to refrain from saying in their advertisement that with or without the advice of Mr. Archer only an infinitesimal percentage of the plays written by amateurs can in the nature of things be produced at the theatres, it is not sufficient for Mr. Archer so to refrain. And it is not creditable to him that an advertisement couched in language which is intended rather to secure clients than to help and assist untried talent should be primed and baited, as it were, with his name. Any author of standing will tell you that there is no royal road to acceptance, whether it be for plays or books. The literary or dramatic agent cannot influence either the publication of books or the production of plays. His position is that of the commercial adviser of the successful author and the errand boy of the author who has not yet found recognition. In rare instances he may be able to make suggestions to the immature which will result in their literary advantage, but these instances are very rare, and his real business so far as the amateur is concerned is to keep the amateur's manuscript on its steady round of the publishing houses or the theatres, as the case may be. The moment he begins to boast of his "influence" in the sense that a manuscript, whether of a play or a book, stands a better chance of acceptance because it is sent to a publisher or a manager through himself instead of through the post, he immediately begins to skate on curiously thin ice. Mr. Archer and the editor of the Author will not attempt to contend that we are wrong in this assertion. Both of them have a sufficient acquaintance with the conditions of the literary life, and particularly the literary life in what we may term its infantile stages, to be aware that it is full of pitfalls. Both of them would insist, for example, that no young author, and for that matter no experienced author, should sign a publisher's agreement or a theatrical manager's agreement without first submitting it to the Society of Authors. Both of them, we think, would even go the length of advising an author to be just as wary in his dealings with the literary or dramatic agent as he should be in his dealings with the publisher or the manager of a theatre. Yet in the matter of this advertisement we find them both tacitly and actively and for profit approving and blessing and furthering the interests of a dramatic agency without putting up the least word which can be considered cautionary. We do not say that there is anything in Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's advertisement which approaches to misrepresentation or exceeds the limits of legitimate advertising. The construction which will be placed upon it by the inexperienced, however, is quite another affair, and for that reason we could wish to see it considerably modified, or at least modified in such a way that it would not so readily lend itself to misconception. In a journal which is supposed to be the sure rock and jealous guardian of authorship, such an advertisement means far more than it would mean in the ordinary advertising medium. And as for Mr. Archer's name, the steady parading of it must have a great deal more value than the mention of the usual "eminent" or "trained expert"; otherwise it would not be there. Mr. Archer's personal position in the matter is rendered all the more difficult when we consider that he is a busy man, and that he is supposed to be the leading dramatic critic in London. Even supposing that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie hand to him the full advertised fees for the reading of scenarios and plays, it is difficult to understand how, if he makes a practice of giving detailed criticisms and advice, he can afford to do it for the money. The man who will read and advise at length, and with critical purpose, on a three-act drama for two pounds ten shillings must be fairly put to it for money. We have no doubt that Mr. Archer is an honest man, and that he does his work thoroughly, and consequently we can only commiserate with him on his slavery. He must not be angry with us for calling his attention to what we consider to be an unprofessional and unprofitable association. If we are to have Mr. Archer advertised as a sort of star inducement by a firm of dramatic agents, we might just as well have Mr. Meredith advertised as the reader and adviser of the literary agencies at a couple of guineas a time, or Mr. Swinburne advertised as the "poetical expert" of T. P.'s Correspondence College. The thing is unpleasant on the face of it, and if Mr. Archer values his literary reputation, he should take steps either to remove his name from this advertisement, or to define a little more precisely and a little less ambiguously what it is exactly that he undertakes to do for the budding dramatic author. To sum up, and in order that nobody may misunderstand what we have said: while Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's advertisement in the Author is a legitimate and proper advertisement, and contains nothing in the nature of misleading or wilfully disingenuous or otherwise improper statements, it is nevertheless capable of being misconstrued by the inexperienced, and particularly so in view of the status of Mr. Archer as a dramatic critic, and of the status of the Author as a class journal. And that is why we consider it to be against the best interests of authorship. We should contend that Mr. Archer's services to the literary aspirant must of necessity be limited to instruction. When an author pays him a fee for his opinion on a dramatic work he can only criticise it to the best of his ability and advise the author to alter it with a view to its improvement. Even if the work is sufficiently powerful to send Mr. Archer off into fits of ecstasy he can no more guarantee that "managers, etc.," will be equally delighted than he can guarantee that the moon is made of green cheese. In our view the only possible attitude for him to take up is that of the tutor and mentor. When he allows it to be suggested that his word will help amateur work to acceptance he goes too far. He has permitted this suggestion or implication to be made in the paragraph we have quoted as well as generally in other parts of the advertisement. We have not had the advantage of perusing one of Mr. Archer's "written opinions," so that we are unable to say whether those opinions contain the best advice which can possibly be given to nine out of every ten would-be playwrights; which advice is: "Give up attempting to write plays and stick to your clerking or your iron-mongering or your shop-walking as the case may be." If Mr. Archer deals faithfully with Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's clients he must find himself compelled to administer this advice. If it costs him three hundred words, so much the worse for the client, though on the whole it is a good twenty-five-shillings' worth.

REVIEWS

THE ROMAN CITIZEN

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A. (Macmillan and Co., 10s. net.)

STUDENTS of Latin literature and many others who can understand Latin with a little encouragement are not likely to forget "Virgil's Messianic Eclogue," published in a collected form by three scholars of taste in 1907. Mr. Warde Fowler's section of that delightful little book testified to his possession of accurate scholarship, a true literary sense and a temperament correspondent with a great poet. Such qualities are too seldom combined, and admirers of his former work will welcome and value his present volume. The Age of Cicero has been rendered too often as dry as his bones and as trite as many of his sentiments by writers impervious to the influence of his genius in disguising them in brilliant phrases. Mr. Fowler treats it with scholarship deep enough to be of the greatest service to younger students, and in so modern and vivid a manner as to prove very stimulating and suggestive to those who have at least passed out of the range of examinations.

Mr. Fowler prepares his ground by recounting the radical changes in the political, social and economic conditions of Rome and Italy, caused by the Hannibalic Wars; the admission of "new men," like the Ciceros, within the governing classes; the immense increase of slaves; and the reckless speculation of all men of any means at all, Cicero again included. On the wider subject of intellectual movement he sketches the change wrought by the introduction and spread of Greek studies. He contrasts the earlier nobilitas on the one hand with a large number even of that conservative order and the nouveaux riches on the other. He reminds us of the chief characteristic of the Roman Republic, its absorption of individuality in the State. "But towards the end of the Republican period the individual had free play; at no time in ancient history do we meet so many various and interesting kinds of individuality even among the nobilitas itself. . . . it was a fact of the age, in which the idea of the State had fallen into the background. . . . They had fallen under an influence more powerful over men with time and capacity for reflection than any State, Greek Philosophy. Orpheus possessed the beasts and they ran wild, they knew not whither. Though it was Stoicism, with its collectivism, modified for Roman practice by Panaetius and Posidonius, which attracted them more than did Epicureanism for all its individualism, yet the Greek Spirit, the intellectual, æsthetic spirit which expresses itself only in self-development, was stronger than any systematised philosophy. The Greek Spirit rendered the Romans of the Ciceronian age less purely Roman than their forefathers, and gave the age a mixed character. As the Greek Spirit still enlightens the races of Europe the Roman Spirit unified them. In this element of unity the last century of the Republic is the least characteristic of Roman history. But it takes more than a generation to endow the parts of a machine with independent thought. "The new education was admirably calculated to train men in the art of speaking and writing; . . . in philosophical receptivity the brightest and finest minds among the aristocracy show an ability which is almost astounding; . . . I use the word receptivity because the Romans of our period never really learnt to think for themselves." Somewhere else Mr. Fowler suggests—if he does not actually say so, for the passage has hidden itself for the moment—that they were incapable of original thought. At any rate, it is their imitative, in a special sense their codifying, power which must strike every careful student of Roman literature as of Roman history. It is symbolised by Cicero, "the most cultivated of the ancients," writing his most impassioned speeches and his most heartfelt moral dicta with a Greek original spread out before him. It was the study of Greek rhetoric also which stimulated oratory, "the staple product of the age and the chief raison d'être of its literary activity." Oratory was the staple product, because it was the most effective instrument in politics and in that other science—largely then a branch of politics—to which Mr. Fowler unerringly points. "The enlightenment of the Scipionic circle" with its "Greek teachers, not only of grammar, rhetoric and philosophy, but of the fine arts" . . . "opened out a new way in manners, in literature, in philosophical activity, and, lastly, in the study of law, which was destined to be Rome's greatest contribution to civilisation." Orpheus reduces the beasts to order only after he has fully possessed them. Mr. Fowler's remark is profoundly true and needs to be impressed on students; Law is the enormous debt that civilisation owes to the unifying genius of Rome.

It has been necessary to linger over ideas suggested by Mr. Fowler. His book bristles with such spurs to reflection; they are its most valuable characteristic, so much so that his historic excellences can only be suggested, in a reasonable space, somewhat similarly. Cicero, of course, pervades his age. Mr. Fowler writes no full, set appreciation of him. He sketches him gradually in clear, firm strokes, as he treats of his age generally, in its various aspects, but he leaves a distinct, finished figure. "The highly respectable citizen," "the man of sterling worth," "the man who has made himself by his own exertions, with none of the advantages of high birth," the Cicero of the dull writers, so boring to schoolboys, we see subsisting entirely and lending large sums on borrowed money, "plunging" in the shares of bubble companies, moderate financially in nothing but his legitimate income, regulating his expenditure solely by his desires. By realising thus that he had all the gambling spirit of his period we begin to realise his keen insight into the conditions of the society in which he lived, and his extraordinary political sagacity in holding abreast, in a sort of triple leash, the State, the financiers, and their victims, numerous enough to eat up both. And it is in the Letters, on which Mr. Fowler insists so rightly, that the real charm and humanness of Cicero appears. We are amused and sympathetic when he far exceeds the customs of the Courts in his violent vituperation of Piso or Vatinius and carries on a pleasant private correspondence with them afterwards; when he impeaches Catiline as a monster of iniquity and also offers to act as his advocate. He was entirely devoid of political principles, we have been told. But his natural benevolence gave him extraordinary keenness of vision, when he conceived the idea that the regeneration of the State lay in "the moral and political ascendancy of a single man." The Letters reveal, too, his friendships, "his good-breeding," "his real kindly feeling and true sympathy." Mr. Fowler dwells on these traits affectionately; he is almost as interested in one of the objects of his regard as Cicero himself, the fascinating Caelius, though he does disapprove of him gently for clamouring for panthers.

Cicero looms so large that there is room only to mention Mr. Fowler's admirable notes which give the key of other conspicuous individuals: Paulus and Scipio Æmilianus, the great-souled philhellenes, haurimus libertatis alienae quam suae dignitatis memores; Cæsar, as an historian "to whom facts are more important than words"; Varro's "encyclopædic learning," and advocacy of slave-breeding; the genius and weakness of Sulla; Atticus, the subtle millionaire who lent without interest; Tiro, the slave, inspirer of the tenderest affection; the missionary spirit of Lucretius; and the rudeness and bad taste of Cato. With Chapter III., on Finance, and Chapter IV., on the Aristocracy, which have been quoted repeatedly; Chapter VII., a "not unpleasant picture" of Slavery under its Italian agricultural conditions, on which there are columns which might be filled; Chapter IX., the vivid picture of the daily life of a Roman in comfortable circumstances; and Chapter V., with its touching and dignified story of Lucretius the soldier and Turia; all these can only be named especially, to "tempt a student to further and more exact inquiry."

DISCURSIONS

The Wander Years. By J. H. YOYALL, M.P. (Smith, Elder and Co.)

WE might almost endow this book with the sub-title "A Collector's Creed," for it expresses from the first page to the last the thoughts of a man who puts himself en rapport with every beautiful object of earth, from a piece of rare china or an ancient spinning-wheel to a church or even an old-world town. There are collectors and collectors; some whom all good men should abjure, for whom everything has its price, whose paltry souls can never rise above sensations of envy when others have "secured" a picture, an ornament, a treasure which they themselves have coveted; some, again, whose collecting is more that of the mind—who can allow the beauty of a thing denied to sink into them until it becomes theirs in a truer sense than if it stood, uncomprehended, on their very sideboard. In such a way a man can collect even cathedrals and objects immovable and inviolate; in such a mood has Mr. Yoxall written his most interesting book.

The whole course of the genial pages affords a study in the art of digression. Only a traveller with a well-equipped mind and an eye to history can digress and gossip constantly from theme to theme with any pretence to success or any hope of giving his readers abiding pleasure. The author slips easily and naturally and conversationally into any little channel of thought that suggests itself: from the Via Balbi—"that street of palaces in Genoa the beautiful"—to the palaces of Westminster and the smoking-room of the "House"; from a glimpse of a piece of English china at Choisy-le-Roi he wanders to tell how Staffordshire ware came to be imitated in that corner of France; on the banks of the Loire he indulges visions of Goethe and Sophie Vulpius. The Loire at twilight gives him opportunity for a fine little word-picture:

Nun-like twilight; violet eyes in a dusk-white face, starry brows irradiating garments dim and dun; the sky "all silent silver lights and darks undreamed-of": in the trembling purple air a large repose, a solemn peace; and solitude, divinest solitude, mother of pensive delight. Silence in the silence, largeness of serenity, a still ecstasy, a momentary nirvana—almost the smooth beatitude of non-existence itself. It breaks; sudden but not startling, a thin chain of notes, dropping golden from some hidden belfry, gives a muezzin call to evensong. Listen! They sound, they appeal to us, those plaintive biddings to prayer; they cease awhile, as if despairing of us; they call again with new endeavour, with a more urgent evangel; mournfully they end, despondent of us, and the wide space of fields and sands and waters relapses into crystal quietude and utter calm.

We have often noted that it is not absolutely necessary to travel a hundred or a thousand miles Orientward to obtain a sense of the mystery and beauty of the world; London will breathe it to us, many a time, and these adventures of the soul are prettily suggested by a passage in the earlier part of this book:

On London river lies a boat for each of us: no swan-ship, no Lohengrin skiff perhaps, yet an enchanted wherry that bides and rocks till we come. Of a summer night from the Terrace at Westminster the long double stretch of sky and stream, deep blueness fired by points of yellow silver, stars aloft and lamps below, seems Venetian, shows Tyrrhenian; and the river incites and invites. And then, as the born seaman, after a spell ashore, longs to weigh and unfurl and sail to God knows where, so on the arid Embankment the landsman burns with restlessness and the wander-desire. Pinned to his beat, the blue policeman feels it, almost to the point of tears; somewhere on the Surrey side a concertina wails to him, and he shifts his noisy soles and sighs. He feels the wander-yearning, and the East has a name for that: it is "the spirit of the camel," Arabs say.

We are bound in these days to regard with respect and a certain envy anyone who ever met and talked with "Lewis Carroll," and Mr. Yoxall has an amusing little interlude about that mathematical fairy-man:

In the dons' common-room at Christ Church, the night I met Lewis Carroll, the talk turned on public speaking and the use of written notes. One of the dons cited Dickens: Dickens, the most brilliant after-dinner speaker of his day, never used a written note. "He used to construct the mental image of a wheel, with the heads of his speech to form the spokes, and the illustrations for each to form the tyre. As he went on speaking you could see him knock each used portion of his mental wheel away with a raised finger, and when he had knocked away all the spokes —"

"He had spoken," said Lewis Carroll.

We could wish there were not so much about Mr. Yoxall's obsession—old china—in his book; we cannot all be enthusiasts such as he is on this matter, and his hobby-horse is apt to take the bit between its teeth when it hears a whisper of "Wedgwood" or "Spode." It would have been better had he restrained the pet animal occasionally, and confined himself to the subjects of men and pictures and places, upon which he discourses so admirably. The first chapter, "Consule Planco," and the third, entitled "Bygones in France," are the best examples of this particular talent; and the last, "The Soul of a Cathedral," is an exceedingly good study of that indefinable quality of personality, the gathering together of all the mysterious influences of years gone by in one place, which so often thrills the reverent visitor to these sacred buildings; we think Mr. Yoxall is at his highest level in this essay—it rounds off the book impressively and with touches of genuine insight. Every chapter, however, is readable, and it is distinctly a volume to be appealed to again and again for relief in a lonely or leisurely hour—one of those entertaining, chatty, rambling collections which we like to have on a low shelf, within easy reach.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Geoffrey Cheriton. By JOHN BARNETT. (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)

If we say that we believe Mr. Barnett could write a most interesting novel without a heroine, lacking a whisper of a fair lady's voice or a flutter of a fair lady's dress, it will be perceived at once that a high compliment is thereby implied. The first portion of this book, concerned solely with the hero's school and business adventures, is every bit as good as the latter half, which introduces a feminine rival to Cheriton's affection for his worthless chum. We do not think that the main theme—that of this quixotic friendship of Cheriton for Iggulden—has quite sufficient stability; the one man is so good-hearted, the other such a wastrel that it is hard to imagine the comradeship, firm as it was in the beginning, could stand so severe a test. The plot is worthily handled, however, with plentiful humour, and Barbara, the little lady who has to take matters into her own hands and almost propose to Cheriton at the last, is a most winning and satisfactory heroine. We have only one complaint to make, and it applies to countless other stories: why does the young man who turns from a business career to novel-writing almost invariably succeed, and—to add to the indictment—why do generous uncles or other timely and thoughtful persons die just at the psychological moment and leave him plenteous store of gold?

To conclude in a less querulous mood, we may say that Mr. Barnett has created quite an irresistible character in the red-haired Niblett, with his cranky steam-launch and his manifold eccentricities. And the literary style of the book is excellent—the author makes even an account of a football match entertaining.

The Prince's Pranks. By CHARLES LOWE. (John Lane, 6s.)

WITH a fine unconcern the author of this book makes a Crown Prince of Germany the chief character in a series of wildly improbable incidents which can scarcely be held to constitute a "plot." This delightful youth sheers alongside a broken-down steamer with his "torpedo gunboat or something of that sort" (Mr. Lowe probably means a t.b.d. or something of that sort) in fine bravura style, and catches the dispatch-boxes which a Queen's Messenger flings across to him from the deck of the disabled vessel. It strikes us as so charmingly reasonable that a Queen's Messenger would allow his documents to get into the hands of a Crown Prince of Germany in this manner, especially as a crisis was approaching in foreign affairs. We have had the pleasure of meeting one of these Royal errand-boys, if we may so term them, and he impressed us as a person who would hardly permit himself such a disastrous day's work as that! However, Mr. Lowe possibly thinks it doesn't matter much what people do in a story—there is internal evidence to that effect in his book, at any rate. We meet Anarchists who are provided with the most liberal stock of double adjectives we ever remember to have encountered outside Miss Corelli's novels; their eyes are "muddy-moist" and "liquid-muddy"; their noses are "hawky-hooked," "tip-tilted"; one has a "pear-shaped chin," another is "bullet-headed," eke a third is "thin-lipped"; and they all are "various-countried." We greet as a familiar friend, too, the dear old "sickening thud"—will he be fashionable again?—and several of his hoary company. Altogether, we are disappointed; there were possibilities of a stirring if somewhat melodramatic tale, and the author has made rather a mess of it. Here and there are good bits of writing and passable scenes, but the whole thing is very much of a marionette-show and can appeal only to those whose opinion will hardly be worthy of consideration.

The Dukedom of Portsea. By ALICE MAUD MEADOWS. T. Werner Laurie, 6s.

FROM the title of this novel it might be inferred that Miss Meadows had written a topical romance dealing with the subject of Mr. Druce and the Portland peerage. Lest any reader should be tempted to buy the book on this assumption, we hasten to assure him that, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, in Sir William Gilbert's popular song, "The Dukedom of Portsea" has "nothing to do with the case." There are, however, other and more cogent reasons why he should not buy this book. It is surely not unreasonable to ask that a writer who desires to be read should possess a knowledge of the elementary rules of English grammar and composition. Miss Meadows, unfortunately, is without this knowledge. We have no wish to be regarded as unduly censorious. We may respect her conscientious objection to conjunctions, ignore her split infinitives, and dismiss her entirely original system of punctuation with a passing sigh. But charity itself must assume an aspect of sternness when confronted with such words as these:—

It would be absurd if neither he nor a son who came after him should get no (sic) more out of the ground than that on which the cattle and sheep sustained their existence, grew fat and flourish.

It is unusual, too, for a man of real refinement and education to talk like this:—

In England things are looked upon in a different light from how they are in South Africa.

Once more. The number of English peers—or, for the matter of that, English porters, ticket-collectors, or shoeblacks—who could frame such a sentence as the following is comparatively small:—

On the farm that is now yours, but what (sic), I confess, I thought would be mine, I believe there are minerals.

When, at a more advanced stage of the narrative the hero and heroine are about to be united in the bonds of holy matrimony, and "all that was necessary was left out to make things as short as possible," it is only charity to assume that "unnecessary" is the word which Miss Meadows intended to write.

These are but a few instances out of many. Really, in these days of free education and County Council schools there is no excuse for writing of this character.

A certain indulgence may be extended to the book itself, as there appears to be a demand for fiction of this class. "The Dukedom of Portsea" is like a hundred other novels, which in our professional capacity as a reviewer of books, we have had the misfortune to read. They are all fashioned in the same mould. In the making of such books there is truly no end. The natural and proper habitat is, however, the colthe Daily Mail, Home Chat, and other periodicals of a similar genre. Their appearance in Mr. Werner Laurie's publishing list needs justification.

ON TRUE SIMPLICITY

WHEN some future satirist looks back a hundred years or so, to this our present age, surely nothing will give him greater pleasure than our elaborate pursuit of simplicity. For true simplicity is a state, and not an act of grace, and is not yet attained, so long as its votaries strive in conscious efforts to secure it. Indeed, it may be doubted whether these conscious votaries have as much as apprehended a condition, the true nature of which may be discerned if we will but look back through the still open doors of a past century—a century in which quite ordinary men may be seen living the simple life with a perfect unconsciousness, and moving through its untroubled air with a serenity which appears to modern eyes less that of another age than that of another world.

Looking back, then, on to the stage of that other world, not two hundred years ago in time, but immeasurably remote in reality, one may distinguish many figures, each playing their several parts with great energy and skill, and each under equal conditions of a perfect simplicity. The Industrious Apprentice works out his life's success, and builds up the trade of England, under simple conditions of labour which would set your modern trade unionist raving on a dozen platforms. His Majesty's Foot Guards march out gaily to win some of the greatest campaigns of history (we may see them to this day on their march to Finchley) under equipments that would send a twentieth century philanthropist into the columns of every daily paper. And the country parson of 1750 brings bodily before our eyes a complete achievement of the simple life. It is not, perhaps, the highest achievement, but it is perfect of its kind. And it may be particularly commended to the gaze of the spurious simpliciterians of our own day.

This unconscious apostle of simplicity steps before us, sometimes under names almost too well known to bear quotation, sometimes in the guise of a nameless figure starting into life from the yellow pages of some old newspaper hardly known save to the eighteenth century collector. Who, for instance, has so much as heard of the Champion? And yet in 1740 the Champion was a truculent and vivacious paper, making some noise in the world, and understood to be largely written by that lively wit and satirist, soon to appear as the father of the English novel, Henry Fielding. And in one of the Champion essays, attributed to Fielding's pen, we have a little scene from a country parsonage not unworthy of the illustrious creator of Parson Adams, of which, says the Champion, "I was really a spectator." Abridgment would but spoil the leisurely perfection of the picture:

Some time since I went with my wife to pay a visit to a Country Clergyman who hath a living of somewhat above 1000. a year. In his youth he had sacrificed a Fellowship in one of the Universities to marry a very agreeable Woman, who with a small Fortune had had a very good education. Soon after his Marriage he was presented to the Living, of which he is now Incumbent. Since his coming hither he hath improv'd the Parsonage-House and Garden, both which are now in the neatest order. At our arrival we were met at the gate by the Clergyman and two of his sons. After telling us with the most cheerful voice and countenance that he was extremely glad to see us, he took my Wife down in his Arms, and committing our two Horses to the care of his sons, he conducted us to a neat little Parlour, where a table was spread for our entertainment. Here the good woman and her eldest daughter told us with many hearty expressions of Kindness, and very great Desires that we would take something to refresh ourselves before dinner. Upon this a bottle of Mead was produc'd which was of their own making and very good in its kind. Dinner soon follow'd, being a Gammon of Bacon and Some Chickens, with a most excellent Apple-pye. My friend excused himself from not treating me with a roasted pig and a dish I am particularly fond of, by telling us that, as Times were hard, he had relinquish'd those tithes to his Parishioners. Our liquors were the aforesaid Mead, Elder Wine, with strong Beer, Ale, and etc., all perfectly good, and which our Friends express great Pleasure at our drinking and liking. After a meal spent with the utmost cheerfulness, we walked into a little neat Garden, where we passed the afternoon with the gayest and most innocent Mirth, the good man and good woman, their sons and daughters, all vying with one another who should show us the greatest Signs of Respect, and of their Forwardness to help us to anything they had.

The Economy of these good People may be instructive to some, as well as entertaining to all, my Readers. The Clergyman, who is an excellent Scholar, is himself the School Master to his Boys (which are three in number). As soon as the Hours appointed for their Studies are over the Master and all the Scholars employ themselves at work either in the Garden or some other Labour about the house, while the little Woman is no less industrious in her Sphere with her two Daughters within. Thus the Furniture of their House, their Garden, their Table, and their Cellar are almost all the work of their Hands; and the Sons grow at once robust and learned, while the Daughters become Housewives, at the same Time that they learn of their Mother several of the genteeler Accomplishments.

Love and Friendship were never in greater Purity than between this good Couple, and as they both have the utmost Tenderness for their Children, so they meet with the greatest Returns of Gratitude and Respect from them. Nay, the whole Parish is by their Example the family of Love of which they daily receive instances from their spiritual Guide, and which hath such an Effect on them that I believe—Communibus Annis, he receives voluntarily from his Parishioners more than his due, though not half so much as he deserves.

Acquaintance with this scholar-parson, making his flock good by virtue of his own goodness, and furnishing his house, garden, table, and cellar with the work of his own hands, brings us into the actual presence of the simple life; here is no mere talk, but the thing itself. And once we have seen it, how manifest is the absurdity of simplicity upholstered from catalogues and dieted by pamphlets.

The eighteenth century bears, superficially, a bad name for its clergy, and some captious critic will say that the Champion paid his visit in a pastoral dream-land remote from solid English homesteads. Fielding's name is not held to be that of a dreamer of pastoral dreams; so to support the attribution to his pen of the unsigned Champion columns, we may turn to the pages of his "Amelia." There the great novelist draws at full length another country parson, and one, moreover, of some importance in the world. But Dr. Harrison carries with him the same grace of simplicity whether in town, where "the beau-monde resort," or in his own country parsonage. And this is Fielding's picture of an affluent country parson's home in the mid-eighteenth century:

The situation of the parish under my good friend's care is very pleasant, it is placed among meadows washed by a pure trout stream, and flanked on both sides with downs. His house would not indeed much attract the admiration of the virtuoso. He built it himself, and it is remarkable only for its plainness; with which the furniture so well agrees, that there is no one thing in it that may not be absolutely necessary, except books, and the prints of Mr. Hogarth, whom he calls a moral satirist. Nothing, however, can be imagined more agreeable than the life the doctor leads in the homely house, which he calls his earthly paradise. All his parishioners, whom he treats as his children, regard him as their common father. Once in a week he constantly visits every house in the parish, examines, commends, and rebukes, as he finds occasion. This is practised likewise by his curate in his absence; and so good an effect is produced by their care, that no quarrels ever proceed either to blows or law suits; no beggar is to be found in the whole parish; nor did I ever hear a very profane oath all the time I lived in it.

If we add to that account of the good Doctor the observations that he possessed the art of thinking and yet preserving a pleasant countenance the while; that his generosity was boundless and yet wise; and that he was often heard to say "that a wicked soul is the greatest object of compassion in the world," then the figure of the parson who achieved the finest simplicity of life, even though hampered by a comfortable income, stands worthily beside that of his nameless and poorer brother. Dr. Harrison comes before us in the cassock and wig of 1750. To complete our eighteenth century pictures we must step a little further back into the days of Sir Roger de Coverley, and a little forward into those of Goldsmith. Sir Roger, in 1711, found for his village parson and private chaplain a man who was a good scholar, "though he does not show it," who was every day soliciting the worthy knight for something on behalf of one or other of his parishioners, but who never, for all the thirty years of his cure, had asked anything for himself, and who (like Dr. Harrison) was the peace-maker in every dispute—"there has not been a lawsuit in the parish since he came among us," said Sir Roger. Mr. Spectator does not draw his country parson with Fielding's firm and vivacious touch, but we may discern clearly enough the wise and kindly village pastor, and one moreover who "understood a little of backgammon." And lastly the most famous of all wearers of wig and bands, the most perfect example, with his brother in simplicity, the Rev. Mr. Abraham Adams, of the English village parson of the time, steps from out the latter years of the century in the immortal person of Dr. Primrose. What mere quotation can convey even a suggestion of Goldsmith's picture, can suggest the simplicity and completeness of the life led by the Vicar and his Household on £15 a year and a farm of about twenty acres? "Nothing could exceed the neatness of my little encloses," says Dr. Primrose, "the elms and hedges appearing with inexpressible beauty. My house consisted of but one storey, and was covered with thatch, which gave it an air of great snugness . . . though the same room served us for parlour and kitchen, that only made it the warmer. Besides, as it was kept with the utmost neatness, dishes, plates, and coppers being well scoured, and all disposed on bright rows on the shelves, the eye was agreeably relieved and did not want richer furniture." From this little homestead the Vicar and his son went each morning after prayers to till their farm, working till sundown, with but half an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner, which time "was taken up in innocent mirth between my wife and daughters, and philosophical arguments between my son and me." In haying-time all dined in the field, the cloth spread upon the hay, while the talk was of Mr. Gay's verses, or of Ovid, or of some rustic ballad.

At sunset the Doctor and his son came home, to find "smiling looks, a neat hearth and pleasant fire" awaiting them. Sometimes, if the field labours were finished early, the whole family drank tea in the shade of honeysuckle and hawthorn; and while Sophia and Olivia sang to the guitar, the Vicar and his wife "would stroll down the sloping field, that was embellished with bluebells and centaury, talk of our children with rapture, and enjoy the breeze that wafted both health and harmony."

To step into these eighteenth century lives, drawn, be it remembered, by masters so diverse as the exuberant and robust Fielding, the gentle Goldsmith, the calm Addison, is to recover our lost sense of true simplicity. For the loss of that sense we have to thank the spurious simplicitarian in our midst, with his diets of nuts, his pre-occupations with furniture, his pamphlets, his Garden Cities, his Guilds, his lectures. All these things may, and do, manufacture the simple prig. They will never yield the fine flower of the simple life.

AN OUTDOOR BREVIARY—III.

THE Greeks represented Iris, the messenger of the Gods, as the daughter of Wonder. And, indeed, she is a wild-fire, with colours crude as the hues left in puddles by some drops of tar. To go out to look for a rainbow is perhaps as foolish as to look into the night, not for sober starlight, but for fireworks. But yet, upon a day when the air was washed so transparent by a heavy fall of rain, the hues of the middle distance were as rich as those near at hand, the column rose that confuted us, built up of water and colour and high light. Upon a background of dull cloud this flame of "many colours of precious jewels" simulated solidity; but where the solid earth stood behind, the transparency of the jet of liquid glaze was manifest, and the divided little fields and hedges shone through it, and tattered thorns, a steeple, a congregation of great stones, all showed lustrous and transformed behind it. Through some such a many-coloured glass one could see, perhaps, with the spiritual eye of Thomas Traherne, in the days of his sweet and anxious apprehensions of the world when he was a child, and when:

"All appeared new and strange at first, inexpressibly rare and delightful and beautiful. I was a little stranger which at my entrance into the world was saluted and surrounded with innumerable joys. My knowledge was Divine; I knew by intuition those things which since my apostasy I collected again by the highest reason. . . . All things were spotless and pure and glorious; yea, and infinitely mine and joyful and precious. . . . I was entertained like an angel with the works of God in their splendour and glory; I saw all in the peace of Eden. . . .

"The corn was orient and immortal wheat which never should be reaped nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting. The dust and stones of the streets were as precious as gold: the gates were at first the end of the world. The green trees, when I saw them first through one of the gates, transported and ravished me; their sweetness and unusual beauty made my heart to leap, and almost mad with ecstasy, they were such strange and wonderful things. The Men! O what venerable and reverend creatures did the aged seem! Immortal Cherubims! And young men glittering and sparkling angels, and maids, strange seraphic pieces of life and beauty! Boys and girls tumbling in the street were moving jewels; I knew not that they were born or should die. But all things abided eternally, as they were in their proper places. Eternity was manifest in the Light of the Day, and something infinite behind everything appeared, which talked with my expectation and moved my desire. The City seemed to stand in Eden, or to be built in Heaven. The streets were mine, the temple was mine, the people were mine, their clothes and gold and silver were mine, as much as their sparkling eyes, fair skins and ruddy faces. The skies were mine, and so were the sun and moon and stars, and all the world was mine; and I the only spectator and enjoyer of it."

After rain; the grass rustles and ticks like a watch; and is alive, for "the verie essence, and, as it were, springe heade and origine of all musicke is the verie pleasante sounde which the trees of the foreste doe make as the growe," and the grasses as they spring.

Under the beech-hanger the ground snaps and crackles like the burning of thorns, with the brittle beech-nuts and the crisp drift of rust-brown leaves stirred every now and then by an earth-coloured toad limping heavily among them. Sometimes there opens a colonnade of slim, long-drawn tree-stems, with the light running down them as it washes smooth pillars—"pillars of silver in sockets of gold"; as they lay their slanting blue-grey columns of shadow upon the ground. The roof is an almost cloud-like reticulation of innumerable purplish leafless branches, but at half-way a spray of red foliage would be thrown out flat, the light lying flatly along it so that against a dark background it seemed almost luminous. Then a leaf flashes and sidles down slowly as if it had been suspended by a wire. A stone's-throw from the younger beeches, a chorus-leader among them, was a solitary, web-rooted tree with deep mossed plinth and silver-green trunk, solid as a church pillar and lit by a brimstone butterfly alighted there. But it returns—the butterfly—to the irregular colonnade that leads to nothing. It is never the single tree that we follow, but the magnificent mass of them; the scented earth between their roots, the vague sea-like rumour and hiss of the wood, the hypnotic passes of their branches, "that emanation from old trees that so wonderfully changes and renews a weary spirit."

There is a great oak where I often sit upon the crisp, grey grass of the mound at its foot or lean against its patched trunk, massive and wonderful, in all things like "the tower of David builded for an armoury, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men." Beneath it I have passed bright March days, moving over unchecked by foliage or cloud, like a stream of purest mountain water, travelling with swift and animated flow under flashing sunbeams; and listened to the piping of birds whose every shrill and long-drawn note broke within me like a flight of bubbles.

And later in the season of leaves I have realised that dream of a disappointed man whose only wish, when passing out of the gates of life, was once more to lie in the shifting shade under an ash-sapling on the slope of a high-shouldered field; once more to watch the moving track of the wind, rushing a dark wave over the bright seeded grass of the meadow, or drying the pale green of the hill pastures. And when the leaves are thick upon the tree I can look up to the hollow dome, where the wind passes to and fro happily, and the congregated leaves reply softly; and now, or at any distance of time, I can see the sharp blue crystals of sky between the chinks of the roof.

Vague and speechless voices of leaves! What did the dim oak-grove of Dodona do, with its resonant instruments of brass to catch the faintest rumour among the leaves, but "perpetuate the fancy that the sounds of the wind in the trees may be for certain prepared and chosen ears, intelligible voices."

There is a tradition lingering still that the Downs—which Aubrey called "the greatest remains that he could hear of the smooth primitive world" when it lay all under water—were once almost covered with wood; and the people say that the King could follow the chase for forty miles through a succession of copses and woods; where now is nil nisi campus et aer, in some places not a tree, hardly a bush wherein to shelter from the shower. A smooth, primitive world: everywhere what smoothness and absence of rigidity, for the "long low line" of the down seems to move as if the wind would make new ripples and folds upon the grey surface like those the sea in quiet weather leaves upon the sand. From a height you may see the mounded barrows; the "grey wethers" that go down in troops in their greener bed like cattle in a summer's day to a stream. Not a footfall reaches you on the hill which thrills with the flutes of silence. Even the muttering of the telegraph wires has fallen away; there is only now and again the note of the "sishing" wind moving up and down in the dry grass; and the wheeling and wailing plover.

Below and around, like a map washed in with pale colours, buff and grey and palest green, lie the swells of cultivated downs, the white highways, the divided fields, where the brown of the newly-ploughed contrasts with the grey of the fallows, or the squares of springing wheat, luminous as a green flame. Here again are patches of ancient sheep-walk, fragrant in summer with wild thyme and burnet, where the turf is "of short, sweet grasse, good for sheep, and delightful to the eye for its smoothness, like a bowling-green."

The shepherds of the plain are becoming rarer, but those that still remain wear their long black or blue cloak and round felt hat of antique shape. But Aubrey, long ago, noticed a deterioration in their habit, which was once (says he) that of the Roman or Arcadian shepherds—"a long white cloak with a very deep cape, which comes half-way down their backs, made of the locks of sheep. There was a sheep crooke, a sling, a scrip, their tar-box, a pipe or flute, and their dog. But since 1671 they are grown so luxurious as to neglect this ancient warme and useful fashion and go à la mode." So the picturesque perpetually recedes further back.

Towards the late afternoon the blue has dropped away from the lower sky, as a dyed cloth bleaches in keen air, until a pale glass-like colour is left—like the very pale green panes that filled the church windows half a century ago—through which the huge sun soars downward to the shining edge of the pale-coloured world. It is here, in the empty Downs that Richard Jefferies' worship of the "great sun in the heaven" becomes fitly explicable; for the eye not caught or tangled by a tower or tree ever runs smoothly on to where moves and soars the streaming sun itself—light of light, the "house of mirth," the "saint" itself whose nimbus has encroached upon its face!

Against the far woods, covered by a blot of shadow rolling up the hill, indigo-blue, like tattooing upon the brown breast of the earth, shines the blossomed white cherry, like a puff of smoke drifting upon the wood, white as the wool of the Nymph's sheep, bush beyond white bush, and few far trees, a faint nest showing. Nearer, it shines like the silver veins of a niello, fine and radiant, and its sudden beauty

Stings like an agile bead of boiling gold.

Some philosophers and fathers thought that the world was created in spring; and in spring is revived and re-enacts its creation. "Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."

There is a charmed moment before full-leaved spring when the clear jewel-green of the leafing willow, the grey-green of the fruiting willow, the gold-notched wands of the male plant still flowering by its side, the blackthorn dipped in a crust of snow, the gorse blazing in yellow patches, "like the far lustre of a god-like town," contrast with the dull purple-browns of the later-leaving trees. Later, as the days move past, and the leafy and luminous haze spreads upon the woodland, we hardly realise how our stage is narrowed. Instead of the transparency of the leafless wood through which the white-flecked wings of the wood-pigeon flash as it flaps to its resting-pine, and through which the constellated primroses shine from out of the very centre, the myriad leafing boughs shut out all vision beyond a few paces. The wood lets down its curtain, that grows denser every day; it becomes a sweet and festive place, saying, like St. Francis of Assisi, "secretum meum mihi."

FRANION

A GAY, reckless fellow, gallant, paramour, and also, in Spenser, a loose woman. The word first appears in the sixteenth century (1571), and the N.E.D. gives several examples of it in the above sense. It is evidently a loan word. The N.E.D. compares O.F. fraignant, pres. part. of fraindre, to break. Prof. Skeat (Concise Dictionary) adopts this etymology. It does not, however, appear that fraignant was used as an epithet in O.F. It is a comparatively rare word, and means "brittle" (Godefroy). I suggest another etymon which, while raising considerable phonetic difficulties, suits the sense exactly, viz., F. "fringant, qui est d'humeur très vive, très séillante, e.g., Fille jeune et fringante. Une jeune fringante. Faire le fringant" (D.G.). For the probable origin of the verb fringeur, v. Körting (fringillus, finch) and Diez, p. 589. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the F. word was used generally in a rather bad sense. Cotgrave has "fringant, gay, spruce, compt, gallant, fine; fringuercau, a jetter, spruce minion, gay fellow, compt youth, also, a licentious or lascivious person; fringuer, to jet, or brave it, to be fine, spruce, trimme, neat, also, to minionize, or wantonize it. . . ." At this point the excellent Cotgrave become unquotable, as also s.v. faire la fringue and fringuerie. Palsgrave has "fringuercau, gettar a braggar, fringuerie, gettyng, braggynge," and also becomes unquotable in the case of the verb fringuer (558,2). This etymology answers so well to the meaning of franion that I am tempted to offer it as a guess. Phonetically it is very lame, as the word appears at a period when F. i was not completely nasalized. The change of ending might be explained by the influence of the synonymous word minion, for which Godefroy gives a (doubtful) variant maignon.

ERNEST WEEKLEY.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

February 26th, 1909.—Dr. C. Chree, F.R.S., President in the Chair.

The meeting was held at the Finsbury Technical College, by invitation of Prof. S. P. Thompson and Prof. E. G. Coker. The new Engineering Laboratory of the College was open to Fellows for inspection.

A paper entitled "A Laboratory Machine for Applying Bending and Twisting Moments simultaneously" was read by Prof. Coker. The present paper describes a machine built by students of the City and Guilds Technical College, Finsbury, in which uniform bending and twisting moments can be applied simultaneously over the whole length of the specimen, and in any desired proportion to each other. The principle of the design is to suspend a rod at two intermediate points by wires depending from a fixed support. The equal overhanging ends of the rod are loaded by weights W , so that the applied couple between the points of support is uniform and of amount Wa , where a is the length of the lever-arm. The rod is also twisted by weights W_1 attached to equal arms of length b , so that there is a uniform twisting moment of amount W_1b between the points of suspension. The two systems of loading are independent, and their ratio can be adjusted to any value desired. The paper then describes in detail the various parts of the actual machine, and shows how the accurate measurement of the strains can be effected. In addition to its applications for bending and twisting, the apparatus may be used for testing a variety of cases of combined stress if a pump is added to give a fluid pressure in the interior of tubes. A test illustrating the failure of bicycle tubing to withstand combined bending and twisting moments, was shown at the meeting.

A paper "On the Self-Demagnetizing Factor of Bar Magnets" by Prof. S. P. Thompson, F.R.S., and Mr. E. W. Moss, was read by Prof. Thompson. This paper consists of three parts:—(i) A discussion of the significance and definition of the self-demagnetizing factor of magnets in general, and of bar-magnets in particular; (ii) a redetermination of the values of the self-demagnetizing factor for bar-magnets of circular section; (iii) determination of the values of the self-demagnetizing factor for bar-magnets of rectangular cross section of various proportions. It is shown that, in general, for every bar-magnet there is a self-demagnetizing action the value of which at the middle of the bar depends, for a given intensity of magnetization, on the length of the bar relatively to its cross section, on the permeability of its parts and on the distribution of its surface-magnetism. Owing to the circumstance that with every kind of steel the permeability is neither constant nor stands in any simple relation to the flux-density, any calculation of the actual polar distribution for rods and bars is impracticable. The only form of magnet that is practicable for calculation is that of the ellipsoid, the properties of which are that for any and every value of the permeability, and in any uniform field, the surface magnetism is so distributed that the magnetic force which this distribution exerts in the interior is uniform at every point within, and therefore the internal demagnetizing force everywhere within is constant. The amount of self-demagnetizing force per unit of intrinsic magnetization is recognized as the self-demagnetizing factor and has a definite value for ellipsoids of revolution of any assigned ellipticity. In the case of cylindrical bar-magnets the ratio of the nett value of the self-demagnetizing force for the whole bar divided by the internal magnetization is called the self-demagnetizing factor. The dimension-ratio of a bar-magnet is taken as the length divided by the square root of the cross section. Experiments were first made on the values of the self-demagnetizing factor for bar-magnets of circular section, and the results compared with those obtained by Du Bois and Riborg Mann. The values obtained are lower than those found by either of the experimenters named. The determinations were carried down to shorter rods than those examined by either of them, and the discrepancies between their results and the present ones are smaller as the dimension-ratios are larger. It is pointed out that one explanation of the differences may be due to the fact that the magnetizing solenoid employed by Riborg Mann was not sufficiently long. Experiments were made to determine the self demagnetizing factor for bar-magnets of rectangular cross section, and it was found that for equal values of the dimension-ratio the factor for bars having a sectional ratio of 2:1 was about 93 per cent. of that for bars of square section; while for flat bars, having a sectional ratio of 10:1, the value of the self-demagnetizing factor went down to about 75 per cent. of that for bars of square section.

Mr. C. R. Darling exhibited the following:—

An experiment to illustrate the temperature of equal density of aniline and water.—The density of aniline at 0°C. is 1.038, and at 100° 0.945, the diminution in density between the two temperatures being practically constant. As the density of water at 100° is 0.959, the temperature-density curves of the two liquids cross each other, showing an equal density at about 63°. By dropping aniline into water at atmospheric temperature, the superior density of the former is shown by the drops remaining at the bottom of the vessel; but when allowed to fall in water at about 80°, the drops of aniline sink until the temperature of the water is attained, and then rise to the surface. By taking a U-tube, with the communicating part of narrow bore, and placing aniline in one branch and water in the other, the aniline column is seen to be shorter at low temperatures; but on surrounding the U-tube with a water-bath and heating, the columns will be seen to be equal in height at 63°; whilst at higher temperatures the column of aniline is longer than that of water.

A simple form of thermo-electric pyrometer for students' use.—In this instrument the hot junction of nickel and steel, or iron and constantan, is protected by a mild-steel cap, bored from the solid, and about 6 inches in length. This cap is screwed to an iron barrel of any desired length; and the wires pass from the junction through twin-bore fireclay to terminals screwed into a piece of hard fibre. The terminals are made of the same metal as that of the wire attached, and leads of the same wire are taken to a cold junction, kept in oil, and the indicator. The pyrometer is easily put together by students, and is used to form a temperature-scale from the deflections of a galvanometer by insertion in molten metals, or salts of known freezing-points. The mild-steel cap resists the action of molten substances far better than porcelain or silica, and enables the junction to follow a changing temperature more rapidly. The errors incidental to the forms usually sold, in which no provision is made for a cold junction, are avoided; and no damage ensues from dropping or rough usage, as in the case of pyrometers protected by porcelain or silica. The cap, when worn out, is readily replaced.

A combined metre-bridge and potentiometer, with new tapping-key device, for pyrometric and general laboratory work.—The arrangement of this apparatus is that of an ordinary metre-bridge, with four gaps, but with 4 metres of stretched wire; so that 1, 2, 3, or 4 metres of wire may be used in a bridge test. Between each pair of wires is placed a groove, through which passes a rod of phosphor-bronze on which the tapping-key slides. These rods are connected to a terminal at the side; hence it is not necessary to connect directly to the keys. The keys are furnished with two knife-edges, and may be depressed on to the wire on either side of the groove in which they slide, thus facilitating the finding of the balance-point. Each wire is furnished with an arrangement for tightening. The apparatus may be used as an ordinary bridge, or as a bridge with calibrated wire, it being possible to calibrate any wire by the aid of the others. It may also be used for the measurement of the E.M.F. of thermal junctions, constants of cells, etc., and all the ordinary purposes of a stretched-wire potentiometer.

A new form of carbon-plate rheostat, suitable for control of small electric furnaces.—The defect of the ordinary carbon-plate rheostat—difficulty of accurate control when consuming a large amount of energy—is overcome in this instrument by the use of four rows of plates, each 2 inches square, there being 22 plates in each row. Each set of plates is furnished with a separate adjusting screw, and hence may be kept at different degrees of tightness. By means of simple connecting devices, the plates may be used in series or parallel as desired. This form of rheostat is found to be well adapted for regulating electric-tube furnaces, and for varying the current to any desired extent during the calibration of instruments, etc.

LINNEAN SOCIETY OF LONDON.

March 4th, 1909.—General meeting, Dr. D. H. Scott, F.R.S., President, in the Chair.

The Minutes of the General Meeting of February 18th, 1909, were read and confirmed.

Mr. R. A. Rolfe, A.L.S., exhibited flowers of several crosses derived from the hybrid Epidendrum kewense and its parents, which showed Mendelian phenomena.

Dr. A. B. Rendle and Prof. Weiss contributed some remarks, and Mr. Rolfe replied.

Prof. F. E. Weiss exhibited actual specimens of the curious development of the roots of a sycamore which had grown on very stony soil, and further illustrated the developments by lantern-slides.

Dr. O. Stapf, Mr. J. C. Shenstone, and the President remarked upon the phenomena thus shown.

Miss L. S. Gibbs read her paper entitled "A Contribution to the Montane Flora of Fiji, including Cryptogams, with Ecological Notes." The Fiji group consists of 200 islands, only 80 of which are inhabited; Viti Levu is about 4,100 square miles in area, with forest-clad mountain ranges, the highest point being Mt. Victoria, 4,000 feet in height. The botanical history of the group begins with the visit of H.M.S. Sulphur in 1840, and in the same year the Wilkes Expedition touched at the islands. The Herald called in 1856, and Dr. Seemann visited the group in 1860-61, and embodied his results in his "Flora Viaticensis." Mr. Horne, Director of the Botanic Gardens at Mauritius, spent a year collecting in the late '70's.

Thanks to these investigators, the flora of the lower parts of the chief islands are fairly well known. The Author therefore decided to confine her investigations to the region lying at 2,000 feet and above, and the three spring months of August, September, and October were spent at Nadarivatu, the highest inhabited point.

From the collections the flora may be described as Indo-Malayan. They contain about 40 new species and many new records. Thus of the eight species of Piper Mr. C. de Candolle found five to be new, and of Peperomia all seven proved novelties. The introduction concludes with some observations as to the origin of the flora, and is followed by a systematic enumeration of the whole collection. An animated discussion followed.

THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

March 2nd, 1909.—G. A. Boulenger, Esq., F.R.S., Vice-President, in the Chair.

Mr. R. H. Burne, F.Z.S., exhibited specimens of elastic mechanisms in fishes and a snake which had been prepared for the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons.

Dr. R. F. Scharff, B.Sc., F.Z.S., exhibited a number of reindeer bones and antlers, obtained from Irish caves, which displayed marks showing that they had been gnawed by different kinds of animals, probably in some cases by rodents.

Mr. R. I. Pocock, F.L.S., F.Z.S., exhibited the skulls of some leopards, and called attention to the differences in skulls from Africa and India, and to the evidence afforded by them as to the existence of a small and large type leopard in Africa.

Miss Margaret Poole read a paper on "The Development of the Subdivisions of the Pleuro-peritoneal Cavity in Birds," communicated by Prof. G. C. Bourne, D.Sc., F.Z.S., and illustrated her remarks with lantern slides.

A paper was received from Mr. E. S. Russell, M.A., entitled "The Growth of the Shell of Patella vulgata L.," communicated by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, F.Z.S., of which the following is a summary:—

The breeding-season of this limpet extends from July to January. Sexual maturity is reached at a length of 20-25 mm. An average size for a limpet of the last season's brood in January or February is 10 mm.; at the end of the first year it may be 29 mm. Probable sizes at the end of the second and subsequent years are 38, 44, 48, 53 mm. Shells over 50 mm. may be considerably more than five years old.

Sexual maturity is reached in the first year and when the limpet is only half-grown. The rate of growth decreases with age and maturity, and is slower during the colder months of the year. Considerable changes take place in the ratios of the shells' dimensions during growth, being probably in large part the expression of "laws of growth" and not due to natural selection.

Mr. Frank Balfour-Browne, M.A., F.R.S.E., F.Z.S., presented a paper on "The Life History of the Agrioid Dragonfly."

Mr. C. Davies Sherborn, F.Z.S., communicated a paper by Mr. W. D. Lang, M.A., F.Z.S., entitled "Growth-stages in the British Species of the Coral Genus Parasmilia."

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE

THE Annual Report on the work of University College, London, has just been issued.

Number of Students.—The total number of students during the Session 1907-8 was 1,361, being an increase of 170 on that of the preceding Session. Of these, 1,178 were students in the Faculties of Arts, Laws, Science, and Engineering, and 183 were students in the Faculty of Medical Sciences. There were 229 Post-graduate and Research students.

Benefactions.—Grateful acknowledgment is made for various benefactions. The principal of these are as follows: A bequest of £5,000 by the late Mr. Thomas Webb, of London and Cardiff, which is to be used for the completion and fitting of the new Physiology Building; a bequest of £500 by Mr. H. A. Kay, which is to be used for the rearrangement and re-equipment of the College buildings; a bequest of £1,000 by the late Prof. Bunnell Lewis for the foundation of a "Bunnell Lewis" Prize in Original Latin Verse Composition; a bequest of £1,541 by the late Madame Halton for the foundation of prizes to be known as the "L. M. Rothschild" and the "Hester Rothschild" Prizes, which will be awarded during the next three years, one for proficiency in Hebrew and Aramaic, and the other for proficiency in French Language and Literature. The benefactions also include a gift by the Past Engineering Students' Committee of £410 for the new equipment of the Engineering Departments, and a donation of £50 by Mr. Yarrow for the provision of apparatus in the Mechanical Engineering Department.

Besides the Grants from the Treasury, the India Office, and the London County Council, the College benefited during the past year by Grants from the Carpenters' Company for Architecture, from the Chadwick Trustees for Municipal Engineering and Hygiene, from the Drapers' Company for Applied Mathematics, and from the Mercers' Company for Physiology.

Events of the Year.—The Report refers at length to the Chancellor's visit in March last, when he opened the new Libraries and the South Wing. It also refers to the inauguration of University College Hall, Ealing, and the Unveiling of the "John Oliver Hobbes" Memorial.

Buildings.—Rapid progress has been made with the new buildings for the Department of Physiology, which will be ready for occupation next month. The rearrangement and re-equipment of the College buildings resulting from the acquisition of the South Wing for University purposes is steadily progressing. This involved an expenditure for rearrangement and re-equipment during the year of £5,987 16s. 6d.

Public Lectures.—During the year, a large number of Public Lectures and Courses of Lectures have been organised, which have been attended by over 3,000 persons. There have been five special courses for Teachers organised in co-operation with the Education Committee of the London County Council. Among the courses of Public Lectures the four most noteworthy, as indicating new departures, are Prof. Kuno Meyer's course on "Celtic Languages and their Literatures"; Prof. Fleming's course on "The Scientific Principles of Wireless Telegraphy"; Mr. Jago's course on "Forensic Chemistry," and a new training course in School Hygiene by Prof. Kenwood, aided by Dr. Meredith Richards.

Faculty Organisation.—The Faculties have been re-organised so that there are now five Faculties—namely, Arts, Laws, Science, Engineering, and Medical Sciences. In order to assist the Deans in the two most complex Faculties (i.e., those of Arts and Science) the office of Sub-Dean has been created for the purpose of providing greater facilities for giving students advice, and for supervising and regulating their courses of study.

Arrangements for Research.—The organisation of the arrangements for Post-graduate Courses and for Research has been improved, with a result that the number of Post-graduate and Research students has increased from 171 to 239. The Report contains lists of original papers and other publications that have been issued during the past year. These include many noteworthy publications. The activity of the Department of Applied Mathematics under Prof. Karl Pearson, including the Galton Laboratory for National Eugenics, is marked by the issue of 27 publications, and that of the Department of Chemistry under Profs. Sir William Ramsay and J. Norman Collie, by the publication of 40 original papers.

The work of the Department of Egyptology has been successfully developed under Prof. Petrie and the excavations at Memphis (the cost of which is about £3,000 a year) are being steadily proceeded with.

Libraries.—The accessions to the Libraries have been 3,580 volumes, of which, 2,600 have been bequests or gifts, and 980 purchases. The rearrangement of the Libraries consequent on the increase of space available for them, has made rapid progress, and the card catalogues are very nearly complete.

Student Activities.—The Report contains information as to the various student activities during the year, which show that the corporate life is in a healthy condition. Perhaps the most noteworthy of these is the acquisition of the new Athletic Ground at Perivale, which was opened on June 3rd by the Vice-Chancellor, accompanied by Lady Collins.

Equipment and Endowment Fund.—The Report closes with a summary of the urgent needs of the College. The need for new buildings for the Department of Chemistry at a cost of about £70,000 is placed in the forefront. The Chancellor (the Right Hon. the Earl of Rosebery) has intimated his willingness to subscribe £1,000 to a fund for the erection of new Chemical Laboratories.

Finance.—The expenditure for the year, including the amount already referred to on the rearrangement and re-equipment of buildings, and including the expenditure from Trust Funds, was £53,535, of which £2,855, being part of the expenditure on the rearrangement and re-equipment of buildings, is taken to Suspense Account to be provided by donations, or, failing these, out of the revenue of subsequent years.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE PRE-EMINENCE OF THE ACADEMY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Since you claim for THE ACADEMY a pre-eminence over the other weeklies as a judge of literature, and especially poetry, you may be interested to know that certain translations of Horace in your issue of the 6th of March are so inferior and so full of mistakes that they would not be tolerated in any of your despised contemporaries, not even in that "illiterate sheet," as you facetiously style the Saturday Review. These pieces of verse sin against the laws of grammar, scansion, and translation :

HORACE, ODE III., 13.

"O well, whose waters as the crystal shine
Bandusia, worthy vintage to be shed,
And not without a flower visited,
A kid with swelling brow to-morrow is thine,
Whose horns to war and wantonness destine
In vain; in vain, for his dark blood shall spread
Child of the frolic fold, in thy chill bed"; etc.

"Fons" is a spring, not a well. "Worthy vintage to be shed," means, I suppose, "worthy of vintage to be shed," but it reads as if the water were the vintage, just as "child of the frolic fold," from its position in the sentence, ought to refer to the spring. "Destine" is queer scansion; in the other version, "destined" is normally scanned, also "destine" has no object; you must supply "him."

Here is an extract from the second effort :

HORACE, ODE III., 30.

"Where never the loose wind in rage is spent,
Nor flight of ages, nor the wasteful rain;
The Earth can have but earth, which is his due;
I shall not wholly die; best part of me
Shall ever live young, destined to renew
And to be praised of ages yet to be,
While climb the Hill the Priest with Maid sedate :
Loud Aufidius' son shall Fame describe—" etc.

"Possit diruere" means "can destroy," not "is spent." "Innumeras annorum series et fuga temporum" is scantly rendered by "flight of ages." "Libitina" the Death-Goddess, disappears in "Earth," which might stand if Earth were allowed to be feminine. "Shall ever live young" is not normal scansion; "While climb the Hill the Priest" is very bad grammar, and the next line does not scan at all. The river is "Aufidus," not "Aufidius," and the penultimate "i" is obviously inserted to give the necessary long syllable to eke out a stumbling verse.

Finally,

"So take deserved place
The deeds have won,"

is probably a misprint for "Thy," addressing Melpomene, though she comes in rather late in this version, but I have known you, Sir, wax very indignant over misprints and misquotations in other papers. I trust you will insert this in fairness to Horace and yourself.

8 Salisbury Road, Hove, March 9th, 1909.

CYRIL STARKEY.

[Fons can, of course, as every schoolboy knows, be equally translated by "well," "fountain" or "spring." "Worthy vintage to be shed" means exactly what it says. Destine may appear "queer scansion" to our learned critic, Mr. Cyril Starkey, but it is quite correct for all that, nor does it require an object, nor must we supply "him." A reference to any standard English dictionary would have prevented Mr. Starkey from making such an ignorant blunder. The word "destine" is here used as the past participle, and has the meaning of "destinate." The printer's reader has made a slip in confusing the name of "Aufidus," the river, with that of "Aufidius," the orator, and we take blame to ourselves for not noticing this, but apart from that Mr. Starkey's objections are either ignorant or frivolous. The difficulty of turning an ode of Horace into a sonnet, as in the first poem, and into rhymed verse as in the second poem, could not possibly be got over without some license as to translation. Most critics, who are not hide-bound pedants, will be inclined to agree with us that Miss Jourdain's versions combine great poetical skill with, on the whole, wonderfully accurate translation. "While climb the hill the Priest with maid sedate" is perfectly good grammar. Mr. Starkey will find similar constructions all over the poetical writings of Milton if he cares to instruct himself. Finally, we have never "waxed very indignant over misprints and misquotations in other papers." To do so would be absurd, unless there were reason to believe them deliberate. Anyone who has any experience of journalism knows that misprints and misquotations are bound to occur from time to time.—Ed.]

"SHALL" AND "WILL."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I noticed, some time ago, in the very interesting treatise on shall and will, published by Blackie and Co., the following:—

(a)—(p. 17) I may say, for instance : I will be satisfied if you grant me an interview of five minutes. This is, in reality, a promise.

(b)—(p. 17) Again, I may say : I will be very angry if my orders are disobeyed; meaning : I intend to be angry, I am resolved to be angry.

(c)—(p. 19) I shall, in certain circumstances, is stronger than I will.... I shall never forgive him, is a stronger affirmation than I will never forgive him.

(d)—(p. 20) I shall write to The Times about this, said an angry Englishman. I will write to The Times, would be mild in comparison.

(e)—(p. 33) Several English writers have noticed a curious use of shall, which prevails amongst the best class of servant-maids in Dublin, and possibly in other Irish towns. When asked to deliver a message, or to execute some commission, they say, "I shall, sir." This is perfectly good English, but it does not mean exactly what they intend to convey. Here the form, I shall sounds harsh (?) to English ears, and suggests a want of courtesy (sic) and good will (sic).

On the other hand, if a student is to be guided by the rules laid down in the treatise on Shall and will, published by Hachette and Company, he will consider all the examples above quoted as mistakes.

Now, with the commonsense with which Providence has endowed me, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that both authors cannot be right. I shall, therefore, feel much obliged to you, sir, if you will kindly let me know whether my French interpretation of shall and will, in the following instances, is right or wrong, in order that I may adopt or reject it in future, as the case may be.

I beg to submit that (a) I will be satisfied and (b) I will be angry, referring to the author's feelings, a thing over which one cannot have any control, and over which one cannot exercise one's will, are both wrong; and I therefore consider that I shall must be used in both circumstances instead of I will.

(c) I shall, to my mind, can never be stronger than I will, the former meaning, in French, Je dois (vous obéir), c'est mon devoir (de vous obéir), je dois me soumettre passivement (à votre volonté), and the latter conveying the meaning of independence "Je veux." Besides, did not shall originally mean, in English, obligation, debt? Is it not Chaucer who says: "The faith I shall (I owe) to God? La foi que je dois à Dieu?"

Referring now to paragraph (d), if the writer of The Times had said I will, he would have meant a promise combined with a threat; by saying I shall, he merely meant simple futurity combined with modesty. He might also have meant this: "Though I am not willing to do so, I am, however, compelled by circumstances to apply to The Times, which would mean in French: "Les circonstances me forcent, bien malgré moi, à m'adresser au Times." This is the rule given by Bain to that effect: "I will may be softened into I shall, even in cases of determination, to give less of the appearance of egotism, the speaker pretending, as it were, that he is the humble instrument of events in what he is about to do; but the substitution of I will for I shall is always an error."

(e) With regard to the Irish maid-servants' saying to the person who addressed them: "I shall, sir," I think that I shall, here, is perfectly and in its proper place, considering the subordinate position held by maid-servants in general.

The very nature of I shall supposes some influence from without; the use of I will, which expresses the absence of all external pressure, would, on the contrary, show the independence of maid-servants and thereby constitute a piece of impertinence on their part. In fact, as far as I remember, all maid-servants in Shakespeare's works make use of I shall under similar circumstances. For the same reason, I consider that Lord Chesterfield, in the following example, shows more deference and humility to the lady he addresses himself to, than he would have done, if he had used I will.

Permit me, Madam, to assure you of the esteem and veneration with which I shall ever be, madam, your obedient servant,
L. Chesterfield.

Permettez, Madame, que je vous assure de l'estime et de la vénération avec lesquelles Je serai toute ma vie (c'est-à-dire, il est de mon devoir d'être toute ma vie) Madame, votre obéissant serviteur.

A FRENCH LINGUIST.

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY

- El Greco: An Account of his Life and Works.* Albert T. Calvert and C. Gasquoine Hartley, with 136 reproductions from his most celebrated pictures. Lane, 3s. 6d. net.
- Massenet l'Homme—le Musicien.* Louis Schneider. Illustrations et Documents Eneditis. Lionel Isaacs, 21s.

FICTION

- Pomp and Circumstance.* Dorothea Gerard. Long, 6s.
- Cynthia in the Wilderness.* Herbert Wales. Long, 1s. net.
- Irresponsible Kitty.* Curtis Yorke. Long, 6d.
- God's Good Woman.* Eleanore S. Terry. Long, 6s.
- The Painted Mountain.* Peter Lauristoun. Chatto & Windus, 6s.
- Woman's Looking Glass.* Constance Evan Jones. Nesbit, 6s.
- Money.* Marie Connor Leighton. Ward Lock, 6s.
- The Picture of Dorian Gray.* Oscar Wilde. Copyright Edition. Charles Carrington, Paris: leather, 3s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

MAGAZINES

- St. Georges, The Papyrus, The Homiletic Review, The National Gallery* (100 plates in colour), Beautiful Flowers, and How to Grow Them.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Brighton: Its History, its Follies, and its Fashion.* Lewis Melville. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.
- Social Ideals.* Papers on social subjects by Will Crooks, M.P., P. W. Wilson, M.P., George Lansbury, James Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., S. E. Keeble, J. H. Clapham, M.A., and J. A. Faulkner. Culley, 6d. net.
- The Early Education of Children.* Laura L. Plaisted. Clarendon Press, 4s. 6d. net.
- How Telegraphs and Telephones Work.* Charles R. Gibson. Seeley, 1s. 6d. net.
- The Over-Production of Woman, and the Remedy.* Mrs. Erskine. Sisley's, 2s. 6d. net.
- The Acharnians of Aristophanes,* with introduction, critical notes, and commentary by W. Rennie. Arnold, 6s. net.
- Hypnotism; Including a Study of the Chief Points of Psycho-Therapeutics.* Dr. Albert Moll. Walter Scott Publishing Company.

MUSIC

- Folk Songs from Somerset.* Gathered and edited, with piano-forte accompaniment, by Cecil J. Sharp. Simpkin & Co., 5s. net.

POETRY

- Sacred Poems.* Theodore Woodville Morgan. Baker, 1s. net.
- Later Recitations in Verse; Serious and Humorous.* Compiled and Edited by Ernest Pertwee. Routledge, 2s. 6d.

REFERENCE

- The Official Year-Book of the Church of England, 1909.* S.P.C.K., 3s.
- A Dickens' Dictionary.* The characters and scenes of the novels and miscellaneous works. Alphabetically arranged. Alex. J. Philip. Routledge, 8s. 6d. net.
- Pronunciation of Plant Names.* Reprinted from The Gardeners' Chronicle, 1909. The Gardeners' Chronicle, 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

- The World's Great Sermons.* Ten volumes, cloth.: Vol. i., Basil to Calvin; vol. ii., Hooker to South; vol. iii., Massillon to Mason; vol. iv., L. Beecher to Bushnell; vol. v., Guthrie to Mozley; vol. vi., H. W. Beecher to Punshon; vol. vii., Hale to Farrar; vol. viii., Talmage to Knox Little; vol. ix., Cuyler to Van Dyke; vol. x., Gore to Jowett. Compiled by Grenville Kleiser, with assistance from many foremost living preachers and other theologians. Published in London and New York by Funk & Wagnall. These are presented free to the subscribers of The Homiletic Review for 1909—a year's subscription being 12s.

SELFRIDGE'S

OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W

HALF WAY BETWEEN BOND STREET AND MARBLE ARCH

SELFRIDGE'S, the newest and most interesting Shopping centre in Europe: a truly cosmopolitan institution, embodying in construction, equipment and ways of business every modern feature that adds to the comfort, pleasure and convenience of its daily visitors.

A HUNDRED DEPARTMENTS supply nearly every requirement of daily life for Men, Women, and Children (provisions, wines, etc., excepted), and our effort will be to make each Department the VERY BEST of its kind in LONDON, dealing in qualities we know to be absolutely dependable, and selling at what we are determined shall be LONDON'S LOWEST PRICES—ALWAYS

OPENS MARCH 15th

EVERYONE CORDIALLY INVITED

ORDER FROM YOUR LIBRARY

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."
[Ready March 4]

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only pathos from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his—worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

[Ready March 4]

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

THE CENTURY PRESS, 6-9 Surrey St., Strand, London.

Typewriting
TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

HENRY SOTHERAN & CO.,
 BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
 BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
 37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Bartholomew's Survey Gazetteer British Isles, 17s. 6d. net, for 5s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale
THE ART OF GARDEN DESIGN IN ITALY. by Inigo Triggs; 73 Photographic Plates in Collotype, 27 Plans and numerous Sketches in the Text; 4to, buckram; published Longmans, 1906, at £3 13s. 6d. net; for 21s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

NOW READY.

A CHEAPER EDITION OF

THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY

By OSCAR WILDE.

"That great book with its august and terrible moral lesson."

(ACADEMY, January 23rd, 1909.)

Price: Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
 Leather, 3s. net.

To be had of all Booksellers. Supplied to the Trade only by SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LTD.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO.,
 BOOKSELLERS, &c.

32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
 WEEKLY PERIODICALS.

AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
 DIRECTORIES.

A. LIONEL ISAACS,
 59 PICCADILLY, W.

RARE BOOKS, AUTOGRAPHS, & MSS.

Speciality:—French Illustrated Books of the Eighteenth Century and Modern French EDITIONS DE LUXE.

*Gentlemen wishing to dispose of any of these will oblige by kindly reporting same to me.

Catalogue of Rare Books and MSS now ready.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

AN ILLUSTRATED BOOK NEWS MAGAZINE

MAY we draw your attention to "THE BOOK MONTHLY"—of which the March number is now ready—and its usefulness to all concerned with books?

Its information about new books—those coming out and those just out—is full and authoritative. Its articles, especially those on the book trade and on new movements in the book world, are fresh and informing. In "get-up" it is exceedingly attractive, and its illustrations are many and excellent.

There is no other monthly magazine which does the same service as "The Book Monthly"; that is, gives in a compact, agreeable way all the news and information of the current month in bookland—a pictured and picturesque What's What and Who's Who of our English Bookland from month to month.

The magazine is published at Sixpence net at the beginning of each month by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send it, post free, inland or abroad, for a year for Eight Shillings.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
 sg'd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity
 EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London E.C.

Specimens free on application.

From Everett & Co.'s List

NEW FICTION.

MRS. WHISTON'S HOUSE PARTY

By THOMAS COBB.

THE DEVIL'S ACE

By FERGUS HUME.

"A 'mystery' novel of the first water."—Western Mail.

FELIX STONE

By A. & C. ASKEW.

THE DEGENERATE

By FRED WHISHAW.

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON.

"The Iron Heel" is a book for all to read, and its insight, large sympathy, clear reasoning, and high aims are in evidence in every chapter."—Daily Mail Gazette.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"A justifiable attack on those who seek to honour God by dishonouring His methods. . . . Miss Graham tells the story with charm and pathos."—Daily Telegraph.

"Deserves the attention it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM.

"Mr. Wyndham at his best."—Scotsman.
"Mr. Wyndham always writes of military life as one who knows it, and his slight sketches of officers are happy and unexaggerated."—Globe.

London: EVERETT & Co., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

From A. C. FIFIELD'S New List

By WILLIAM ENGLISH WALLING.

RUSSIA'S MESSAGE. The True

World-Import of the Revolution. With 10 Illustrations. Royal 8vo, 476 pages. Indexed, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.

The present volume is not, like so many recent books on Russia, a funeral march over a revolution that has been, but an overture and a prophecy concerning a revolution that is most surely to come. Mr. Walling can give good grounds for the hope that is in him. He has spent a considerable time in Russia, has mixed with the leaders of all parties, has accumulated a vast store of information, and possesses the deeper knowledge that springs from sympathy. His book, indeed, is a book of faith in Russia's destiny. It may be something of a partisan statement, but it is well-informed, idealistic, and absorbing."—Daily News.

By
B. L.
HUTCHINS.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH AGITA-

TION, 1833-48. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 156 pages, 2s. 6d. net.

It sets out with admirable clearness the history of the public health agitation, and tells how Chadwick, Dr. Southwood Smith, and other pioneers created the crusade against disease, which is steadily bringing down the average mortality in this country."—Scotsman.

"Four capital lectures."—Manchester Guardian.

By
C. D. SMITH.

NATURAL MONOPOLIES, in Relation to Social Democracy. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 160 pages, 2s. 6d. net.

This book is a criticism, from the Socialist standpoint, of Mr. Mallock's theory of the relation between labour and ability in the production of wealth, and an attempt to establish an alternative theory. It deals with production and distribution, capital, earnings, ability and manual labour, minimum wages, interest, monopolies of power, position of originators, inducements to surrender monopolies, and a real democratic constitution.

By
T. F.
TAYLOR.

THE FALLACY OF SPEED.

Boards, fcap. 8vo, 1s. net. Postage 1½d.

"Mr. Taylor argues his point with great ingenuity and not a little cogency, and supports his unconventional argument by a surprising number of quotations from well-known people."—Scotsman.

By LADY
CONSTANCE
LYTTON.

"NO VOTES FOR WOMEN." A

Reply to Recent Anti-Suffrage Arguments. Post free 3½d. 32 pages. A temperate but able and forceful exposition of woman's case for suffrage. [2nd Edition in the press.]

By
GERALD
GOULD, B.A.

ON THE NATURE OF LYRIC. An

Essay. Illustrated from the history of English Poetry. Crown 8vo. Wrappers, 2s. net. QUAIN PRIZE ESSAY, 1908.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44 FLEET STREET, E.C.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community.

Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net.

A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 32 2s. net.

[Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly]

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.d., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly]

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES

FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net

[Shortly]

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST

Dutch Painting in the Nineteenth Century

By G. HERMINE MARIUS.

Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS, with a Photogravure and 130 Reproductions in Half Tone.

Royal 8vo, panelled cloth gilt, 15s. net.

The Author of this work—herself an artist—is well known in Holland as a critic of great individuality. Her studies of Ruskin, the three brothers Maris, and her book on Rembrandt have been much appreciated for their sound judgment, a quality not always allied to such enthusiasm as she displays in dealing with her subject.

OLD LONDON

A Series of Fifty Reproductions of Old Engravings Illustrative of the London of our Ancestors.

Compiled by WALTER L. McNAY.

Large 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"Architects and readers of antiquarian tastes will take note of Mr. McNay's 'Old London' . . . The Plates are extremely interesting and carefully reproduced."—Westminster Gazette.

"'Old London' is a book which will appeal to all lovers of old prints."—Daily Mail.

THE ESSAYS OF MEREJKOWSKI

Translated from the Russian by G. A. MOUNSEY.

Fcap. 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net each.

THE LIFE-WORK OF HENDRIK IBSEN.
THE LIFE-WORK OF PLINY THE YOUNGER.
THE LIFE-WORK OF MONTAIGNE.
THE LIFE-WORK OF CALDERON.
THE LIFE-WORK OF FLAUBERT.
MARCUS AURELIUS. Just Published.

Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A MANUAL OF COSTUME, AS ILLUSTRATED BY MONUMENTAL BRASSES. By HERBERT DRUITT.

Indispensable handbook for all interested in Brasses and Costume and Mediæval Archaeology.

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A FIRST GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

A SECOND GERMAN COURSE FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

By Professor H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH. With diagrams. Square 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each. Sold separately.

These books are intended for science students who desire to read, with the expenditure of the minimum amount of time, scientific text-books in German. For this purpose they will be found a valuable aid to a practical working knowledge of the German language. The grammatical portion is simple in arrangement and brief, while the reading examples and diagrams illustrating scientific instruments and experiments will help to fix the names in the memory.

MY LITTLE FRENCH FRIENDS.

By LINA OSWALD. Containing many Illustrations by JEAN BAKEWELL and others, also from Photographs. Demy 8vo, cloth. 2s.

A First book in French written in everyday speech and containing songs with simple music, as well as stories and verse. This is issued uniform with "Little German Folk."

A complete Catalogue will be sent on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD.

The De La More Press, 32 George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

At all Libraries and Bookshops

A NOTABLE WAGNER VOLUME.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF WAGNER. By ANGELO NEUMANN. With 4 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.

"His recollections make us understand Wagner."—Daily News.

A ROMANTIC AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By FRANCIS GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism" and "The Celtic Temperament." Demy 8vo. 6/- net.

Mr. Grierson is known to lovers of critical literature by two small volumes of excellent literary criticism. "The Valley of Shadows" has all the interest and movement of a fascinating and realistic romance.

THE DAYS OF GEORGE THE FOURTH.

GLIMPSES OF THE TWENTIES. By WILLIAM TOYNBEE, Author of "Vignettes of the Regency." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Plates.

Demy 8vo. 12/6 net.

Mr. Toynbee has the town of that time in his mind's eye; its characters are those he lives with, their stories are his stories, and the living, flashing interplay of real life as it was lived in the twenties of last century seems to take form and colour under his pen.

THINGS AS THEY ARE.

ECONOMIC HERESIES: Being an Unorthodox Attempt to Appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things as They Are." By Sir NATHANIEL NATHAN. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.

The author terms this work a study of the economics of reality, meaning thereby an estimate of historical and actual values as opposed to the abstract theorising of the economic schoolmen of the last century. The book is written from the point of view of a shrewd, impartial, unconventional observer, whose politics are subordinated to practical sociology.

FOR SPEAKERS AND READERS.

NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE; OR, A COMMON-SENSE POLICY. By FRANCIS

FRANCIS. Cloth, 1/- net. Paper, 6d. net.

"Dagonet" says in the Referee:—"I have received another excellent little book entitled 'National Independence; or, A Common-sense Policy.' It is a sixpennyworth of 'Wisdom While You Wait.' And the chapter on 'Universal Service' is a gem."

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS. By F. FRANKFORT MOORE

THE PERJURER. By W. E. NORRIS

THE STORY OF THYRZA. By ALICE BROWN

THE SHADOW OF THE CATHEDRAL. By VENCENTE IBANEZ. Trans. from the Spanish by Mrs. W. A. GILLESPIE.

THE ACTRESS. By LOUISE CLOSSER HALE

THE KING IN YELLOW. By R. W. CHAMBERS New ed.

The Oxford and Cambridge Review LENT TERM.

THE WORKING MAN AS AN UNDERGRADUATE.

THE THEOLOGY OF MATTHEW ARNOLD H. W. GARROD

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS: SOME DEFECTS IN THEIR CURRICULUM, AND A REMEDY A. R. GIDNEY

THE RELIGION OF THE UNDERGRADUATE

CANON F. FOAKES-JACKSON, D.D.

ST. ROSE OF VITERBO SIR HOME GORDON, BART.

THE LAST BULLFIGHT AT SALVATERRA

EDGAR PRESTAGE

THE OUTSTANDING BALKAN PROBLEM

V. HUSSEY WALSH

THE ABUSE OF THE WORD "SCIENTIFIC"

M. M. PATTISON MUIR

OLD HEIDELBERG H. R. PURCELL

OXYGEN FOR ATHLETES LEONARD HILL, M.B., F.R.S.

THE CLEAR VISION F. L. BICKLEY

Published once during each term.

Price 2/6 Net.

Annual Subscription 8/6, postage free.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.

10 ORANGE STREET London, W.C. "THE COUNTRY HOME."

A Selection from MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SPRING ANNOUNCEMENT LIST, 1909

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, ETC.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. Jusserand. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A Literary History of Rome. From the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age. By J. Wight Duff, M.A. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Birth of Modern Italy. The Post-humous Papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited with Introduction, Notes and Epilogue, by the Duke Litta-Vicent-Arese. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 40 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Buried City of Knoss. By Thomas Gray. With a Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Hallebury College. By the Rev. L. S. Milford. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Sir Randal Cremer: A Biography. By Howard Evans. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

Eliza Brightwen. The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson. With 2 Portraits and an Introduction by Edmund Gosse. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

History of Civilisation. By Charles Seignobos. Vol. I. Ancient Civilisation. II. Medieval Civilisation. III. Contemporary Civilisation. 5s. net each volume.

SCIENCE and NATURAL HISTORY

That Book Garden of Ours. By Professor F. E. Hulme, F.L.S., F.S.A. With 8 Coloured Plates and 42 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Mysterious Psychic Forces. An Account of the Author's Investigations in Psychical Research, together with those of other European savants. By Camille Flammarion. With 21 Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net.

Psychical Research and the Resurrection. By James H. Hyslop, Ph.D., LL.D. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

How to Study the Stars. By L. Rudaux. With 79 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Psychology and Crime. By Hugo Munsterberg. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

CHEAPER EDITIONS

The Brahmins, Theists, and Muslims of India. By John Campbell Oman, D.Lit. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Economic Interpretation of History. By Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers. La. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Army Reform and Other Addresses. By the Rt. Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

TRAVEL AND DESCRIPTION

The Rise and Progress of the South American Republics. By George W. Crichfield. Illustrated. 2 Vols. Royal 8vo, 25s. net.

Pre-Historic Rhodesia. An Examination of the Ethnological and Archaeological Evidences as to the Origin and Age of the Rock Mines and Stone Buildings, with a Gazetteer of Medieval South Africa. By R. N. Hall. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Mexico. Its Ancient and Modern Civilisation; History and Political Conditions; Topography and Natural Resources; Industries and General Development. By C. Reginald Enock, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Martin Hume, a Map, and 64 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Turkey in Revolution. By Charles Roden Buxton. With a Map and 32 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast. By W. A. Dutt. With about 40 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 6s. Vol. I. of the County Coast Series.

Through Uganda to Mount Elgon. With Glimpses by the Way. By the Rev. J. B. Purvis. Illustrated with Photographs, 6s.

The Panama Canal and its Makers. By Vaughan Cornish, D.Sc., F.R.G.S. With a Map and 63 Illustrations. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

POLITICS AND SOCIOLOGY

Modern Constitutions. A Collection of the Fundamental Laws of Seventy-Two of the most Important Countries of the World. With Historical Introductions, Notes, and Bibliographies. By Walter Fairleigh Dodd, Ph.D. 21s. 6d. net.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. By V. R. Aronson. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

The Industrial and Commercial Influence of the English Patent System. By A. F. Ravenshear. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Towards Social Reform. By Canon and Mrs. Barnett. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

Invasion and Conscension. By J. A. Farrer. Paper Boards, 1s. net. Vol. I. of Unwin's Sociology Series.

Papers for Thinking Welshmen. By A. W. Wade-Evans. Paper Boards, 1s. net. Unwin's Sociology Series.

Write for a copy of Mr. Fisher
Unwin's Spring Announcement
List. Sent post free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN
1 ADELPHI TERRACE,
LONDON, W.C.

MISCELLANEOUS

Town Planning in Practice. An Introduction to the Art of Designing Cities and Suburbs. By Raymond Unwin. With many Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Cr. 4to, 21s. net.

The Place of Animals in Human Thought. By Countess Martingo-Cesaresco. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

Chats on English Earthenware. By Arthur Hayden. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 80 Full-page Plates. La. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Papacy: The Idea and its Exponents. By Gustav Kruger. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Faith of a Modern Protestant. By Professor W. Bousset. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

No Refuge but in Truth. By Goldwin Smith. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The Complete Plays of Robert Greene. Edited with Introduction and Notes by Thomas H. Dickinson. Thin Paper Edition, Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Leather, 3s. 6d. net. A new volume in the Mermaid Series.

Professions for Girls. By T. W. Berry. With a Preface by Lady Grove. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

How to Get Married. By the Author of "How to be Happy Though Married." Paper Covers, 1s.

NEW 6s. NOVELS

Henry in Search of a Wife. By Alphonse Courlander.

Transplanted Daughters. By Mrs. Burton Harrison.

The Canon's Dilemma. By Victor L. Whitechurch.

The Key of Life. By Alice A. Methley.

High Life in the Far East. By James Dalziel.

The Capture of Paul Beck. By M. McDonnell Bodkin.

Olive in Italy. (A new volume in the "First Novel" Library.)

John Broome's Wife. By E. B. Moffat.

The Ways of Men. By Herbert Flowerdew.

The Greater Love. By Anna McClure Sholl.

The Slave Girl of Agra. By Romesh Dutt, C.I.E.

THE ADELPHI LIBRARY OF STANDARD FICTION

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUMES.

Sister Teresa. (Revised Edition.) By George Moore.

Willowdens Will. By Halliwell Sutcliffe.

Tales of Unrest. By Joseph Conrad.

THE ACADEMY.
March 20, 1909

THE ACADEMY AND THE DAILY NEWS

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1924

MARCH 20, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

(Incorporated A.D. 1720.)

Governor—SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

FIRE, LIFE, SEA, ACCIDENTS,
BURGLARY, EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS
—WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED—

The Corporation will act as Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

Prospectus on application to the Secretary,

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C. West End Branch: 44 PALL MALL, S.W.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE CARLYLES

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH

EDITED BY ALEXANDER CARLYLE, NEPHEW OF THOMAS CARLYLE, EDITOR OF NEW LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE.

Mr. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing a volume that should settle, finally and for all time, the ever-present CONTROVERSY respecting the INNER THOUGHTS OF THE CARLYLES ABOUT EACH OTHER. The book contains the 175 LETTERS which passed between them from their first meeting until the time of their marriage. They represent in a fashion fascinatingly complete A PHILOSOPHER IN LOVE.

These letters detail the lives of the writers during five and a half years, and should CONVINCE the most SCEPTICAL that their mutual love was as fresh and fragrant as that of any boy and girl.

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH

EDITED BY ALEXANDER CARLYLE, NEPHEW OF THOMAS CARLYLE.

With 2 Portraits in Colour and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 25s. net.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, W.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS' NEWEST PUBLICATIONS

CALENDARUM LONDINENSE, or the London ALMANACK FOR THE YEAR 1909. Fine etched plate, "The Tower of London," by WILLIAM MONK, R.E. 188x114. 1s. 6d. net.

LONDON VISIONS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Collected and Augmented. Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"To turn over Mr. Binyon's book is to wonder that the volume of poetry about London should be no greater than it is. . . . Mr. Binyon is wise in cultivating his sense of her poetry and in collecting into one volume the many poems to which she has inspired him—a volume which on this account alone, we imagine, will have to be accorded a place in the history of English poetry. He is alive to all her charming or repellent characteristics. He sees her sometimes with the eyes of Dickens, sometimes with those of Claude Monet, and sometimes with those of Jeremiaah; he knows all her beauty and all her ugliness; her ghastly impassivity and her passionate life; her splendour and her meanness; her immemorial story and her brief passage through Time. . . . Mr. Binyon's verse shows his clear artistic intention and careful accomplishment."—The Times.
"Mr. Laurence Binyon's work needs no bush."—Evening Standard.

A SELECTION FROM THE POETRY OF LIONEL JOHNSON. With Biographical Note by C. K. SHORTER. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"It was the fashion at one time to say that Lionel Johnson's poems were academic exercises. The publication of this volume may help to reverse that verdict. Though there is little call to weed out his poems, it must be admitted that the editor has chosen those which show him as, first and foremost, a poet of a pure and high passion, devoted in the main to lost causes, remote and often discredited ideals; and a poet who, in spite of certain wilful pieces of crabbedness and tightness, had the large and simple utterance of great poetry."—The Times.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition now ready.]
"The greatest poetry is always impersonal. . . . But there is another kind of poetry, which, though it must take rank below the greatest, cannot fail to call forth affection and delight. It is the kind whose merit depends less on pure artistic achievement than on the power of personal revelation—the capacity of bringing the reader into near relationship with a charming or distinguished mind. . . . Her poetry is original in its truest sense. Perhaps its most striking quality is the extreme simplicity of its outward form. Her verse, always distinguished and never strained, has all the charm of a refined and intimate conversation."—Spectator.

"THE REAL OMAR." First Thousand Copies sold out in a fortnight. Second thousand (Revised and Corrected) Now Ready. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

QUATRAINS OF OMAR KHAYYAM, from a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into Verse by ARTHUR B. TALBOT.
"Mr. Talbot has produced a translation, not only remarkable for fidelity, but of genuine poetical value. One has only to turn a page or two to acknowledge one merit with gratitude, for it is in one which few of the quatrain-epigrammers share—he is wholly bent on rendering Omar for Omar's sake, and never makes him a vehicle for his own moods and conceits. . . . Mr. Talbot has, in fact, achieved a version of an undoubted value to those who wish to know more of the real Omar and cannot read him in his own tongue."—The Times.
"All good Omarians should add this book to their collection."—Globe.

SONGS OF GOOD FIGHTING. By EUGENE R. WHITE. With Prefatory Memoir by H. P. TASSER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A book of stirring verse. . . . The most remarkable piece in the volume is the 'Festin d'Adieu,' a short story which is surely one of the half-dozen finest stories ever written."—The Bibliophile.
"Had Browning written pirate instead of cavalier lyrics, he might have given us songs like these. . . . They go with a dash and vigour, a mastery of rhythm and rhyme that are very exhilarating. The 'Festin d'Adieu,' which closes the volume, is a practically flawless specimen of the short story."—Glasgow Herald.
"This slim volume contains some fine lyrical ballads of battles and the sea. Their versatile author died young, and had only practised poetry as a hobby. We could wish for more of his work, for it embodies a healthy spirit in effective metre."—Oxford Magazine.

CHRISTMAS SONGS AND CAROLS. By AGNES BEGBIE. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A charming little volume with very appropriate and clever drawings."—Publishers' Circular.

A CHRISTMAS MORALITY PLAY FOR CHILDREN. By EDITH LYTTELTON. Royal 16mo, 1s. net.
"A little play of a poor cottage—father, mother, and child, to whom a saving joy comes with Michael the Archangel on Christmas morn; with many stage directions.
"It is a simple theme, treated with simplicity and fitting dignity, a beautiful little work, far more suitable for a gift-book than many more ornate booklets designed as gifts and distinguished by 'th' adulteries of art' that take the eye and not the heart. Mrs. Lyttelton has put her impressively simple dialogue in prose, but the impression left on the mind after reading her work is that of poetry."—Daily Telegraph.

IN A STREET—IN A LANE. By N. W. BYNG. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"Charming verses. . . . they have the true poetic fancy, the light and shade, the pathos, humour, and tragedy of life, and the little book is worth buying."—Daily Express.

POEMS. By MARY ELIZABETH COLERIDGE ("Anodos"). Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net. [Fourth Edition.]
"These are all of her best work. . . . Every year of a period of twenty-five years contributed something to the book, yet there are scarcely half-a-dozen flaws. For she was a scrupulous writer; she wrote little, and all that she wrote was clearly related to her own spiritual life. . . . No poems, even in this age, have been fuller of personal revelation than these. Altogether they make a portrait, complex, shadowy, baffling, intimate."—Saturday Review.

POWDER AND PATCHES. By VERA CANUTE. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

"Shows quite unusual accomplishment."—Scotsman.
"The fresh vigour and daintiness of these songs, together with a quite unusual knack of drawing out the included beauty of words, have compelled us to read the book through with delight. . . . Her muse comes all dewy and flowery from walking in the Arcady of Herrick. It is much that Miss Canute can take us back again into those delicious meadows. The influence of Herrick is never absent. A poet could not out of all literature choose a better master; but it is rarely that such a pupillage results in work as good as 'Powder and Patches.'"—Liverpool Courier.

THE TRAGEDY OF SAINT ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY. By ARTHUR DUTTON. Royal 16mo, 4s. 6d. net.
"His 'Elizabeth' . . . takes something of a Shakespearean quality of infinite pitifulness with its short ineffective protests."—Manchester Guardian.

PAN-WORSHIP, and other Poems. By ELEANOR FARJEON. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

LOVE AS PEDLAR, and other Verses. By LADY ALICE EYRE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.

VERSES TO A CHILD. By MABEL TRUSTRAM. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
"There is in these verses, so naively illustrated, just that simplicity and directness which has its unflinching appeal to the childish mind. The child revels in facts rather than in fancies. . . . here the very springs of childish romance are set free."—Daily Graphic.

MY GARDEN. By J. T. PRIOR. With 12 full-page Collotypes. Fcap. 4to, 1s. net.
"The work shows accomplishment."—The Times.
"Bespeaks not only knowledge and love of the subject but an uncommon literary culture."—Scotsman.

THE SHADOW OF THE RAGGED-STONE (a Romance of the Malvergne Range, twelfth century). By C. F. GARDNER. With Cover-design by AUSTIN O. SPARR. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.
"As good a specimen of the historical romance as one need wish to meet with."—Glasgow Herald.
"Throughout the Author shows his clear insight into the conditions of the far off century he portrays, and his method is vivid and realistic, though softened by mystical touches that come and go like clouds in a summer sky."—Outlook.
"An unusual story, almost old-fashioned in its seriousness and sense of doom."—Bookman.
"A story of absorbing interest."—Scotsman.

EARLY VICTORIAN AND OTHER PAPERS. By E. S. P. HARVEY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"These are the excursions and diversions of a lively and critical mind which is not professionally devoted to the service of literature, and has therefore a freshness of independence and irresponsibility (except to truth) not superabundant in the writers of the day. They are kept thoroughly alive by a forcible plain style and a sleepless sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"Pleasant humour combined with sound literary instinct."—Literary Guide.
"A paradoxical person this essayist, with a very pretty touch in writing, and an abundantly saving grace of humour."—Evening Standard.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC. Letters to a Fair Unknown. By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
"These are essays that must delight the ordinary reader almost as much as they will people to whom music is the chief thing in life, for they show not only great penetration but humour of the freshest and most refined sort, combined with a knowledge of music, men, and countries obtained by wide travel and acute observation."—Musical.

MAN AND MAID. By ARTHUR GRAY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"An imaginative essay, from the ideal point of view, on the Relations between Man and Woman."

THE CHILD MIND: a Study in Elementary Ethnology. By HENRIETTA HOME. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; wrapper, 1s. net.
"A little book all parents should possess. The writer is so obviously a lover of youth, and suggests the child's heart as well as the child's mind with such understanding that the limited spaces of the book are large with wisdom."—Liverpool Courier.

NEW VOLUMES IN THE "VIGO CABINET" SERIES.
Royal 16mo, 1s. net.

FRIENDSHIP. By LILIAN STREET.
"We can all comprehend the quiet friendship of which Miss Street writes. She has thoroughly possessed herself with her subject, and treats it with subtlety and insight."—Liverpool Courier.

WHISPER! By FRANCES WYNNE. With Memoir by KATHARINE TYNAN.
"The sweetness, freshness, and lyrical swing should win them universal appreciation."—Catholic Times.

CAEDMON'S ANGEL. By K. A. MURDOCH.

THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR. By A. MADDOCK.

DAY DREAMS OF GREECE. By C. W. STORK.

VOX OTIOSI. By DAVID PLINLIMMON.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

CONTENTS

	Page.		Page.
Life and Letters . . .	891	"Natural Monopoly" . .	898
The Goldfinch . . .	893	A "Destructive Critic" .	899
THE ACADEMY and The		Scientific Theology . .	900
Daily News . . .	894	Shorter Reviews . . .	901
Mr. Archer's Two		Meetings of Societies .	902
Guineas	894	Correspondence . . .	903
Superstition	896	Books Received . . .	907
The Spanish Capital. .	897

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Headmaster of Eton, in his final reply to the Humanitarian League, appears to us to have made a most unfortunate mistake. The case which he is upholding of the usefulness and perfect justifiability of the Eton beagles is not one which requires to be supported by reckless abuse of other field sports. Canon Lyttelton, by descending to the methods of claptrap involved in wild denunciation of the "wholesale slaughter of tame pheasants," is merely putting himself on a level with the cranks of the Humanitarian League. It is true that Canon Lyttelton is primarily a schoolmaster, but we would have supposed that his family traditions would enable him to have a juster appreciation of sport from the country gentleman's point of view than that which he has displayed. We should like to ask him what precisely he understands by "tame pheasants." Strictly speaking, of course, all the pheasants in these islands are tame pheasants. The pheasant is not indigenous to this country, and is not, therefore, to be considered as a wild bird; but Canon Lyttelton evidently draws distinctions between wild and tame pheasants, and by "wild pheasants" we suppose him to mean birds hatched and bred in the coverts, without any assistance from the keeper. Does Canon Lyttelton seriously suppose that such birds differ in any way from what he would call "tame pheasants." If so, we can only assure him that he is ludicrously in error. The artificial rearing of pheasants has merely the effect of increasing their number. The strength of flight of a pheasant and the height at which he comes over the guns is precisely the same in the case of the "wild" and the "tame" bird. If the coverts from which the birds are driven are composed of small trees, and if the configuration of the ground does not compel them to rise in their flight, they will fly low and afford easy and not very sporting shots. If, on the other hand, the trees are high and the ground admits of the guns standing considerably below the coverts, the shots will be high and sporting and correspondingly difficult. In neither case, provided, of course, that the guns are equal to the exigencies, is there any cruelty involved or anything which calls for the intervention either of Humanitarian Leagues or of solemn schoolmasters. A man has precisely the same right, legally and morally, to rear pheasants in his coverts as another man has to rear poultry in a poultry yard. Every single pheasant that is ever shot is used for purposes of food, just as surely as every chicken which has its throat cut is used for the same purpose. Pheasants form a very valuable and relatively cheap supply of food for the market. At certain seasons of the year they can be bought for three shillings a brace in Leadenhall Market. It is instructive to contrast this state of affairs with that which obtains in countries where, owing to the absence of game rights of landed proprietors, game has almost entirely disappeared. In the South of France a pheasant nowadays is looked upon by the average inhabitant as a fantastically unpurchasable luxury. From twelve to twenty francs is the sort of price paid for a single pheasant in such districts.

A further indication of the lamentable pass to which this country has been brought under the auspices of the present Government was afforded by the debate on the Navy Estimates which took place in the House of Commons this week. Not only have the Government failed to maintain the two-power standard, which by common consent is necessary to our safety as a nation, but, according to Mr. Asquith's own showing, in a very few years we shall only just retain the one-power standard. In fact, to put the matter quite plainly, we stand in actual and immediate danger of annihilation at the hands of Germany. While our Lloyd Georges and our Churchills have been looking after their own private affairs, and while the Prime Minister and Messrs. Birrell, Runciman and McKenna have been wasting public time and public money in the attempt to thrust upon the community at large preposterous and fantastic measures of "temperance" and "educational" reform, the armed force, on which we depend for our existence, has been steadily and persistently undermined. The presence at the head of the Admiralty Board of the egregious Mr. McKenna, whose only claim to such a position would appear to be that he once rowed bow in the Cambridge eight, is not calculated to reassure the patriotic citizen. If we are to sleep soundly in our beds it is abundantly clear that our only hope is in a speedy change of Government. We have reason to believe that this highly desirable consummation is a great deal nearer than is commonly supposed. The feeling in the country against the Government, although it may fail to find adequate expression in the House of Commons, is growing in such an ever-increasing manner that a dissolution cannot now long be delayed.

The Englishwoman continues its gallant and successful efforts to give away its own case. From the current number we take, at haphazard, the following paragraph, which appears under the head of "Echoes":

Apropos of the question of Women's Suffrage, so many of you ask, "What good would follow this if this were done? What harm undone?" or words to that effect, that I am asked to tell the following true story to show that the vote does carry power, and that without power, "influence" is not as strong a lever as we need. It was recently decided to build some new public baths in a certain district of London, and some of the women living there obtained the promise from the local Council that one of them should be for the use of women. Some months afterwards a friend of mine called at the works to see how the buildings were getting on, and asked the foreman to show her the women's bath. "There is no women's bath, Madam." "Oh! how is that?" "The Council consider that a second-class men's bath was more required than a bath for women." My friend, accompanied by some other of the ladies, called on the Chairman of the Council. "Is this true that we hear that there is to be no bath for women after all?" "Quite true, ladies; you see it was decided that a second-class men's bath was more wanted than one for women." "Oh, very well, just as you like; but we promise you that, as far as we can accomplish it, if we do not get our bath you will all be turned out at the next election."—They got their bath.

So that here we have a case in which the Council, after mature deliberation, had come to the conclusion that a second-class men's bath was more urgently needed for the general good of the community than a woman's bath. Certain women, however, chose to think otherwise, and subordinating the interests of the community to their own private fancies they proceeded to bring to bear upon the Council the power which lay with them, owing to their possession of votes. The councillors, being apparently men who had more respect for their position than for their principles, allowed themselves to be coerced through a cowardly fear of losing their seats at the next election. Could anything be more immoral and more against the public interest? In the same number Mr. Shaw unbosoms himself on what he is pleased to call "The Unmentionable Case for Women's Suffrage." He explains at the beginning of his article that he has already "made an effort to save the situation" by writing a letter to The Times. "But," says he, "The Times blushed and threw my letter into the waste-paper basket." On the whole, we are not surprised. The Englishwoman, of course, being armoured in a perpetual blush (vide the cover) was less squeamish. Consequently, the listening earth will be able to arrive at the startling conclusion that in the delicate mind of Mr. Shaw the question of votes for women is intimately bound up with the question of latrines for ladies. For our part, we shall decline to believe that violent revolution is necessary to remedy the trifling grievance to which Mr. Shaw refers. The usual minor poet, in the person of Mr. Laurence Housman, limps alongside the Englishwoman's intellectual procession with a doggerel poem entitled "The Sand-castle," in which he describes two children, a boy and a girl, at play on the sands. The boy builds a sand-castle:

. . . So without stir,
Conscious that all this work was done for her,
The girl sat safe-immured; and for employ,
To keep her quiet, the calculating boy
Had brought her weeds and shells wherewith to dress
Her locks and make herself "a great princess Fit for a king." Tempted such rank to claim,
With folded feet, domestically tame,
Resigned she sat and played the sedentary game.

The boy, having installed his princess in, or, rather, on, the castle, sallies forth with the true spirit of knight-errantry and battles with imaginary monsters. All of which appears to us to be very right and proper. But Mr. Laurence Housman's little girl is evidently a budding suffragette of the most virulent description; for before long we are informed that:

. . . deliriously she squeals,
And pounding hard, on limbs a little numb
From too long sitting, and with feet a-drum,
"Champion!" she cries, "to share your fate I come!"

In passing, we note the delightful euphemism of "limbs" for what the little girl sits down on. However, that is neither here nor there. The point is that, on Mr. Housman's own showing, this resolution to throw up her part spoils the whole game from the point of view of both the little boy and the little girl. The little boy loses his illusions, and the little girl is brutally reminded that "a girl can't throw—not properly." All of which, on the whole, seems to us to be a fairly faithful allegory, the moral being that a little girl is more likely to shine in the rôle of a princess than in that of a thrower of stones. It is a pity that Mr. Housman does not apply the moral of his poem to himself and his "deliriously squealing" female friends.

We go to press too late to be able to comment on the details of the Bill introduced by Mr. Geoffrey Howard for the purpose of extending the franchise to the whole adult population, male and female. Of course, everyone knows that it has not the smallest chance of becoming law. It has already evoked shrieks of rage from Miss Pankhurst, representing the National Women's Social and Political Union, and it causes equal dismay to Lady Knightley, the president of the insignificant but mischievous Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association; while four ladies have demonstrated against the Bill by chaining themselves to the railings of the Houses of Parliament in Bridge Street. Mr. Howard is, nevertheless, believed to be a convinced supporter of the Women's Suffrage movement; so that his introduction of this Bill to the House of Commons can only be regarded as a mystery. In this week's Vanity Fair Mr. Harris boasts that he has done everything he can for the suffragists. Unfortunately for them, however, Mr. Harris's devotion to anarchists of all kinds renders his support of the Women's Suffrage movement a not altogether unmixed blessing for the upholders of the movement. On the whole, it would appear that the friends of the suffragists do them almost as much damage as their enemies. To those who bear in mind the historic result of the far-famed contest between the two Kilkeny cats, this reflection is fraught with hopefulness. Meanwhile, a petition against the Bill, signed by two hundred and fifty thousand women, has been prepared and will be presented to Parliament. This is the first instalment of the signatures collected by the Women's National Anti-Suffrage League. It represents only a little more than six months' work; and, so far, many districts in England have not been approached at all; while in Wales and in Ireland respectively there is only one branch of the League established. All the women who have signed this petition are out-and-out opposers of any form whatever of female suffrage. So that, taking everything into consideration, what with the women who are in favour of the suffrage and the women who are against it, Mr. Howard's Bill is in a somewhat uncomfortable position. Meanwhile, Lady Carlisle, Mr. Howard's mother, and, needless to say, an advanced suffragist, has been demonstrating her patriotism by addressing one or other of the innumerable Liberal Ladies' Leagues on the inspiring subject of the necessity of promptly reducing our armaments. Lady Carlisle can scarcely be considered fortunate in the moment she has chosen for making her demonstration; and perhaps if she had waited until after the debate on the Naval Estimates she might have come to the conclusion that it would be wiser to hold her peace, both in her own interests and in the interests of woman's suffrage.

The kind gentleman who has been at pains to make himself acquainted with the inside of the mind of the editor of the Saturday Review sends us a letter which he asks us to print on personal grounds and "without any further reference to the respective merits of the weekly reviews." Here you have an ingenious soul, anxious on the one hand to express himself, and equally anxious on the other to confuse and deface the issue. We must request our correspondent to say his personal say in what appears to be his own paper—namely the Saturday Review. And we must remind him that we have not yet made any "reference" at all to the respective merits of the weekly reviews. Our comments have been concerned with a variety of pieces of "poetry" which have lately appeared in the columns of our contemporaries, and which appeared to us to be faulty and unworthy pieces of poetry. We have not compared them, one with the other, and we have never said that the poetry in our own columns is beyond criticism. What we require from the friends of the imperfect poet—that is to say, if we are to be confuted—is a declaration that the verses about "he-goats sad" which appeared lately in the Saturday are the kind of verses which one has the right to expect from such an organ. It is obvious on the face of it that they were bad and illiterate verses, and in the literary sense discreditable to the Saturday Review. And it is obvious, too, that the editor who prints such verses is not to be congratulated on his gifts as a judge of poetry. With the necessary changes, the same remarks apply to the remaining "poems" and the remaining editors involved. There, so far as we are concerned, the matter must rest, and we shall not entertain further correspondence on the subject, unless, as we have said, some critic will assert over his name that the poems we have criticised are without spot and without blemish. "You're another" won't do.

Mr. Clement Shorter has not availed himself of our offer to provide space for a list of "mechanical" and inferior poems which, according to himself, occur in Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." We may conclude, therefore, that discretion is the better part of valour for Mr. Shorter, as for lesser men. He can no more "prick the bubble of Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury'" than he can prick the moon with the end of his fountain pen. The bubble to be pricked is the critic of poetry called Shorter. We will prick him next week with innumerable pricks.

The polite world will rejoice to hear that Mr. Horatio Bottomley is "unmuzzled" and that his "letter bag" is crammed with "thousands of kindly messages which have showered in upon me since the collapse of the Guildhall proceedings. . . . From every part of the country—and, indeed, from distant parts of the Empire; from people in every walk of life; from the Bench, the Bar, and the Press; in the House of Commons, from Cabinet Ministers to door-keepers, I have been overwhelmed with congratulations and expressions of kindly regard." We shall not doubt Mr. Bottomley's word. On the other hand, it will give us a great deal of joy and pleasure to know the names of one Judge and one Cabinet Minister who have overwhelmed our young friend with congratulations and expressions of kindly regard. According to Mr. Bottomley's own showing he is now unmuzzled, and, consequently, he has no further grounds for reticent discretion. Meanwhile, though Mr. Vivian's name and pseudonym have disappeared entirely from John Bull, Mr. Bottomley offers no apology for his colleague's recent brutal impertinences towards Field-Marshal Earl Roberts of Kandahar, K.G. Running as he is, loose and without his muzzle, and having now leisure to set his journalistic house in order, Mr. Bottomley may, we hope, be shortly expected to express in John Bull at least as great a respect for the courage and public spirit of Lord Roberts as he indulges for the "splendid courage of Sir James Ritchie, one of the senior Aldermen of the City of London." Mr. Bottomley is proposing to "unite his readers to form themselves into a great League of Common Sense," the motto of which league is to be "No humbug, no cant, no namby-pamby, grandmotherly interference with the liberties of grown-up men and women." It is a noble scheme, and as a preliminary exercise in commonsense and a sample of what he can do when he is put to it, Mr. Bottomley must apologise to Lord Roberts

THE GOLDFINCH

I WANDERED hearkening, in an April wood,
While all around me in harmonious flood
Rose the clear singing of the brotherhood
Of wing and feather.

Shyly the linnets hid and twittered there
Larks circled upward in the ambient air
Whitethroat and willow-wren and whistling stare
Singing together.

One beyond others in the joyful throng
Piped in the apple-trees the whole day long
Crystal in utterance a wind-swift song
Divinely fluted.

Lightly the goldfinch, e'er he lit to sing
Spread the pale yellow of his painted wing
He that bears record of his ministering
In hues transmuted.

His be the praise of the first Lententide!
Seeking the wooden cross where Jesus died
This bird the nail within the hand espied
And tried to ease it.

Lightly he fluttered on a tender wing
Held in a slender beak the cruel thing
Still with a gentle might endeavouring
But to release it.

Then as he strove spake One—a dying space—
"Bear for thy pity as a mark of grace
Semblance of this, My blood, upon thy face
A living glory.

So while the generations come and go
While the earth blossoms and the waters flow
Children may honour thee and mankind know
Thy loving story."

Lord! of dominion over man and beast
That out of nothing madest great and least Thine everlasting praise hath never ceased
From heavenly choir.

Hear even now in these awakening days
Rise from the meadowland and orchard ways
Anthem and madrigal and roundelays
That never tire.

Grant unto us of the untoward will Holden of utterance, in praise to still
Some of this jouissance our hearts to fill
And our mute voices.

So shalt thou gather in returning Springs
Some mortal knowledge of celestial things
So shall we praise thee in the mind that brings
Life that rejoices.

PAMELA TENNANT.

"THE ACADEMY" AND "THE DAILY NEWS"

In its issue of Tuesday last the Daily News published a letter from Dr. R. F. Horton, of Hampstead, under the heading of "Rome and the Press." In the course of this letter Dr. Horton committed himself to the following extraordinary statement:

Some well-known organs, e.g., the "Academy," have passed into Roman hands. That once famous literary paper now passes its verdict on our current literature with the bias of Rome. Good books are those which favour Rome. Books which criticise or oppose Rome are, ipso facto, bad.

We consider this passage to be entirely libellous, and, coming as it does from the pen of Dr. Horton, we believe it to be maliciously libellous. In any case, Dr. Horton's statements are absolutely false and without foundation, and his letter as a whole, though it pretends to deal with the Press at large, reflects only on THE ACADEMY, which is the only paper mentioned, with the exception of the admittedly Roman Catholic organs. To say, as Dr. Horton says, flatly, that from THE ACADEMY's point of view "good books are those which favour Rome," and "books which criticise or oppose Rome are, ipso facto, bad," is preposterous on the face of it; and to suggest, as Dr. Horton suggests, that THE ACADEMY is a veiled organ of the Roman Church and is really in Roman hands, and, consequently, that its owners and managers are in the pay of Rome, and are concerned to "suppress everything that tells against Rome and give undue prominence to everything that tells in her favour," is sheerly false. On Tuesday evening we saw the Daily News and pointed out that the whole of Dr. Horton's allegations were untrue and without foundation. We also pointed out that such statements were calculated seriously to injure the reputation of the paper and seriously to damage it in its business concerns, and we expected that the Daily News would take immediate steps to make some show of amends for what had occurred and would hasten to assure its readers that it had committed itself to what was untrue, and that it was sorry for what it had done.

On Wednesday morning, however, the Daily News printed in its leader columns a paragraph with the title:

"THE ACADEMY."

A REPLY TO DR. HORTON.

In this paragraph our contemporary simply reproduced the facts on which it should have based an apology, and wound up in the appended terms:

We have pleasure in publishing this disclaimer, and regret that we should inadvertently have been the medium of misrepresenting the conduct of our contemporary.

Now, the editor of the Daily News is not so unskilled in his profession as to be unaware of the very great difference between "A Reply to Dr. Horton" and "An Apology from the Daily News." Yet he tops up what he will, no doubt, call an apology with headlines which, so far from suggesting that the Daily News is apologising, suggests, and, indeed, says, that THE ACADEMY is replying to Dr. Horton. In point of fact, there is nothing in Dr. Horton's wanton and malicious attack on the bona fides of this paper to which we should deign to reply, and as to the Daily News' "inadvertence," there could have been no possible inadvertence, because it is the duty of a newspaper about to make foul charges against another newspaper, and charges which involve the honour of the editor of that newspaper, to verify its statements before proceeding to publish them. The editor of the Daily News can have made no sort of inquiry into the matter, and he published his libel on the sole word of Dr. Horton, who, we take it, is as fallible as the next man. As for Dr. Horton himself, he "apologises" in Thursday's issue of the Daily News, but under the misleading titles:

ROME AND THE PRESS.

DR. HORTON'S REPLY.

Not a word here as to THE ACADEMY or as to apologies—and he says:

Sir,—I deeply regret that I have been misinformed about the "Academy," and my error has involved you in the difficulty which you meet by your paragraph this morning. Permit me through your columns to offer a sincere apology to the editor and the directors of that journal. What misled me was that a copy was sent to me containing a review of a book of mine, entitled "My Belief." Or rather it was not a review, but a violent tirade against me from the Roman point of view.

I was surprised at this polemical bias in a literary journal, and on inquiry from a journalistic friend I was told that the "Academy" had passed into Roman Catholic hands. I did not resent it, nor was I astonished. I simply supposed it to be a fact. No one, I think, who read the article I referred to, entitled, I think, "The Logic of Dissent," could blame me for drawing the inference, or for believing the statement which seemed to explain it.

But in view of what you publish to-day, I beg to withdraw what I said, and to express my thankfulness that the journal as a whole is Protestant.

May I, however, point out how the episode illustrates my main contention? Even where the editor and managers of a paper are Protestant, the Roman influence finds a way to dictate the treatment of a book which advocates Protestant principles. Sorry as I am to have misrepresented the "Academy," I cannot alter my general view of Roman work in the Press.—Yours, etc.,

March 17th.

ROBERT F. HORTON.

We shall refrain from comment at the present juncture, but we shall give Dr. Horton and the Daily News an opportunity of going a little more thoroughly into the affairs of THE ACADEMY than they appear to have thought worth while before promulgating their libels.

MR. ARCHER'S TWO GUINEAS

WE called attention last week to an advertisement which is appearing in the Author, and we pointed out that, in our opinion, this advertisement, while perfectly legitimate in its way, might conceivably be misconstrued by inexperienced dramatic authors. The persons most nearly concerned in the affair are, of course, Mr. William Archer, whose name is flourished right through the announcement, and the editor of the Author. From the editor of the Author and from the Authors' Society we hear nothing, probably because they have absolutely nothing to say. Mr. Archer, however, being of a less reticent disposition, has sent us the following letter, which we print with a great deal of pleasure:

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

March 15th, 1909.

SIR,—While appreciating the concern of THE ACADEMY for my "good name" and "professional dignity," I must beg leave to doubt whether they are so gravely imperilled as your article of last Saturday suggests. Indeed, as you have thought it your duty to quote Messrs. Brown and Massie's announcement in full, I am quite willing to leave your readers to judge for themselves whether there are any good grounds for your solicitude. The only point on which I can imagine a difference of opinion among people whose opinion I value, is the question whether there is anything "infra dig" (to use your own expression) in the appearance of my name in such an advertisement. If on this point any good man censures me, I am sorry, yet not seriously disturbed. If I have a book to sell or a lecture to deliver, no code of etiquette forbids me to advertise the fact; and I fail to see any difference of principle between delivering a lecture in public, and delivering an opinion—which also, by the way, is apt to be a lecture—in private. If one has honest wares to sell, why should one not take any frank and legitimate means of bringing the fact to the knowledge of possible buyers? It is not frank advertisement that disgraces either a man or his calling: it is the underhand and disguised advertisement, the puff insidious and oblique. When I am found guilty of that, I shall bow to the reproof of anyone who has the dignity of his and my profession sincerely at heart.

For the rest, I do not see that there is a single word in Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's announcement that can convey the slightest false impression to any playwright or would-be playwright, however inexperienced. If one is to give an opinion on plays at all, it is absolutely inevitable that one should state whether, and on what conditions, that opinion may be shown to managers. To make such a statement is not to claim one jot or tittle of influence. My record, as you are good enough to point out, is a long one, and is perfectly open to inspection: the playwright must judge for himself, or must take independent advice, as to whether my opinion is likely to help or to hinder the chances of his play. As a matter of fact, there are some managers who would attach some weight to my praise, others with whom it would weigh less than nothing; and I should be perfectly willing to tell an author whether, in my judgment, he ought or ought not to show my report to this manager or that. But I welcome this opportunity of declaring explicitly—what I think is pretty clearly implied in Messrs. Brown and Massie's announcement—that it is not primarily in relation to managers that I hope and believe that I can be of service to playwrights. My particular function is not that of a manager's "taster," but rather that of a consulting physician. Sometimes I have to pronounce a play incurable, sometimes to suggest a course of treatment which may rescue the germs of vitality in a piece which shows talent but is anæmic or misshapen. Very rarely does a play come to me in such a form that I can encourage the author to take it, as it stands, to any manager whatsoever. I may, of course, prove to be an unskillful and unhelpful consultant. In that case—if my services are not worth the modest fee charged for them—my practice will doubtless be very small. But if I had received even that modest fee for each of the plays I have read gratuitously during the past twenty years, I should now be a considerably richer man than I am.—Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Mr. Archer is wrong in supposing that we are concerned in the least for his good name or his professional reputation. Indeed, we suggested that by lending himself to the purposes of Messrs. Brown and Massie's advertisement he injures both his good name and his reputation, and, what is more, he makes it quite evident that his respect for the profession of his adoption is not huge. In his reply, which does credit to his desire that he should not be misunderstood, Mr. Archer is careful to indicate that he does not value our opinion and that he considers us to be other than good and sincere men. It is human of him to take this view. On the other hand, we have no desire to secure his kind appreciation, neither do we require from him a certificate as to our good faith in dealing with a public matter. We have to repeat that Messrs. Brown and Massie's advertisement contains the following paragraph:

The fact that a play has been submitted to Mr. Archer will be treated by him and by us as confidential, or the author is at liberty to show Mr Archer's opinion to managers, actors, etc., if he so desires. It would manifestly be misleading, however, to quote detached phrases or make garbled extracts from a detailed criticism. Mr. Archer, therefore, leaves it to the author's sense of fairness to show to managers, etc., the whole opinion if he shows any part of it.

We shall take leave to inquire of Mr. Archer upon what grounds it is that he permits the passage we have quoted to appear in Messrs. Brown and Massie's invitation to pay him fees? He may answer that he is most anxious to safeguard the honour of ambitious authors, and that he is most anxious that "managers, etc.," should not be misled by ambitious authors who happen also to be unscrupulous authors. Nobody will deny that such anxieties are praiseworthy in Mr. Archer, and that he has a right to indulge them if it so pleases them. At the same time, the obvious and unmistakable innuendo which is likely to be conveyed, either with or without Mr. Archer's conscious desire, by the words we have quoted, is that Mr. Archer's favourable word is a most useful and valuable asset to a dramatic author seeking acceptance; and that it is so useful and valuable, indeed, that Mr. Archer finds it necessary to give warning that authors should not use it in a disingenuous or unfair manner. Now we say that to a dramatic author of any experience the whole suggestion is so much balderdash. Every author who has been through the mill knows perfectly well that Mr. Archer's unqualified approval will be of no more use to him than a headache, at any rate in the marketing of his dramatic produce; and if after giving such an author his approval Mr. Archer were to implore him not to put it to unfair purposes, the author would smile discreetly in his sleeve and wonder what was happening to Mr. Archer's wits. We hold that the paragraph as a whole is either absolutely superfluous or that it is intended to produce a certain effect in the minds of the inexperienced, and that in any case it will create an undesirable impression, not to say wild anticipation, among the fee-paying aspirants for dramatic glory.

It will be noticed that Mr. Archer leaves this particular issue outside his reply. It is not a new issue, being, in fact, the principal issue raised by us last week. We are glad to observe that our advertising friend desires to be very explicit in the columns of THE ACADEMY. We think, however, and we said as much in our previous article, that the place in which he should take care to be explicit is his own advertisement. With a view to being explicit in THE ACADEMY he would fain figure as a sort of "consulting physician" to the drama. His business, he says, does not lie "primarily in relation to managers," and he says, further, "very rarely does a play come to me in such a form that I encourage the author to take it as it stands to any manager whatever." We are to assume, therefore, that managers really do not concern Mr. Archer, and that he receives fees for suggesting improvements or alterations in hopeless dramatic work, which improvements and alterations will render the work worth submitting to managers who are likely to do business. We can conceive the possibility of this being so, but we do not consider it at all probable. If it be so we can only congratulate the incompetent upon the ease and economy with which it is possible for them to convert their banal and meretricious works into promising plays by reference to Mr. Archer. We shall not say that Mr. Archer is a bad physician, but he is a physician who, according to his own showing, considers it "proper to advertise." We are all aware that physicians in other lines of therapeutics who advertise are never above announcing to the public the plain facts as to the cures they bring about. Will Mr. Archer oblige us with a few instances? Is there a single play now being performed in a London or provincial theatre, or, for that matter, in an American theatre, or a Continental theatre, which, prior to its acceptance, was submitted to Mr. Archer and criticised by him for a fee, and through the agency of Messrs. Brown and Massie? We do not know that there is no such play. For anything we are in a position to assert to the contrary, every play at present before the public in London may have been doctored for a fee by Mr. Archer, and we trust Mr. Archer will not imagine we are too hard on him when we remark that some of them appear to have been doctored by very bad hands indeed. But we should like a specific instance, and we think that such an instance would be valuable not only in clearing up Mr. Archer's position, but also in emphasising and rendering still more attractive Messrs. Brown and Massie's excellent advertisement. It is all very well for Mr. Archer to mention that he has given many people advice for nothing. Most of us give advice for nothing because, as a general rule, advice about the arts is without money and without price, and only the immature wish to buy it.

With the struggling person in any art one cannot deal too tenderly; nothing is sadder or more pitiable than the situation of that large body of persons whose ambitions are out of all proportion to their talents. We can remember the time when pretty well every young person who could trail a pen imagined that he or she was a heaven-sent poet. It is the fashion now to tell all such persons that the ability to write a considerable poem is very rare, and that a novel or a play is the thing to attempt. In point of fact, it is more difficult to obtain recognition and success as a playwright than it is to obtain recognition and a modest share of success as a poet; for obviously there are fifty times as many editors as there are theatrical managers, and printing a poem is a trifling matter as compared with the staging and production of a play. Mr. Archer is just as well acquainted with these facts as we are. If he wishes to be explicit and frank with the youths and maidens who are painfully saving up thirty shillings or two guineas for his opinion of their dramatic efforts, his advertisements should make it abundantly clear that Mr. Archer's opinion can be only of the slightest weight when the hard business of acceptance and production is toward. He is quite within his rights when he asserts that he can give advice and assistance to dramatic authors in the literary sense, but he has no right to hint that his word is so powerful among managers, etc., that he finds it necessary to stipulate that it should not be garbled or denuded of its reservations or qualifications. And if his friends imagine (as he would lead us to believe) that he is justified in accepting fees from authors who in their turn imagine that with his favourably-written opinion in their pockets they are on the high road to dramatic success we shall content ourselves by saying only that his friends are woefully wrong. The best of doctors can do nothing with the stillborn, and ninety-nine plays out of a hundred written by persons who happen to be so infantile in the literary sense that they will part with a fee for anybody's opinion are stillborn.

REVIEWS

SUPERSTITION

Psyche's Task. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. (Macmillan and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

"PSYCHE'S TASK" is one of those ornamental titles to learned and subtle treatises which Dr. Frazer, of the Golden Bough, has learnt from Ruskin to invent so cleverly. Its significance is pointed by a sentence from Milton's "Areopagitica": "Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds, which were imposed on Psyche as an incessant labour to cull and sort asunder, were not more intermixt." No one knows better than

Dr. Frazer that the bush is a continually appropriate sign of good vintage, as it is but a temporary covert for bad, and no living English writer has a better right to hoist the sign, for he has to offer not only sound and wholesome drink, but that of the finest quality, of variously reminiscent bouquet, limpid as water, and of those alluring colours which give more than half its satisfaction to the palate. In the present volume Dr. Frazer is almost too wholesomely precise, for he tells us its object more than twice with unvarying distinctness. He is quite right; the age is so enlightened that he will be misunderstood if possible. His object is fourfold, and he presents it to us in four chapters, from the second to the fifth, adding a Preface which calls to mind that he is printing the substance of a lecture at the Royal Institute; an Introduction; and a Conclusion.

He starts with the axiom that superstition is an evil "false in itself." He continues: "That it has done much harm in the world cannot be denied. It has sacrificed countless lives, wasted untold treasures, embroiled nations, severed friends, parted husbands and wives, parents and children, putting swords, and worse than swords, between them; it has filled gaols and madhouses with its innocent or deluded victims; it has broken many hearts, embittered the whole of many a life, and not content with persecuting the living, it has pursued the dead into the grave and beyond it, gloating over the horrors which its foul imagination has conjured up to appal and torture the survivors." And he professes to make "a plausible plea for a very dubious client." He makes it probable, he might safely assert that he proves, by examples "that among certain races and at certain stages of evolution some social institutions which we all, or most of us, believe to be beneficial have partially rested on a basis of Superstition." The words italicised here are of the essence of Dr. Frazer's argument, and he must be taken as strictly confining himself within the bounds which they define.

Dr. Frazer's second remark is: "No institution founded wholly on falsehood can be permanent. If it does not answer to some real human need, if its foundations are not laid broad and deep in the nature of things, it must perish, and the sooner the better." The four social institutions which Dr. Frazer contends have rested somewhat, somewhere, and under some conditions on Superstition are Government, Private Property, Marriage, and Respect for Human Life. Except in the pleasure of reading Dr. Frazer's treatise in its entirety, it is unnecessary to follow him through the innumerable particular instances of superstitious practice which he cites. Whatever forms Superstition as here treated of takes, they are of the nature of Taboo, regarded not as the system which the word also signifies, but as the energy proceeding from a certain quality. Taboo is especially prominent in relation to Property. The quality of which Taboo is the energy, whether it be called Mana, or nicknamed angustitas, or described as a sort of official persona or hypostasis, is most evident in Government. The superstitions which underlie Marriage and Respect for Human Life are founded on analogous but slightly different feelings; those concerning marriage on an idea of pollution, a material infection of sin; those concerning respect for human life more purely on fear, particularly on fear of which the ultimate cause is the most material of all causes of fear, the idea of something which cannot be tested by the tried exercise of the senses. It may be taken as granted that Dr. Frazer does prove that these four institutions do rest partially on Superstition, under the conditions which he enumerates. Since it was his object to establish the thesis that benefits may follow Superstition, not to say that it may be their contributory cause, it was the more necessary for him, in order to make his position clear, to insist at the outset on the axiom that Superstition is an evil "unmitigated," not only "false in itself," but also "pernicious in its consequences." The fact that ultimate good comes out of it is no evidence that it is other than evil. The issue of good from evil, the forging of evil desires into virtues, is one of the ideas suggested by the precept, "Overcome evil with good." Evil is the rock in which the human will quarries jewels, the dry bough from which it carves golden fruit. Nor can Dr. Frazer be supposed to regard Superstition, though "an unmitigated evil" and "false in itself," as absolute evil, for if it were it would be a second principle equipotent with the Absolute Good. Since the nature of all things except God is conditional, Dr. Frazer must be understood to be using conditional phraseology. In that sense his treatise gives rise to the question: Is Superstition in itself evil at all?

In the first place, Superstition might be roughly described as "belief contrary to experience," in contradistinction to Faith—a subject which Dr. Frazer resolutely puts out of the question—for which the phrase "belief without experience" may serve. Excluding its effect from the question, which has been already done (since the effect of any motive measures its utility and not the quality of its nature, and Superstition, according to Dr. Frazer, would thus be partly good on account of its effects), Superstition is good or evil according to the object of its super-credence. Superstition which exaggerates the power of evil is evil; the belief that the souls of the departed are all wholly malicious is an evil superstition. Superstition which outruns experience in recognising the omnipotence of good cannot be evil. The man who trusts after seven infidelities believes contrary to experience; the man who trusts after seventy times seven is superstitious indeed. Similarly it may be an evil symptom, but is not so necessarily. It represents a tendency of the mind very often co-existing with brutality, and also, as Dr. Frazer points out, in the case of many primitive tribes, with great intelligence. It does not imply credulity; on the contrary, many conspicuously superstitious persons have been, and still are, highly sceptical as regards particular evidence, while many who regard Superstition with horror, are grossly credulous in material matters. In modern times many acute minds tend to Superstition because of the large demands made on their credulity by the constant blundering of conclusions founded solely on experience. Conversely, the opposite cast of minds hate it, because it admits a power beyond experience, and its existence raises the question whether the phenomena most subject to experience, material phenomena, constitute the only good.

Is not, indeed, Superstition also evil when it represents the dregs of false knowledge, and good if it be the forerunner of true, however far it may have out-distanced it? Who knows how often it is the forerunner? There are superstitions common to the whole human race. Who knows whether these, whether some even of those existing among the savage races described by Dr. Frazer, are not of the arcana of past or future wisdom, retrospective or prospective instincts? For have not superstitions before now been overtaken by experience? Has the progress of humanity never been kept back by the refusal to hold the mind suspended concerning the objects of Superstition, on the ground that such objects are non-existent? If Superstition is, strictly speaking, "an unmitigated evil, false in itself," it must be always evil, and everywhere. During the course of man's steady movement upwards, to which Dr. Frazer alludes, it appeared to advanced minds that the belief in eternal fire was grossly superstitious, on the grounds that heat without combustion was contrary to experience. We are here concerned with the grounds of objection, not with the belief in the connection in which it excited controversy. Many superstitious persons refused to reject the belief on those grounds. Is it now a superstition to believe that Nature may consume without combustion? At a sufficient distance of time from Minos to admit of progress, enlightened scholars laughed at the superstitions of ages so dark as to credit such stories as his very existence. It is not superstitious to believe in his existence now.

There is one other question already alluded to, suggested incidentally by Dr. Frazer's treatise, but not unconnected with Superstition: Does man move steadily upwards? Is the human race more excellent in kind than at a period of its evolution corresponding to the family of Adam? Regarding it on its material side only, it is a question too vast to be discussed here, but the continual upward movement cannot be accepted as an axiom, even if Dr. Frazer intends to allude to it as such, which must not be asserted. Does not Humanity rather flow and ebb, in its subdivisions of peoples that rise and fall, in the gleaming and fading of different faculties at different periods? But such spiritual questions as Dr. Frazer taboos wisely are too pervading to be utterly excluded. Whether the human race is collectively perfectible or no, no man doubts within his own consciousness that every man can move steadily upward if he will. "A man doth not yield even unto death utterly, save only by the weakness of his feeble will." Every man can perfect himself; what thought of the human race present or to come impels him to do it? Who, untouched in his personal affections, is less happy since the destruction of Messina; and what has the human race done to prevent such occurrences?

THE SPANISH CAPITAL

Madrid. By A. F. CALVERT. (John Lane, 3s. 6d.)

To the average Englishman with a healthy interest in foreign countries Spain is singularly untravelled ground. He will visit Switzerland or Tyrol or the famous corners of Italy year after year, but the idea of a sojourn in the sunny domains of King Alfonso never occurs to him, or, if it does, is set aside as out of the question. Yet, if he wishes to avoid the tedious journey across France, from the Thames the traveller can voyage very pleasantly to Bordeaux (as the author of this book might have mentioned), whence the railway is at his service, and the Spanish frontier comparatively near at hand, while other ports farther south offer alternative routes for those with more time at their disposal.

In this "Spanish Series" of illustrated monographs, Mr. Calvert is doing good work in familiarising English readers with the aspects of the most celebrated cities and districts, and the latest volume to appear is quite up to the standard we have been led to expect. The capital of Spain presents a curious blending of the modern and the old, the life of the Parisian and the customs of ancient days; it receives also, of course, a lustre of additional importance from its honourable position as the centre of Court affairs. The slum and the regions of squalor which form so lamentable a feature of our own chief city do not appear to flourish beneath these more brilliant skies. Why is it that London has attained so undesirable an eminence in this respect? Even the work-girls wear a rose and carry a fan when possible. Small wonder is it that the land has produced great poets and artists; we have in the book before us brief accounts of many men whose fame has extended far beyond the limits of their own language. In art, the supreme Velasquez, Berruguete, Goya; in literature, Quevedo, the immortal Cervantes.

Lope de Vega (who is said to have written plays to the astonishing number of eighteen hundred), and in our own times Galdós and Valdés; these and others have kept the roll of honour unbroken.

The chapter devoted to churches and public buildings has a lengthy and interesting description of the Escorial, from which we take a pertinent comment upon that inquisitive attribute of humanity which, unless sternly repressed, leads too often to the ruin of things that should be held as inviolable:

Twenty-six marble urns placed in niches round the chamber (of the Pantheon) contain all that was mortal of the monarchs of Spain and their consorts from Charles V. to Alfonso XII., Philip V. and Ferdinand VI. excepted. There are tombs, too, awaiting the living. . . . As one ascends to the living world from these awful chambers, the question suggests itself, what is the object of it all? The Pyramids of Nile ought to have convinced man once for all of the hopelessness of any effort to preserve his body unprofaned and solemnly housed through all the years. No matter how great the dynasty, how strong the tomb, the day must come when the jealously and reverently guarded ashes will form the prey of some ghoulish invader. With Rameses exposed to the gaze of wondering Cockneys, with Alexander's tomb an object of curiosity to tourists in the museum at Stamboul, with the tombs of the kings of Judah explored on all-fours by Cook's trippers, how can one hope for an eternal immunity from profanation for the Invalides, for Westminster, for the Escorial? Kings ought to have learnt the lesson that in the pages of history alone can they look for an earthly immortality.

These sentiments must be taken cum grano salis; Mr. Calvert does not consider what the world would have lost had there been no Pyramids, no Escorial, no Westminster.

Any work dealing with Madrid which allowed no space to the sport of bull-fighting would be open to a charge of serious disproportion. It forms a curious study in racial differences, the hold this spectacle has on the people of Spain, and the mixed feelings with which an Englishman views the corrida. "Whatever may have been the origin of these contests," says the author, "it is certain that since the days of the Moors the bull-fight has endured as the chief recreation of all classes of the population":

There is in no other country any sport that can be compared with it in importance and in the sway of its fascination upon the public. . . . The hold which this pastime has upon the Spanish imagination is so strong that it is a part of the national character, as deep-seated as the sentiments of piety and loyalty; and as powerful as the feeling of patriotism. King or peasant, man or woman, every native of Spain is a lover of the corrida; every child plays at bull-fighting as soon as he can walk; and every youth who would be thought manly and a true son of Spain, yearns to emulate the courage and the dexterity of the espada.

The sight of the Plaza de Toros on the day of a great corrida leaves an impression that will not quickly fade from the memory. In the palcos de sombra (seats in the shade) are the rank, beauty, and wealth of Madrid, while packed in the humbler seats is a vast mass of the people. The ladies wear mantillas, and carry fans, which flutter the whole time; and animation, devoid of any trace of rough behaviour, characterises the immense crowd. A tense hush falls on the throng when the first bull of the day bounds in from the dark toril, and confronts his gaily-attired persecutors in the big arena. During the fight the spectators grow excited almost to the verge of frenzy. There is a roar of voices, and the sound of canes struck upon the benches, an indescribable din, which reaches its height when a popular espada delivers a dexterous thrust of the blade into the neck of the baffled and infuriated toro. While the combat proceeds, there are alternating comments of "Bravo, toro," as the bull shows courage, and groans and hisses when the animal displays cowardice or apathy. Both the bull and the men must act their parts with zeal, energy, and bravery, or the crowd is disappointed, and wont to express disapprobation in an unqualified manner.

Codes of rules are drawn up and books are published about the "art" of the bull-fighter; but one writer sums up the matter thus:

Bull-fighting is very simple; you place yourself in front of the bull, the bull comes, and you move away; you do not move away, then the bull moves you away. And there you are.

A special word of praise is due to the fine series of plates, which numbers 453, and occupies more than half the volume. The photographic reproductions are in most cases excellent, though occasionally a crowded picture inevitably suffers from the contraction of detail. The churches and architectural splendours are fully represented, while the illustrations of old armour and the score or so of photographs depicting phases of the national sport are among the best. A short chapter on the life at the various cafés concludes a book for which the worst that can be said is that some of the plates might have been deleted (they sometimes repeat themselves too freely), and more pages of text added touching on the modern life of the city and its commercial bearings; but as Mr. Calvert has seen fit to give a capital résumé of the historical and political story of Madrid, we will not press the point, which, after all, is necessarily a matter for the reader's personal taste.

"NATURAL MONOPOLY"

Natural Monopolies, in Relation to Social Democracy.

By CHARLES DARWENT SMITH. (London: A. C. Fifield, 1909.)

THIS book is the acceptance of a challenge. He must be a bold man who enters the lists against Mr. W. H. Mallock's ability, whether original or directive. Certainly Mr. C. D. Smith is lacking neither in hardihood nor assurance. In the preface he tells us that his purpose in writing was two-fold:

First, by exposing the weakness of Mr. Mallock's theory of the relation between labour and ability, to upset his criticism of Socialism which is founded upon it; and, secondly, to establish an alternative theory.

Mr. Smith admits that Mr. W. H. Mallock is "unquestionably the ablest champion who has yet taken the field against Socialism." This admission must naturally produce a certain self-conscious superiority in having (as he considers) completely routed the champion. But a careful examination of Mr. Smith's work brings us to the judgment (if we may vary the metaphor) that his own case is not proven. In the first place, Mr. Smith often speaks of his opponent as "begging the question." To us he appears to do the same himself over and over again. For example:

The function of original ability is not to produce.

Neither circulating capital nor wage-capital are capital at all.

The goods in which a merchant deals are not capital, but wealth.

Ability of itself can produce nothing.

Ability is not the efficient cause of production at all.

The whole result of increased productivity having been absorbed between the inventor and the capitalist its value to the rest of the world is nothing at all.

The special rewards paid to the monopolist of special powers are not earned, since earnings, as I showed in chapter VI., depend upon the quantity, not the kind of labour.

Some knowledge of logic might have warned Mr. Smith of the danger of universal negations. Let us examine one of them, the last, and let us suppose that Mr. Smith reeled off this book in two months, a feat which we can well believe a writer of his "special powers" could easily have accomplished; and let us further suppose that his publishers paid this "monopolist" a "special reward" of £50, a sum larger than the wage of an agricultural labourer for a whole year's hard work, ploughing, ditching, sowing, reaping: will Mr. Smith seriously allege that he has not earned that fifty pounds? Mr. Smith contends that his book "will have been produced by the labour of an infinite number of people, living and dead, and the labour of each one of them will have been absolutely indispensable? True; but equally the labour of others reaching far back into the past was indispensable to the work of the agricultural labourer. But remembering that "ability of itself can produce nothing," we are naturally very interested to know by what mysterious force Mr. Smith produced the MS. of his book. And when his book was handed over to his army of "booksellers, printers, proof readers, bookbinders, compositors, etc., etc.," seeing that their ability of itself can produce nothing, what the digamma was the special power which produced it? And what is the efficient cause of production? To this problem we find no sufficient answer. It is a mystery too deep for Mr. Smith's ability or philosophy.

Of course, in a well-organised Socialistic State Mr. Smith would hand over his MS. to the State, who would give him two months' wages for the quantity of work produced. But that day is, fortunately for the progress of civilisation, far distant. Still it would be a cheerful and inspiring sight, as well as a glorious object-lesson in practical Socialism, to see Mr. C. D. Smith on, say, the 1st of April next with a wheel-barrow full of pennies, distributing the balance of £50, which he had not earned, to his army of booksellers, printers, etc., etc.

In considering Mr. W. H. Mallock's theory of "directive ability" Mr. Smith refers to the illustration of the shipyard, which, under an able manager, produced two ships in a year instead of one, and cites what Mr. Mallock called Mill's Great Blunder, that it is unmeaning to say of two conditions necessary for producing an effect that so much is produced by one and so much by the other. It is obvious that the effect is produced by the combination of the two effects in each case. But the varying result is produced by an added factor. Who adds that factor? Not the labourer, but the man of directive ability. Therefore he is entitled to "special reward."

If the labourers added the extra factor simply by working overtime they would be clearly entitled to the extra profit. Yet Mr. Smith is confident of Mr. Mallock's "great blunder" and his "palpable fallacies and confusions." Professor Stanley Jevons once observed that J. S. Mill had an essentially illogical mind.

Rent and interest, as one might expect, are the objects of Mr. Smith's special attack. It is instructive to notice that the real source of all Socialistic discontent can be traced to private ownership of land. Once admit this to be a valid wrong, then all private ownership follows by easy sequence, whether of a factory, a shop or a railway. So little knowledge has Mr. Smith of the growth of ownership of land that he observes it is unnecessary to speculate how ownership in land might originate. The development of primitive communities into the modern social state is for him a matter of no account. Hence his theory of rent is evolved out of his own inner consciousness, and bears but a remote relation to actual fact. Anyone who receives rent or interest of any kind is to him "a parasite whom the community is under no natural necessity of supporting." This sweeping statement would include a working man or skilled artisan, who by forty years' hard manual labour saved a thousand pounds, and invested it in a mine or a railway. But Mr. Smith's objection to interest is "that the recipient has not done any service to the community equivalent to the wealth he receives"—another of his universal negatives. As an example of his lucidity of definition we submit the following:

What are fifty thousand pounds? It is in itself neither capital nor anything else, but only a general recognition of the power of owning wealth to that value.

The possession of that sum constitutes a monopoly of power, and, therefore, the individual must be deprived of an asset which is dangerous to the State. That it may be usefully employed does not seem to enter into Mr. Smith's calculations. In fact, he objects to all natural monopolies of power, whether brains or original gifts or artistic skill, if they bring the monopolist any maximum special reward. The Socialistic State will encourage all such individualistic gifts and work by fixing a "minimum definite reward."

Throughout this book we observe a truly wonderful self-assurance.

"As I said, Mr. Mallock has failed to establish" . . .

"Mr. Mallock's hopeless perplexities" . . . "his wandering befogged to a conclusion amazingly preposterous."

"The nature of Mr. Mallock's fallacy is obvious enough."

"This rubbishy piece of twaddle."

"If Mr. Mallock means . . . he is still talking nonsense."

"I do not know that I need discuss Mr. Mallock's objection that" . . .

Having read most of Mr. Mallock's works, we consider that his reputation will survive the publication of this book. Whether the author's will or not is a matter on which we offer no opinion.

"A DESTRUCTIVE CRITIC"

Military Needs and Military Policy. By the RIGHT HON. H. O. ARNOLD FORSTER. (Smith, Elder and Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS book was published on the 11th instant. The distinguished author died on the 12th, and thus England is the poorer by the loss of a true patriot and an ardent Imperialist, and the House of Commons has lost one of its most skilled masters of controversy. Mr. Arnold Forster was a life-long student of history, in which he graduated in the First Class at Oxford. Above all, military history absorbed him, and he probed deep into the lore of the past for all that could be applied to the needs of the Empire which he loved. But he did not limit himself to the past. He kept close in touch with the military spirit of the day. There are few soldiers who have witnessed the manoeuvres of foreign armies so often as he had, few sailors who have visited so many foreign shipping yards. Of the many books which Mr. Arnold Forster wrote, none gave greater pleasure to sailors and soldiers than "In a Conning Tower," the description of a modern sea fight. It is a masterpiece of realistic imagination. Such was the man whose last work we pass under review.

He explains its purpose: "To hasten, if maybe, the awakening of the nation from the hypnotic trance in which it has sunk during the last few years," and it contains close-searching criticisms of each section of our Army and of the military policy of the country. Lord Roberts has written an introduction in which his well-known views are tersely expressed, and in which he associates himself with the object with which Mr. Arnold Forster declares he wrote, while holding aloof from controversial issues. Above all, the Field-Marshal supports the author in his first article of belief that the Regular Army should be "strong in numbers and efficient in training." He disagrees in his scepticism as to the possibility of invasion.

We are dealing with an attack all along the line of the military defences of the country which now exist. It is, too, an indictment which includes the War Minister, the Army Council and many of our Generals, and hard hitting is used. Mr. Arnold Forster, as the last Minister for War, was once responsible for a scheme of Army reform. It was to produce, in effect, two Regular Armies—(1) A foreign service Army of 104 battalions (to deal with Infantry alone), of nine years' Colour service, three in the Reserve. But twenty-six of these battalions only were to be in England. (2) A Home Army of 71 battalions; service, two years with the Colours, six in the Reserve. The Army Council refused to pass the scheme, and would have resigned if it had been insisted on—firstly, because they considered that recruiting would be impossible for an Army in which service would be almost entirely abroad; secondly, because the Reserve produced would have been wholly insufficient. The knowledge of this piece of administrative history is as necessary to a right understanding of the book under review as is the preface written by Mr. Arnold Forster. Now, the history of Mr. Haldane's administration, which we have here criticised, is briefly as follows:

(1) The Militia has been wiped out and a Special Reserve has been formed 15,000 less strong than the Militia.

(2) The Volunteers of all arms have been replaced by a Territorial Army 300,000 strong, a greater strength than that ever attained to by the Volunteers.

(3) The Regular Army has been organised into six Divisions ready for active service anywhere, but reduced nearly 19,000 men.

Let us begin with the Regular Army, which is, as the author considered, much the most important factor. The reduction is attacked. The Army was increased nearly 30,000 men in 1900 and the following years because it was found insufficient for the strain of war. But we must associate ourselves in deprecating the reductions before the Special Reserve and the Territorial Army were called into being.

The Special Reserve has been harshly dealt with. We are told that it was under strength (it is rapidly completing), that it is enlisted from men of lesser age and of inferior physique than the Militia, that it is not officered comparably as well as the old Constitutional Force, and that it cannot take the field under its own officers. But there is another side of the question. Militia regiments have, it is true, in most cases been found willing to go on active service. But what is required for units in the field is a supply of men to fill their ranks.

The Militia, represented in Parliament by the Duke of Bedford, claimed that they should go on service as battalions complete. A new battalion disorganises the Brigade to which it is sent. As the Militia refused to fill the gaps which occur in the Regular regiments, a force had to be created by which this can be done, and the Militia to a great extent has been merged in the Special Reserve. The author used all his powers of controversy, all his most destructive criticism, to underrate the value of this Reserve. We have full confidence that it will fulfil its functions in time of need. And the General who holds the greatest command in the Empire has expressed his delight at its creation.

It is difficult to understand Mr. Arnold Forster's hostility to the Territorial Army as a substitute for the Volunteers. We are told that it, too, was 100,000 under establishment (i.e., when the book was written). It is probably to-day only 50,000 short, and has increased so rapidly that the County Associations are rather checking recruiting than pressing it forward, so as to prevent the completion of service of too great numbers simultaneously. No credit is given to the fact that what was once a series of disconnected, unprovided, unequipped Volunteer regiments is now a force distributed territorially in proportion to population, which is organised in Brigades and Divisions, and which is fast being provided with all the subsidiary services to make each unit a complete weapon of war. But we entirely agree that the weakness of the Territorial Force consists in its serious training for war only beginning when war begins.

Mr. Arnold Forster was not a believer in the possibility of invasion, and he ably deals with the question of raids, exposing fully the naval and military arguments in that relation. But he attacks very justly the removal of the mine fields round our principal naval bases, which has been used as an excuse to reduce our most efficient and skilled Corps of Royal Engineers, in whose charge they were. He is unsparing of the policy (that of a Unionist Government in 1890) which dismantled the land defences of our naval bases, and which by this Government has been made the pretext for reducing the Garrison Artillery by over 5,000 men, a corps which will compare with any in the world for physique, intelligence and conduct. The means at our disposal for repelling raids, if made, are rather unfairly belittled, but the chapter devoted to the importance of putting into use the services of the population of our seaboard as Naval Volunteers cannot fail to appeal to any intelligent reader.

Mr. Haldane's habit of clear thinking aloud receives severe handling. The Minister for War thinks so clearly that the absolute reduction of our Regular Army by nearly 19,000 men (with a consequent reduction of Reserve) became at a political meeting at Guildford last November an increase of 90,000 men in the Expeditionary Force. Mr. Arnold Forster shows that of these 90,000, an increase of the Reserve, the result of Mr. Brodrick's three years' service enlistments, accounts for 40,000; another 30,000 are taken from the Special Reserve, and will not have been sufficiently trained to serve on equal terms with the Regular Army in separate units; and it is difficult to discover where the remaining 20,000 come from. Three other such instances of clear thinking are humorously and unsparingly laid bare.

Mr. Arnold Forster's last published word to us is that our real need (p. 156) is "an overwhelming Navy, an efficient system of maritime coast defence, and a Regular Army equal in quality to our best troops, such as the Royal Marines, the Guards, and the Royal Artillery—an Army capable of instant mobilisation, with a Reserve of 300,000 trained officers and men." We may not agree that "we can have these things at a cost exceedingly very slightly" our present War Budgets. We may not feel sure that there exists in the country a field of efficient voluntary recruiting to complete this need. But would that we could have them! We should feel very safe. Those who read this book will certainly be brought to think more closely of the military requirements of our country, and, whether they are convinced or not, will appreciate the skill with which the regretted author's convictions have been insisted on.

SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY

God With Us. By W. R. BOYCE GIBSON, M.A.
(A. and C. Black.)

THE problems of spiritual laws and of theological philosophy in their relation to the conduct of life have exercised some of the richest and most commanding intellects of our time, and will never cease to supply excellent material for controversy as long as man retains his faculties of ratiocination and his desire to view fresh expanses of ethical fields from some new peak of thought. So inextricably involved are they with subsidiary and equally debatable positions of psychology—sometimes interdependent, sometimes separable, but nearly always correlated—that while the task of unravelling one or two of these abstruse arguments or of setting forth some novel aspect of the various logical points concerned, must invariably present itself in fascinating guise to a certain type of mind, yet to follow intelligently the reasoning processes of a thesis or rehabilitation of a thesis must be the portion of a few, a very few, of the outsiders into whose hands the discourse may fall. Professor Gibson has taken up his pen to expound these matters—not for the first time; and although in the nature of things his latest treatise will be limited to the appreciation of those who have to some extent covered the same ground, scaled, if we may so express it, the lesser heights, yet it must be counted a work well done and worthy of the doing. It is a fine example of the art of close reasoning. The position assumed may be gathered from a paragraph which occurs towards the end of a most interesting chapter entitled "Universalism and the Problem of Evil":

Professor Knight cites the pertinent question, once put by a child of four years of age, "If God is everywhere, how can there be room for us?" The child could hardly suspect that, as Spirit, it might be God's presence that first brought with it that spiritual space which gives us our soul-room, the room to be ourselves, that we become our true selves only through the death into His life. And if it is as Love that God includes our being, then that which is most precious for us, our freedom and our selfhood, must be most inviolate in His regard. It is this conception of God as inclusive of us and our freedom, the view of God as "God with us," which we have identified with the conception of "Spirit" or "Spiritual Life."

With regard to the method and general tone of the thought expressed, the author has a very pertinent remark in the introduction. "There is undoubtedly," he says, "a strong philosophical bias against admitting the relevance of prophetic inspiration for speculative inquiry, and especially against accepting such inspiration as the very soul and support of reflective thinking. But even if we grant—nay, insist—that philosophy shall pursue her work in perfect freedom, uninspired by any muse save her own, may it not still be true that she herself would fain recapture something of the old prophetic strain?" And with a spirit of real gentleness—far removed from timidity—he proceeds to demonstrate his ideas and to oppose unflinchingly beliefs which he regards as untenable. When we say "beliefs," we mean intellectual beliefs; the author attacks no Church, sect, or organisation. The book is precisely what it professes to be—an exposition of theological philosophy. The man who reasons that because essentially "the Kingdom of God is within the soul" he can stand alone, without the aid of community of worship, is frequently found; but he is usually a poor specimen of humanity when intimately known, and we should say that nothing would tend more to draw thinking men together than a clear comprehension of the relationship of Christianity and laws of thought. In the division headed "The Passion of Love," Professor Gibson argues forcibly, and draws excellent analogies between the love of animals, the human emotions, and the innate necessity of love for a Supreme Being, passing on to observe:

Conscience itself is just the reverence of our whole being for that which is most intrinsically lovable. It is our love's reverence for God. All disinterested love is love that reveres its object. The artist who worships beauty in the flower is a truer, more disinterested flower-lover than the child who gathers for the pleasure of picking, smelling, and carrying the booty home. The naturalist who studies the life of animals and birds in their native haunts is a better lover of Nature than the sportsman who kills the same for sport. The same law obtains in human relationships. Human love rings true in proportion as the personality of the person loved is respected by the lover. The sentimental lover who considers his own feelings rather than the dignity of the person for whom he languishes is less a lover than a sentimentalist. On the other hand, the lover who considers his own dignity rather than the feelings of the one he professes to love knows less of love than pride.

The elusive nature of the problem of spiritual faith (as regarded solely by the intellect) is cogently suggested:

"The Eternal" is at once datum and problem, fact and task. As fact, it can subsist for us only through a sustained decision, which is the supreme test of our spiritual faith. And the fact which we thus sustain is nothing completed which we can hold before us, as we can a rose or an orange. It is a spiritual world built to the music of our own activity, and such music is still far from being a finished symphony. We, the builders, remain a problem to ourselves, and the world in which we seek to realise our universal nature is similarly a problem, the supreme life-problem both of man and of humanity.

It is unsatisfactory to quote detached passages from a book such as this, for one of its claims to importance is naturally the continuity of argument; but we must assure our readers who are interested in the subtleties of logic as applied to theology that they will find on every page sentences which are fruitful incentives to thought. It does not follow that they will always agree with the writer. Not everyone, for example, will subscribe to this statement:

When evil is fighting against good, there is still honour among the thieves. . . . But once the thieves are enthroned, honour among thieves would mean the realisation of the common good, and this would be inconsistent with evil's supremacy. . . . Hence, with the complete disappearance of the good goes the evil that opposes it, and we are left with the paradox that evil finally triumphant is non-existent.

This seems rather an argument ad extremum, and, tracked rationally to its conclusion, to lead to bewilderment. It is well, however, that men of erudition and of kindly, optimistic predilections such as Professor Gibson should be found willing to undertake the elucidation of these great and prolific subjects, and did we disagree with him in toto, we could not but value his sanity of outlook and his fine handling of a difficult theme. As it is, students in many contiguous fields of thought will, with ourselves, find pleasure in nominating this book a notable contribution to a class of literature which we fear is profitable only in the riches of the mind.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Terror of the Macdurgotts. By C. E. PLAYNE. (Unwin, 6s.)

WE have not often chanced upon a story so completely lacking in characterisation as this one. It is full of incident and possesses quite a stirring plot, but not once is a trace of interest possible in the actors as human beings—any attention the reader can find it in him to bestow goes to what they do, never to why they do it or what they are. The Macdurgotts are a family who own a certain island property off the coast of Scotland, and their "terror" is apparently Sir Hermann Mordan, a quite impossible person who contests their rights and maintains a perpetual state of feud between the two houses. He has scientists, electricians, and engineers at his service, and by a row of push-buttons in his sanctum can summon, if necessary, anything in the shape of the machinery of hostilities from a torpedo to a fire-engine; yet he prides himself on being a "man of peace" and merely takes all this trouble for the sake of feeling prepared, in case anything happens. We will not weary our readers with the details of the plot and the ineffective love-story; suffice it to say that the primary note of the book is excessively artificial, and the inexperienced novelist may possibly be able to discover within it some mild pleasure that would suffice to lessen the monotony of a journey by train.

Pomp and Circumstance. By DOROTHEA GERARD. (Long, 6s.)

THE author of "Pomp and Circumstance" will certainly, by her latest novel, increase her reputation for always telling a good story; the plot is excellent, and her manner of imparting it simple, straightforward and nearly always good English. Irma Harding, the heroine, whose father has to leave Vienna, ruined through a wife's extravagance, is a fine, beautiful character. She refuses to discard the dishonoured man—he has taken money that belonged to others in a weak moment—and comes to England with him; in London the two manage to eke out a living by teaching languages. Irma is engaged as tutor in Hungarian to a rising young diplomatist, Vincent Denholm; he falls in love with her—çela va sans dire—but although this sounds rather a hackneyed line of proceeding the cleverness of the author's characterisation and the humour of her digressions make the whole affair most interesting. Needless to say, the course of true love ran anything but smoothly for some considerable time; there were complications with a wealthy motor-manufacturer and hindrances due to Irma's consciousness of the stain on the family honour by her father's misdemeanour. All comes right, however, at the last, and the solution is related with much skill and restraint. The verdict of most readers will be to the effect that the romance is wholly charming, if not altogether probable.

The Merry Heart. By FRANK A. SWINNERTON. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

MR. SWINNERTON has come near to writing an original novel, and were it not that he has marred his scheme by introducing into the narrative some alien elements of plot, the performance would be entirely praiseworthy. The whole story about the disguised nobleman rings false. A man can't go on deceiving his wife and family for years in that fashion. They will become restive after a time. Mr. Swinnerton anticipates criticism to some extent by dubbing this story a melodrama, which, on the whole, it is not. But we are forced to the conclusion that his forte does not lie in the construction of probable plots. His sense of character, on the other hand, is admirable, though there is, perhaps, the smallest suggestion of precocity about the clever young men and women of these pages. Locritus takes us from the first. His gentle, whimsical philosophy is a perpetual delight. Fanny we cannot admire as we should, seeing her too much through her brother's eyes. The other two girls are each triumphs, particularly Kitty. (And here let it be observed parenthetically that Mr. Swinnerton has reproduced, with an accuracy little less than amazing, the manners and habits of speech of lower middle-class society). Then there are a crowd of lesser notables, each true to type, with the possible exception of the villain, whose like we have not yet encountered. His presence in the book is an indication of Mr. Swinnerton's intention. But it says much for his method that, with all the cumbrous apparatus of melodrama at his disposal, he has succeeded in writing a very charming comedy of manners. Next time we hope he will have the courage to dispense with plot altogether. We hope, too, that we may meet with Locritus again. He is too fine a fellow to disappear.

The New June. By HENRY NEWBOLT. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THE reader who would thoroughly enjoy this book should possess what we might term the "historical sense"—the strong interest in persons and events of the past, in battles and journeyings of long ago, the knowledge of which first came to him from the history-books of school. Should he not, however, have this desirable faculty he will be fortunate in that Mr. Newbolt has it in an eminent degree and can reproduce for him the brave days of old, make the valley of dry bones busy with life, and sound again the trumpet-call to arms. The story, the plot of which it would be impossible to enlarge upon in a review necessarily brief, is told with his usual quiet distinction of style, and contains several thrilling scenes of warfare and intrigue in the last years of the fourteenth century; the account of the voyage of the young knights with their brilliant retinue to the Holy Land, and their adventures within Italian borders, forms a lengthy and fascinating portion of the book. But we must say that we like the author best in his gentle musings and his short interludes of description; a little tranquil passage such as the following, for example, takes the ear almost as a soft chord of music:

Time is no comforter: he can but build a culvert over the stream. Below it, for him who stands to listen, the full waters of memory are still rolling, but above it the traffic of the world can now run secure and uninterrupted. By the aid of Time, therefore, one man will achieve forgetfulness, and call it comfort; another will learn only that his life must be henceforth divided—part shared cheerfully with all, part deeply hidden—in the brief passage from what has been to what shall be.

Or, as another instance, there is a charming suggestion of a scene at Arncliffe, Yorkshire, when John Marland, the squire whose doings form a large part of the story, leans from his window, unable to sleep:

He looked out into the cool night: the great silver disc hung like a lantern just above the topmost ridge of the wood: the steep hillside was like a monstrous black wave silvered on all its leathery edges, never breaking, but always about to break and bury the whole world in fathomless darkness. Under it lay the smooth shallows of the bare little garden, a lawn grey-green and a path all white, along which ran a low wall whiter and colder still.

There might well have been a stronger insistence upon the love-story which is subordinate throughout, and we could have wished that Mr. Newbolt had more often made use of the humour of which he is content to give us mere hints at long intervals. But not many writers could invest past years with so lifelike and moving a quality, and in these days of careless workmanship it would be out of place to cavil at minor drawbacks. The really fine account of the jousting at St. Ingelbert in the early chapters of this romance is worth half a dozen "popular" novels put together, and the reader whom the book, taken as a whole, fails to please will be, we fancy, difficult to find.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society on Wednesday evening, the 17th instant, at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, Mr. H. Mellish, President, in the chair, a lecture was given by Dr. Vaughan Cornish, F.R.G.S., on "Wind-Waves in Water, Sand, and Snow."

Dealing first with waves of the sea, Dr. Cornish described the gradual evolution of large sea-waves during the passage of a cyclone or other depression across the Atlantic. The great sea-waves are produced at that portion of the cyclone where the direction of the wind coincides with the direction of advance of the depression. Along this line of advance the waves in their gravitational progress are accompanied by a strong wind blowing across their ridges, as long as the atmospheric depression maintains itself. Thus the waves are developed until they attain a considerable steepness. The average height attained by these waves (in feet) is about half the velocity of the wind (in miles per hour). Thus a wind of fifty-two miles per hour gives waves of an average height of about 26 feet, although individuals will then attain a height of 40 feet. In the circumpolar southern ocean the height of North Atlantic waves is somewhat exceeded, but the outstanding feature of the waves of high southern latitudes is their greater length from crest to crest. South of the Cape of Good Hope and of Cape Horn there is neither windward nor leeward shore and the prevailing wind in all longitudes is westerly. Thus, wherever a westerly wind springs up it finds a long westerly swell, the effect of a previous wind, still running and the principal effect of the newly-born wind is to increase the steepness of the already-running long swell so as to form majestic storm-waves, which sometimes attain a length of 1,200 feet from crest to crest. The longest swells due to wind are almost invisible during storms, for they are masked by the shorter and steeper waves. They emerge into view, however, after, or beyond the storm, and Dr. Cornish has found their speed to be approximately equal to that of the wind by which they are created, sometimes attaining, even in the North Atlantic, a velocity of more than sixty miles per hour.

The action of the wind to drift dry sand in a procession of regular waves was studied by the lecturer in the Egyptian deserts. As the sand-waves are unable to travel by gravitation, as do the waves of the sea, their movements are entirely directed and controlled by the wind, and are, therefore, much simpler and more regular in form and movement than ocean waves. When they grow to great size, as in the desert sand-dunes, which attain a height of several hundred feet, the forms become more complicated owing to the partial consolidation of the lower layers of sand by pressure. Nevertheless, the characteristic wave-form can still be distinguished.

Mackerel-sky (a rippled form of cloud) is produced by the formation of an undulating surface where a lighter layer of air flows over a heavier one. The positive and negative of a rippled-cloud photograph were shown, and it was explained that the negative (showing the pattern not of the clouds themselves but of the unclouded sky between) was the true aerial "ripple-mark," corresponding to sand-waves.

For the purpose of studying snow-waves the lecturer traversed Canada twice during winter, and found the phenomenon best developed on the prairies near Winnipeg, when the temperature was below zero, and the snow had quite lost the adhesive character which it retains in warmer weather. Freshly-fallen, dry snow is drifted by wind in a procession of regular waves, progressing with a visible and ghost-like motion. They are similar to desert sand-waves, but less than half as steep, the wave length being fifty times as great as the height. The flatness of the wind-formed snow-waves affords a valuable indication of the great distance to which hills give effective shelter from wind, and helps to explain the climatic advantages of certain localities. The forms of snow-drifts produced in the neighbourhood of obstructions were also studied by the lecturer. Multitudinous shapes are assumed while the eddy-space formed by the obstacle is being filled up with snow, but when sufficient snow has fallen and been drifted in, so that the space is filled, the vertical section drift is Ichthyomorphic (fish-shaped) with a blunt head and tapering tail, which is the form of least eddy-making resistance. In fact, the forms of completed snow-drifts, illustrated in the lecture, convey valuable hints for the design of torpedoes or other immersed bodies intended to move through water or air.

The lecture was illustrated by numerous photographs taken by Dr. Cornish in his travels.

CORRESPONDENCE

LINE-LENGTHS IN VERSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Andersen's recent letter contains much suggestive matter with many apposite quotations, and clearly illustrates the fundamental uniformity which underlies varying forms of ballad-metre. That in such verse shorter lines are formed from longer by omitting syllables and substituting silent intervals may be taken as beyond question. No one, I imagine, doubts that this is so in metres like that of Macaulay's "Horatius," where the odd lines sometimes do and sometimes do not drop a final syllable (also occasionally an initial one), and where the resulting forms are interchanged with entire freedom, showing that the poet feels them to be metrically equivalent. It makes no difference when two lines are printed as one in his "Capys" and "Ivry":

Hurrah! the foes are moving. Hark to the mingled din
Of fife, and steed, and trump, and drum, and roaring culverin.

Obviously the poet might have written "Hurrah, the foes are moving now." Nor is it difficult to believe that had he chanced to write:

Hurrah, the hunt is up! Hark to . . . , etc.,

the caesural pause would have covered a space equal to that of two omitted syllables. Such alternation of sound and silence occurs fairly often in our lyric verse. We recognise it in Tennyson's song ("Queen Mary," v. 2):

Hapless doom of woman happy in bethrothing!
Beauty passes like a breath, and love is lost in loathing, or Browning's Epilogue to "Ferishtah's Fancies":

Then the cloud-rift broadens, spanning earth that's under,
Wide our world displays its worth, man's strife and strife's success.

Wherever, as here, a poet uses sometimes one form and sometimes another, interchangeably, measurement is practically certain; we can test it for ourselves by inserting imaginary syllables pro tempore. I do not doubt, therefore, that in all such cases the difference is not in actual length of lines, but merely in the degree to which their time-spaces are occupied by syllables.

Can we, in addition, recognise a silent foot at the end of each double line? Arranging the above-suggested words in what our hymnbooks call "Short Metre" form, we should get:

Hurrah, the hunt is up!
Hark to the mingled din
Of fife, and steed, and trump, and drum,
And roaring culverin.

We have acknowledged the existence of a vacant space after the first of these lines; does not a similar one manifestly follow the second and fourth? In a former letter I expressed doubt as to the possibility of measuring these latter intervals, and I note that, speaking of them, Mr. Andersen now says that "the length of the pause cannot be determined with certainty," since "a pause tends to shorten, to collapse on itself as it were." We have not here such direct evidence as in the other cases; we do not find poets habitually passing from "eights and sixes" to "eights and eights," and vice versa, with perfect freedom and apparent unconsciousness of difference. Yet I am now disposed to think that the presumption of equality is too strong to be resisted, when the second and fourth lines are compared with the first. That a pause of some kind follows them is indubitable. No one with any feeling for rhythm can disregard it, can read as one continuous phrase "the mingled din of fife and trump." The sole question is whether the pauses are measurable, and in ballad-metre I incline to think they are. While it is significant that Mr. Andersen professes to have found only one instance of twelve, fourteen, and sixteen syllables used alternatively—in a poem of Shelley's, of which more hereafter—and while in modern ballads at any rate the tendency is to separate rather than to intermix the three principal forms, I am willing to believe not only that the three forms were originally one, but that they remain identical so far as temporal structure is concerned.

Though ready to go thus far with Mr. Andersen, and in one respect seemingly further than he now goes, I am still sceptical of his right to claim unity for a line of sixteen syllables, or, as he more properly phrases it, of eight beats. He finds that the end of such a "phrase" is the point at which people naturally draw breath; I should say that they usually do it much sooner. Is it natural to read in one breath the whole of these two lines:

Ye banks and braes of bonny Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?

or these others where the beats are the same, though the feet are trisyllabic:

At the close of the day, when the hamlet is still,
And mortals the sweets of forgetfulness prove?

Are we not conscious of a break after each line? It seems to me that a good case could be made out for regarding four beats as the rhythmical unit in all such metres as these. For the four-beat line is not always doubled. We have it in stanzas of three lines, as in Tennyson's "Two Voices":

A still small voice spake unto me,
"Thou art so full of misery,
Were it not better not to be?"

We have it in stanzas of five lines, like this of Poe's—assuming, as Mr. Andersen will readily do, that the last line is one of four beats like the others:

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nieban barks of yore,
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary, wayworn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.

In my previous letter I cited several poems whose stanzas must, on Mr. Andersen's hypothesis, consist of one and a half, or two and a half, rhythmical phrases. Even in ballads, occasional duplication of a four-beat line seems to show that it is complete in itself. Thus in the very first stanza of "Horatius" we find:

And bade his messengers ride forth,
East and west and south and north,
To summon his array.

Similar duplication, it may be noticed, occurs in the stanza about "Mulga Town," quoted by Mr. Andersen, the lilt of which recalls an old song:

He turned him right and round about
Upon the Irish shore,
Said, "Adieu for evermore,
My love!
Adieu for evermore."

Here, if "My love!" be added to the previous line, metre becomes regular, while in "Mulga Town" it becomes irregular; but in both cases the four-beat phrase seems to be taken as complete.

It must be remembered that a single line of verse is not easily recognised as such; only when a second follows can we usually feel sure of metre. It is therefore quite natural that a pair of four-beat lines should form the commonest combination in this metre, but the rule has many exceptions. The four-beat line occurs with every possible variation. We have it coupled with syllabically shorter lines, or in stanzas by itself. We have it with alternate rhymes, as in "Ye banks and braes"; with consecutive rhymes, as in:

That which her slender waist confined
Shall now my joyful temples bind:
No monarch but would give his crown
His arms might do what this has done;

and with inverted rhymes, as in Tennyson's "In Memoriam." We have it in long unbroken passages, poems of considerable extent, where I do not feel that we have to gasp after every second line. I cannot think that in all these cases we are entitled to regard it as half a whole. Two four-beat lines are indeed often printed as one; Elizabethan "poulter's measure" is merely our "short metre" printed in two lines instead of four. But I suspect that even there we have a pair of four-beat lines rather than an eight-beat unity, and that we are always conscious of a break after the fourth beat. Similarly, the peculiar stanza quoted from Shelley I should treat as containing three pairs of four-beat lines, rather than three long phrases of eight bars apiece.

Besides, the four-beat line is, after all, only one of our metres. We have also the five-beat line, which Mr. Andersen admits to be wholly different, and tries to approximate to the duration of his eight-beat phrase by claiming that it is more slowly uttered. Most people think that its line is longer than that of ballad-metre, and surely they are right. I quite agree that it is an artificial growth, that ballad-metre is the more natural and spontaneous measure, especially to Northern nations, from whose literature most of Mr. Andersen's examples are taken. The vigour and vivacity of ballad-metre, the quick return of its shorter lines, sufficiently explain its popularity with us. But I cannot see why we should consider it the ideal form, the form from which others sprang or toward which they tend. Each length of line seems to have its own value, its own prosodic effect. From whatever sources ballad-metre and heroic verse came to us they have both long since been naturalised, and form part of our prosodic heritage; they, and other lengths of line too, have become familiar and welcome.

The point about Greek hexameter need not be pressed, though its very name implies that it contained six parts, and though we have no reason to suppose it was divided by any such silent space as occurred in its companion pentameter. But its conditions, like those of Oriental metres, are too foreign to make comparison profitable; it is better to keep to our own verse and that of kindred nations. With us, even when extra syllables do occur, are they always felt to be within the metre? Browning's "Fifine" is one of the few English poems of any length written in Alexandrines:

O, trip and skip, Elvire! Link arm in arm with me!

Sure enough, the poet sometimes inserts an extra syllable, e.g. (end of § 14):

Why is the wife in trouble? This way, this way, Fifine!

And now and then he even inserts two, e.g. (end of § 57):

Recalled the same to live within his soul for evermore.

To me the effect of these additions is disagreeable; they seem to alter the metre without manifest reason.* Of the ordinary lines some seem to have a break in the middle, others do not. Mr. Andersen allows that the central pause may become "atrophied"; does it not then cease to exist? Even if this form of verse originally demanded eight beats—or a pair of four beats—has it not ceased to do so? I referred to "Abt. Vogler" as not showing any necessary midway break:

All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist;
Not its semblance, but itself; no beauty, nor good, nor power,
Whose voice has gone forth, but each survives for the melodist
When eternity affirms the conception of an hour.

I might have cited also the so-called English hexameter. Long lines have naturally a tendency to break into two halves; I grant that such a tendency is perceptible here, but I do not find a silent foot. Whatever the origin of such lines, I think they are now felt by us to be simply lines of six beats.

A sound deduction is made when Mr. Andersen points out the peculiar effect of a longer (printed) line following a shorter, as in this of Burns:

Sae flaxen were her ringlets,
Her eyebrows of a darker hue.

Read "Sae flaxen were her ringlets fair," and the rhythm becomes obvious. But what does this show? If the two lines formed one rhythmical phrase why should it matter where the pause comes? Is it not just because these form a pair of four-beat lines, and the gap occurring before the first is finished leaves us uncertain of what is intended, that we feel difficulty? The same holds good of the lines quoted from Chapman, where the sentence-break comes unexpectedly, e.g.:

Persuade me to my wrong. Wouldst thou maintain in sure abode.

Here there is no silent space metrically, but the grammatical pause coming so early jars. Not all lines are equal, of course; pleasant effects can be got through disregarding equality. But the desire for lines of equal length is primary and instinctive, and our tendency always is to make them correspond.

Mr. Andersen is to be congratulated on writing a letter which raises such interesting questions, and embodies so much careful study. He does good service by calling attention to inter-relations of silence and sound, overlooked by those who confine their attention to syllables. Even if absolute certainty be unattainable regarding these matters they well deserve consideration.

T. S. OMOND.

* I feel the same about the extra long line in Nibelungen metre, as quoted in Mr. Andersen's letter.

THE REVERSED FOOT.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Though the heat of the battle concerning the reversed foot has probably abated even now as I write, I should like to say a little on the subject. The position in which the foot is most frequently found is at the opening of a blank verse line; but as the opening is not the best position for the study of the nature of a foot, a few examples may be given where it occurs within the line:

1. A mind not to be chang'd by place or time.
2. Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
3. For one restraint, lord of the world besides?
4. And what is else not to be overcome;
5. Abject and lost lay these, covering the flood,
6. Illumin, what is low raise and support;

Here the reversed foot consists of the first two in each of the four (in one instance five) syllables in italics: the combination of four is so common that it has received a special name, the choriamb. The first half of the choriamb is a trochee, the second half an iamb—that is, presuming the first half to be really a reversed foot. Furthermore, the choriamb should have the value of two feet in the line it occupies. In reading, however, it cannot but be noticed that a distinct pause precedes each choriamb above quoted; to which foot does this pause belong? Few will maintain that it forms no part of the rhythm, though in the view that the choriamb equals two feet, it seems extraneous. Compare, however, the following six lines in their order with the six above:

1. Pour forth their populous youth about the hive
2. In billows leave in the midst a horrid vale.
3. For those the race of Israel oft forsook.
4. To set himself in glory above his peers,
5. In worst extremes and on the perilous edge
6. A multitude like which the populous north.

Dividing the first of each set for comparison we have:

A mind / not / to be chang'd by place / or time /
 Pour forth / their pop- / ulous youth / abt / the hive /

This division is the one naturally following a reading aloud of the two lines: the corresponding feet in each line agree in time value, and the only foot in which any difference is detected by ear or eye is the second; the first contains a pause and a syllable, the second two syllables. It will not be gainsaid that each line of the second six quoted contains one three-syllabled foot—why should it be gainsaid in the first six? The pause and the first member of the choriamb are undeniably equal to a foot, and the three syllables following are no more than equal. The conclusions would appear to be, first, that a foot is not reversed, but that two feet are changed; second, that the name choriamb is erroneous so far as regards English verse, since it takes no note of the pause preceding it.

Take as a further example a stanza from Macaulay's "Mahogany Tree":

Christmas is here:
 Winds whistle shrill,
 Icy and chill,
 Little care we:
 Little we fear
 Weather without,
 Sheltered about
 The Mahogany Tree.

Here every line has the "reversed foot," a trochee preceding an iamb; but what of the pause dividing the lines? No pause divides the seventh and eighth—its place is taken by the two syllables opening the eighth line; in fact, the lines are anapests: the feet are triple feet. Many lines may be found in blank verse with an opening similar to Macaulay's stanza:

1. Moors by his side under the lee, while night
2. Hovering on wing under the cope of Hell,
3. Frequent and full. After short silence then,

Lines like these show that a pause precedes the first "reversed foot," as one precedes the similar foot later in the line; they seem, too, to show conclusively that the name "reversed foot" is a misnomer; that the first and stressed syllable of the foot really forms the last and stressed member of a foot containing a pause, and the second and unstressed syllable forms the first member of a triple foot.

Nor is the case different when, as frequently happens, the apparent trochaic effect is continued for two or more feet, as in the following lines quoted by Mr. Omond:

Harmonising with solitude, and sent Harmonising silence without a sound—

or as in this yet longer-drawn instance (a solitary one) in Milton:

As a despite done against the Most High.

Even Keats's line:

Thèa! Thèa! Thèa! where is Sàturn?

is only an example longer by a foot than Milton's. Examine the following:

Will envy whom the highest place exposes
 Foremost to stand against the thund'rer's aim,

Who can say where the trochaic effect begins? Only the slightest pause separates "exposes" and "foremost"—a longer pause is often found within a line—and leaving out the "will" the line is identical with Keats's. Note, too, that the "es" of "exposes" almost fills the pause which, it is held, exists before constructions like "Foremost to stand."

"Wrenched accent" is, as suggested by your correspondents, generally the result of sing-song scansion or reading. It may often be obviated by means of the construction that has hitherto been under discussion. The "palpitating" in the line quoted by Mr. Omond should, of course, not be read "palpitating." With a pause preceding the word, as:

With brèasts palpitating, and wings refurled, the natural stress is retained and a beautiful line results; the consonantal ending of "breasts" bridges the pause well—a pause which is not, of course, a cessation of sound, but a sustaining of the voice.

In other examples quoted by Mr. Omond an altogether different rhythmic construction enters. Take his lines:

1. Its stony jaws, the abrupt mountain breaks.
2. I have obeyed my uncle until now.
3. Scarce visible from extreme loveliness.

These are instances where the grammatical and rhythmical stresses do not coincide, thereby departing from the common wont of verse. But it does not follow, therefore, that the words are to be pronounced with their accent on the first syllable and none on the second. Take other, and slightly different, examples:

1. Up then crew the red red cock,
2. He has ta'en her by the milk-white hand
3. So stretch'd out, huge in length, the Arch-Fiend lay,
4. Death his death's wound shall then receive, and stoop,
5. But, as you know me all, a plain blunt man.

In these examples the places of usually unstressed syllables have been taken by syllables which require a grammatical stress, so that three, and in one instance four, stresses come together. The interloping stress is, however, usually somewhat less heavy than the preceding or following. The point to be noted is that a grammatical stress may fall even in a place where there is no rhythmical stress, and in Mr. Omond's examples the words "abrupt," "until" and "extreme" are pronounced with two accents or stresses, the second not necessarily as heavy as the first, but preferably less heavy, but not so subdued that the accent of the word appears "wrenched." I do not suppose the poet wishes to disregard or "get behind" the ordinary word accent, but wishes to vary it in the same way as that varies the rhythm. Though the foot usually contains two syllables, one stressed and one unstressed, it may have both syllables stressed, or neither stressed—the following line containing all three feet:

And quiver with three-bolted thunder stored.

It may, of course, contain three syllables or more, of which one or two may bear stresses. So of a word, though it normally bear but one stress, the poet may, to vary his numbers, give it two stresses by placing it in such a position that the rhythm imposes an additional stress, as in the following:

Thus high uplifted beyond hope, aspires
 Beyond thus high, insatiate to pursue.

In this instance the normal word follows the abnormal; where this order is reversed, as in Mr. Omond's examples, additional emphasis appears to be given. Instances of stress being suppressed in words normally stressed are so numerous as hardly to need examples:

Over earth and ocean with gentle motion, with which contrast the following:

Over the rills, and the crags, and the hills.

Instead of giving these double-stressed words two stresses they may, of course, be given the normal stress by scanning the line in a different way; in the following line:

Its stony jaws, the abrupt mountain breaks, the words "the abrupt" may be made a trisyllable followed by a pause. This would give force in the present instance, but I think such a scansion would not often be indulged in. This construction is occasionally met with:

Horrible sight! Now I see 'tis true;

In the light of the double stress Shelley's line:

I love all that thou lovest, offers no difficulty; the two words "thou lovest" bear three stresses—not necessarily all equally heavy, but all evident—three similar stresses being also juxtaposed in the line to which it rhymes:

I love all that thou lovest,
Spirit of Delight!
The fresh Earth in new leaves drest,
And the starry night.

In conclusion I should like to make a suggestion which, I apprehend, may raise a hornets' nest about me. Do not the foregoing considerations, and many others which could be adduced, seem to point to the fact that the iambic foot is a potential anapaest? The very fact that iambic metre has been supposed to contain quantity in the classic sense is confirmative of this idea. Notably in mixed duple and triple metre stressed syllables in the duple feet appear to be dwelt on, as if, deep down, there lurked a nascent third syllable. The following line from Gower:

And ever his cheer is sober and soft,
can be paralleled in avowedly triple metre:

The poplars are felled, farewell to the shade,
and note how the duple swells to triple:

And the whispering green of the cool colonnade.

JOHANNES C. ANDERSEN.

THE KING'S ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—“The Authors” have intimated their withdrawal from “the combat” in a letter written in their best style, and bristling with the weapons of sarcasm. I would suggest that they should preserve a copy to serve as a model of point and lustre, in a chapter on sarcasm, in their next edition of “The King’s English.” The observer, however, must have noticed a marked improvement in their composition since their letter appeared on January 30th, and I have no doubt, despite their sarcasm, that they have profited by the criticism. Curiosity has at last impelled me to peep into their book, and in full justice to “The Authors” I say frankly that I find it a good book, an informing, attractive manual, and such a book as one might peruse with profit in an idle half-hour at any time. Although there is much interesting matter in the book of an educative kind, presented in an ingenious and unconventional way, yet there is also much in it that lends itself open to fair criticism. “The Authors” undoubtedly have scholarship fitted for their task, but it does not follow that their judgment may not occasionally be at fault. In order to write well, the reader is enjoined to be “direct, simple, brief, vigorous, and lucid”—a very good and a very common rule of action, and one which indeed might with advantage be put into more general practice by “The Authors” themselves. Where, for instance, in the following passage, at page 54, do we find the “simple” and the “lucid”?—

An individual is not a person; it is a person as a single, separate, or private person, a person as opposed to a combination of persons; this qualification, this opposition, must be effectively present to the mind, or the word is not in place.

That paragraph is what an American would call a “sock-dologer.” I shall refrain from re-casting it, knowing that “The Authors” are “in trembling anticipation of possible future achievements in the way of synonym” from me. And have not “The Authors” said at another page that “to correct a bad sentence satisfactorily is not always possible? It should never have existed.” I am entirely in accord with this dictum, and I hope, for their own credit, that in the next edition of their book “The Authors” will totally expunge the above quoted illogical and mystifying jumble, and clothe their precious thoughts in garments of decent syntax.

At page 53 occurs the following paragraph:—

To use individual wrongly in the twentieth century stamps a writer, more definitely than almost any other single solecism, not as being generally ignorant or foolish, but as being without the literary sense.

This is a terrible indictment. On page 55 the victims are trotted out. The culprits are: Carlyle, Scott, Corelli, Borrow, Beaconsfield, A. J. Balfour, C. Brontë, and Trollope. Examples are given from these writers, and “corrections” are made. I will not affirm that “correctness” is achieved in all the amendments by “The Authors.” In any case, those of the writers in the above list who passed over to the great majority in the nineteenth century should on logical grounds escape hanging.

“Anent,” that good old once popular word with an Anglo-Saxon root, signifying “in regard to,” “concerning,” and having the merit of brevity—a “direct, simple, brief, vigorous, and lucid” word, surely satisfying the canons of “The Authors” up to the hilt—is described by them in their book as “Wardour Street English, antiquarian rubbish.” “The Authors” have laudably endeavoured to produce an up-to-date book. They seem to have an antipathy to the archaic, but they perhaps err in the opposite direction. At pages 118-119 one smells the brass foundry. Here “The Authors” introduce the words “Fused-participle theory” and “unfused-participle.” The participle has long been a tangled thread to grammarians, and the tangle would here appear to be getting more and more involved. At page 188 the student is still on the high level, and is taught to differentiate between the “paratactic” and the “syntactic.” These delightful distinctions were not in the text books when I was at school, but they are interesting as showing the modern trend. At page 154 “The Authors” overreach themselves when dealing with the perfect infinitive. They say:—

This has its right and its wrong uses. The right are obvious, and can be left alone. Even of the wrong some are serviceable, if not strictly logical. I hoped to have succeeded, for instance, means I hoped to succeed, but I did not succeed, and has the advantage of it in brevity; it is an idiom that it would be a pity to sacrifice on the altar of Reason.

The plain English of the matter is that one of two things has to be sacrificed, bad grammar or reason. “The Authors” lean to the sacrifice of reason. If, as “The Authors” erroneously say, I hoped to have succeeded is an idiom, it follows that many examples of bad grammar may be defended as being “idioms.” But, I hoped to have succeeded is not an idiom; because it is not a mode of expression peculiar to a language, but peculiar only to those people who stand in need of being taught to write grammatically. What is both logically, and chronologically, wrong must be black-balled when it seeks admission into literature as an idiom. Those who aim, like “The Authors,” at setting up a high standard of English ought really to be consistent. Any wrong expression in common use, against which “The Authors” have warned their readers, is, by the same logic, quite as much entitled to be exceptionally treated as “I hoped to have succeeded,” and even more so, for it is a most heinous offence to muddle up tenses. Such expressions as “I hoped to have succeeded,” “I found him better than I expected to have found him,” “It is long since I commanded him to have done it,” are, each and all of them, examples of atrocious English. They are not idioms, not even the first example which “The Authors” tearfully say “it would be a pity to sacrifice on the altar of Reason.”

Moreover, "The Authors" are entirely wrong in dogmatically asserting that the meaning of the words: "I hoped to have succeeded," is "I hoped to succeed, but I did not succeed." Nothing at all is affirmed as to success or non-success. The meaning is as likely to be: I hoped to have succeeded, and you see that success has attended my hope.

W. McC.

Glasgow,
15th March, 1909.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

- The Canon's Dilemma.* By Victor L. Whitechurch. Unwin, 6s.
The Member for Easterby. By James Blyth. Long, 6s.
The Threshold. By Winefrede Trafford-Taunton. Long, 6s.
Dromina. By John Ayscough. Bristol: Arrowsmith, 6s.; London: Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.
The City of Beautiful Nonsense. By E. Temple-Thurston. Chapman and Hall, 6s.
Margery Pigeon. By Jane Wardle. Arnold, 6s.
Chip. By F. E. Mills Young. Lane, 6s.
The Fortunes of a Fair Free Lance. By C. E. Jeffery. Routledge, 6s.

HISTORY

- Turkey in Revolution.* By Charles Roden Buxton. Unwin, 7s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Concurrent Practical and Theoretical Geometry.* Containing the Substance of Euclid, Books I. to XI., treated both experimentally and formally; in three parts, by W. J. Potter. Ralph Holland, 3s. net.
Mrs. Beeton's Cookery Book. New Edition. Ward, Lock, 1s. net.
Mr. Nicholas Wake-Spear on "The Baconian Heresy." Edited by Colonel Colomb. Eyre and Spottiswoode.
The Book of the Cottage Garden. By Charles Thonger. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.
Is Invasion Impossible? By Lieut. Alfred C. Dewar (Royal Navy). Griffin, 1s. net.
Notes from Sotheby's. Being a compilation of 2,032 notes from catalogues of book sales which have taken place in the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge, between the years 1885-1909. By Frank Karslake. Karslake, 25s.
Six Masters in Disillusion. By Algar Thorold. Constable, 6s. net.
Berkeley and Spiritual Realism. By Alexander Campbell Fraser. Constable, 1s. net.
Plato. By A. E. Taylor. Constable, 1s. net.
The Economic Journal. Macmillan, 5s. net.
Plays: the Silver Box, Joy, and Strife. By John Galsworthy. Duckworth, 6s.
Some American Sketches. By W. H. Hudson. Duckworth, 1s. net.
The Panama Canal and its Makers. By Vaughan Cornish. With map and illustrations. Unwin, 5s.
The Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, showing the operations, expenditures and conditions of the institution for the year ending June 30th, 1907. Washington Government Printing Office.
Beethoven's Letters. A critical edition, with explanatory notes by Dr. A. C. Kalischer. Translated with preface by J. T. Shedlock. Vol. I. and II. Dent, 21s. net.
Great Actors of the Eighteenth Century: A History of Theatrical Art. In ancient and modern times. By Karl Mantzius. Authorised translation by Louise von Cossel. Duckworth, 10s. net.
How to get Married. By Rev. E. J. Hardy. Unwin, paper, 1s. net; cloth, 2s. net.

MUSIC

- The Theory of Music for Students and Teachers.* Comprising the Elements of Music in both Notations and Elementary Harmony, together with a Short Exposition of the Principles of Voice Production and Voice Training. By G. Lightfoot. Ralph Holland, 2s. net.

POETRY

- By a Midnight Sea.* By E. J. Rupert Atkinson. Robertson, 6s.
The Song of the Stewarts. Prelude. By Douglas Ainslee. Constable, 7s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS

- Everyman's Library.* Published by J. M. Dent and Co. Cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net.

BIOGRAPHY.

- Gleig's Life of Wellington.* By G. R. Gleig, author of "The Subaltern."
The Letters of Charles Lamb. 2 vols. Introduction by E. R.

CLASSICAL.

- Aristophanes—The Acharnians, The Knights and the Birds.* Frere's Translation. Introduction by John P. Mayne.
Cicero's Select Letters and Orations. Introductory Note by De Quincey.

ESSAYS AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Craik's Manual of English Literature.* Revised by Eleanor A. Podmore. Edited by E. R.
Swift's Tale of a Tub, The Battle of the Books, etc. Introduction by Lewis Melville.
Gilfillan's Literary Portraits. Introduction by Dr. Robertson Nicoll.
A Legend of Montrose. With introduction and notes by Arthur T. Flux. Black, 1s. 6d.

THEOLOGY

- Easter Offerings, with Some Remarks on Whitsun Offerings.* By Fredk. Sherlock. "Church Monthly," 1s. net.
The Acts of the Apostles. With introduction, maps, text and notes, glossaries, examination questions, and index. Edited by Rev. E. C. W. Hannan, B.A. Ralph Holland, 1s. 6d. net.

ORDER FROM YOUR LIBRARY

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only paths from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whiter more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

THE CENTURY PRESS, 6-9 Surrey St., Strand, London.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSEY, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

HENRY SOTHRAN & CO., BOOKSELLERS.

NEW, SECOND-HAND, AND BOUND.
BOOKS SOUGHT FOR, however unimportant.

LIBRARIES BOUGHT OR VALUED.

140 Strand, W.C. (Tel. 1515 Central).
37 Piccadilly, W. (Tel. 3601 Mayfair).

Telegraphic Address—Bookmen, London.

BOOKS.—ALL OUT-OF-PRINT and RARE BOOKS on any subject SUPPLIED. The most expert Bookfinder extant. Please state wants and ask for CATALOGUE. I make a special feature of exchanging any Saleable Books for others selected from my various Lists. Special List of 2,000 Books I particularly want post free.—EDW. BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16 John Bright St., Birmingham. Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 Vols., 56s. net, for 32s. Bartholomew's Survey Gazetteer British Isles, 17s. 6d. net, for 5s. 6d. Rhead's Staffordshire Pots and Potters, 21s., for 10s. 6d.

Books for Sale

THE ART OF GARDEN DESIGN IN ITALY, by Inigo Triggs; 73 Photographic Plates in Collotype, 27 Plans and numerous Sketches in the Text; 4to, buckram; published Longmans, 1906, at £3 13s. 6d. net; for 21s.—WALKER, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

NOW READY.

A CHEAPER EDITION OF

THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY

By OSCAR WILDE.

"That great book with its august and terrible moral lesson."

(ACADEMY, January 23rd, 1909.)

Price: Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Leather, 3s. net.

To be had of all Booksellers. Supplied to the Trade only by SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

An Examination for Entrance Scholarships, open to Boys under 15 on June 1st, will be held in the first week of June. Further information can be obtained from the Reverend the Headmaster, School House, Sherborne, Dorset.

E. T. BOTTOM & CO., BOOKSELLERS, &c.

32 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

NEW BOOKS, MAGAZINES, AND
WEEKLY PERIODICALS.

AGENTS FOR OLD POST OFFICE
DIRECTORIES.

BERNARD SHAW

Passion, Poison and Petrification.

A Tragedy in One Act. Original Edition.

Post free, 1s. 3d.

HENRY IRVING

By HALDANE MACFALL. Illustrated by
GORDON CRAIG. Post free, 1s. 3d.

C. CANNON (D. J. RIDER, Successor),
36 St. Martin's Court, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

BOOKS BOUGHT. BEST PRICES GIVEN.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIATHE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

AN ILLUSTRATED BOOK NEWS MAGAZINE

MAY we draw your attention to "THE BOOK MONTHLY"—of which the March number is now ready—and its usefulness to all concerned with books?

Its information about new books—those coming out and those just out—is full and authoritative. Its articles, especially those on the book trade and on new movements in the book world, are fresh and informing. In "get-up" it is exceedingly attractive, and its illustrations are many and excellent.

There is no other monthly magazine which does the same service as "The Book Monthly"; that is, gives in a compact, agreeable way all the news and information of the current month in bookland—a pictured and picturesque What's What and Who's Who of our English Bookland from month to month.

The magazine is published at Sixpence net at the beginning of each month by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send it, post free, inland or abroad, for a year for Eight Shillings.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

agd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

Public Opinion

A Weekly Review of Current Thought & Activity
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by Percy L. Parker.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 31 & 32 Temple House, Tallis St., London E.C.

Specimens free on application.

From Everett & Co.'s List

NEW FICTION.

MRS. WHISTON'S
HOUSE PARTY

By THOMAS COBB.

THE DEVIL'S ACE

By FERGUS HUME.

"A 'mystery' novel of the first water."—Western Mail.

FELIX STONE

By A. & C. ASKEW.

THE DEGENERATE

By FRED WHISHAW.

THE IRON HEEL

By JACK LONDON.

"The Iron Heel" is a book for all to read, and its insight, large sympathy, clear reasoning, and high aims are in evidence in every chapter."—Pall Mall Gazette.

CHRISTIAN MURDERERS

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"A justifiable attack on those who seek to honour God by dishonouring His methods. . . . Miss Graham tells the story with charm and pathos."—Daily Telegraph."Deserves the attention it will undoubtedly command."—Truth.

BROTHER OFFICERS

By HORACE WYNDHAM.

"Mr. Wyndham at his best."—Scotsman."Mr. Wyndham always writes of military life as one who knows it, and his slight sketches of officers are happy and unexaggerated."—Globe.

London: EVERETT & Co., 42 Essex Street, W.C.

From A. C. FIFIELD'S New List

By WILLIAM
ENGLISH
WALLING.RUSSIA'S MESSAGE. The True
World-Import of the Revolution. With 30 Illustrations.
Royal 8vo. 476 pages. Indexed. cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.The present volume is not, like so many recent books on Russia, a funeral march over a revolution that has been, but an overture and a prophecy concerning a revolution that is most surely to come. Mr. Walling can give good grounds for the hope that is in him. He has spent a considerable time in Russia, has mixed with the leaders of all parties, has accumulated a vast store of information, and possesses the deeper knowledge that springs from sympathy. . . . His book, indeed, is a book of faith in Russia's destiny. It may be something of a partisan statement, but it is well-informed, idealistic, and absorbing."—Daily News.By
B. L.
HUTCHINS.THE PUBLIC HEALTH AGITA-
TION, 1835-44. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 156 pages, 2s. 6d. net."It sets out with admirable clearness the history of the public health agitation, and tells how Chadwick, Dr. Southwood Smith, and other pioneers created the crusade against disease, which is steadily bringing down the average mortality in this country."—Scotsman."Four capital lectures."—Manchester Guardian.By
C. D. SMITH.NATURAL MONOPOLIES, in Relation to Social Democracy. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 160 pages, 2s. 6d. net.

This book is a criticism, from the Socialist standpoint, of Mr. Mallock's theory of the relation between labour and ability in the production of wealth, and an attempt to establish an alternative theory. It deals with production and distribution, capital, earnings, ability and manual labour, minimum wages, interest, monopolies of power, position of originators, inducements to surrender monopolies, and a real democratic constitution.

By
T. F.
TAYLOR.THE FALLACY OF SPEED.
Boards, fcap. 8vo. 1s. net. Postage 14d."Mr. Taylor argues his point with great ingenuity and not a little cogency, and supports his unconventional argument by a surprising number of quotations from well-known people."—Scotsman.By LADY
CONSTANCE
LYTTON."NO VOTES FOR WOMEN." A
Reply to Recent Anti-Suffrage Arguments. Post free 9d.

32 pages. A temperate but able and forceful exposition of woman's case for suffrage. [2nd Edition in the press.]

By
GERALD
GOULD, B.A.ON THE NATURE OF LYRIC. An Essay. Illustrated from the history of English Poetry.

Crown 8vo. Wrappers, 2s. net. QUAIN PRIZE ESSAY, 1908.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44 FLEET STREET, E.C.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.]

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community.

Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net.

A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price 22 2s. net.

[Ready shortly.]

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

THE JEW AND HUMAN SACRIFICE

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D.,

REGIUS PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF BERLIN.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Shortly

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN OF THE SABBATH

By W. LOTZ, Ph.D., Theol. Lic.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

[Shortly

MANUAL OF OCCASIONAL OFFICES FOR THE USE OF THE CLERGY

Arranged and Compiled by the Rev. J. L. SAYWELL,
and Two Other Anglican Clergymen.

Crown 8vo, 4s. net

[Shortly

LONDON: COPE & FENWICK, 16 CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

Numerous complaints having reached this Office
as to difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY, we publish below a first list of the names and addresses of Newsagents and Booksellers at whose establishments THE ACADEMY is always on sale. Further lists will be published from time to time.

Messrs. Samuels and Taylor, 7 New Broad Street, E.C.	Mr. W. Morflew, 19 Edgware Road, W.	Mr. W. Weaver, 157 Great Portland Street, W.
Messrs. Davies and Co., 23 Finch Lane, Cornhill, E.C.	Messrs. Scripps's Library, 13 South Molton Street, W.	Messrs. Toler Bros., Ltd., 10 Coptic Street, Bloomsbury.
Mr. E. Born, 80 Copthall Avenue, E.C.	Mr. H. Offord, 15 Avery Row, Brook Street, W.	Mr. William Green, 138 Great Portland Street, W.
Mr. James Barker, 2 Castle Court, Birchin Lane, E.C.	The Manager, Foreign Bookstall, Café Royal, 68 Regent Street, W.	Mr. M. Pittman, 41 Notting Hill Gate, W.
Messrs. Leathwait and Simmons, 5 Birchin Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Bolton's Library, 81 Knightsbridge, W.	Messrs. Stansby and Co., 179 Sloane Street, Belgravia, S.W.
Mr. George Blair, 16 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Mr. E. George, 13 Swallow Street, Regent Street, W.	Messrs. M. Hildreth and Co., 10 and 12 Fulham Road, S.W.
Messrs. Pottle and Sons, 14 and 15 Royal Exchange, E.C.	Messrs. Knowles and Co., Crown Court, Pall Mall, W.	Mr. Henry Roberts, 2 Lower Grosvenor Place, S.W.
Messrs. E. T. Bottom and Co., 51A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 97 Queen Street, E.C., and Also at 165A Queen Victoria Street, E.C. 32 Chancery Lane, E.C.	Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Poulter, 8 Bury Street, St. James Street, W.	Messrs. Scott and Law, Belgrave Mansions, Grosvenor Gardens, S.W.
Mr. C. G. Norton, 38 Marchmont Street, Russell Square, W.C.	Messrs. May and Williams, 160 Piccadilly, London, W.	Mr. J. Shrubbs, 165 Ebury Street, Pimlico, S.W.
Messrs. Jones, Yarrell and Co., 37 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.	Messrs. Bingham and Co., 97 Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, W.	Messrs. W. H. Smith, Bookshop, Sloane Square, S.W.
Mr. Harrison, Devereux Court, Temple, W.C.	Mr. F. Batson, 82 Grosvenor Street, W.	Messrs. Wright and Son, 43 King's Road, Sloane Square, S.W.
Mr. R. C. Willis, 1 Green Street, Leicester Square, W.C.	The News Stores, (next) Hyde Park Hotel, Albert Gate, W.	Messrs. Jesson Bros., 129 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. J. Browne, 5 New Street, Covent Garden, W.C.	Messrs. T. Bastall and Son, 81 Ebury Street, London, W.	Mr. A. F. Vedy, 265 and 420 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
Mr. H. Hunt, 12 Bury Street, Bloomsbury, W. C.	Mr. T. Wyatt, 198 Ebury Street, Pimlico, W.	Mr. George R. Riches, 510 King's Road, Chelsea, S.W.
		Mr. Wm. John Arnold, Approach Book Stores, London Bridge, S.E.

Persons who experience any difficulty in obtaining THE ACADEMY are requested kindly to communicate with

The Manager of THE ACADEMY,
63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each. 2/6

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/- is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. HYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

TURKEY IN REVOLUTION

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations, 7/6 net.

This is the first book which has been published on the bloodless but far-reaching Revolution in Turkey, an event worthy of a place beside the great liberating movements of Greece and Italy, and destined to change profoundly the issues of the Near Eastern question. It contains information which can only be learnt from the lips of the actual authors of the movement. These Mr. Buxton has had a unique opportunity of knowing personally, having accompanied his brother, Mr. Noel Buxton, the chairman of the Balkan Committee, in the recent deputation to Constantinople. He describes the leading Young Turks, the Sultan, the Grand Vizier, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and the growth, success, prospects and dangers of the new movement.

T. FISHER UNWIN

"SHOULD BE WIDELY READ AND CAREFULLY PONDERED."

ARMY REFORM, and other Addresses

By the Rt. Hon. R. B. HALDANE, M.P. Cheap Edition. Cloth, 2/6 net.

The Daily News says:—"Each of these speeches is a masterpiece of exposition, wherein an intricate mass of facts is unfolded with exquisite skill and clearness. The broad facts are stated; one example in detail is cited; the broad principle is enunciated, and rings out as an inevitable logical conclusion."

T. FISHER UNWIN

IN MY LADY'S GARDEN

By Mrs. RICHMOND (late Garden Editor of "The Queen"). With 2 Coloured Illustrations and 48 other Plates. 12/6 net.

This book is divided into chapters for each week in the year, in which clear practical advice is given on the care of the garden, the laying out of the grounds, the lawn, the conservatory, the wild garden and the water garden; the cultivation of the new hardy waterlilies in many rich tints being thus brought within the reach of all. Nature Notes on the birds of the garden, their uses, wants, and ways, are added, with many interesting notes on matters connected with the garden.

T. FISHER UNWIN

"WILL DELIGHT ALL NATURE LOVERS."

THAT ROCK GARDEN OF OURS

By Professor F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A. With 8 Coloured Plates and 42 other Illustrations. 10/6 net.

Professor Hulme is a genial "guide, philosopher and friend," and the reader wanders with him amongst the plants, picking an anemone here, a ragged robin there, in delightful enjoyment. The book is full of charm in its chatty and reminiscent style, and the large number of illustrations with which it is embellished increase its usefulness and add very considerably to its interest and value.

T. FISHER UNWIN

NOTABLE

6s.

NOVELS

THE CANON'S DILEMMA. By Victor L. Whitechurch,
Author of "The Canon in Residence," Etc.

THE KEY OF LIFE. By A. A. Methley.

TRANSPLANTED DAUGHTERS. By Mrs. Burton Harrison.

HIGH LIFE IN THE FAR EAST. By James Dalziel.

THE WAYS OF MEN. By Herbert Flowerdew.

THE CAPTURE OF PAUL BECK. By M. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C.

T. FISHER UNWIN

HOW TO GET MARRIED. By the Author of "How to be Happy though Married." Paper Covers, 1s. net. [Write for a Complete Catalogue.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

THE ACADEMY

WITH WHICH ARE INCORPORATED LITERATURE AND THE ENGLISH REVIEW

Edited by LORD ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS

No. 1925

MARCH 27, 1909

PRICE THREEPENCE

Important Notice

Just Published.

PAUL VERLAINE

HIS LIFE.

By E. LEPELLETIER

HIS WORK.

174 pages, buckram gilt, demy 8vo, fully illustrated, £1 1s. net

THE Author of this book was at school with Verlaine, knew him intimately all his life, lent him money, procured him employment, and found publishers for his poems. He presents a graphic picture of the real Verlaine, and gives a wonderfully vivid criticism of his works.

M. Lepelletier's life of the master is not only a fascinating biography—it is practically a history of the chief French Literary movements of Verlaine's period, and throws a strong light upon contemporary Literature and writers.

The volume contains a number of exceedingly interesting illustrations and photographs.

T. WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, London.

FORTHCOMING NEW POETRY

SONNETS. By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

Author of "The City of the Soul." The Sonnets in this volume have not previously been published in book form. They include Lord Alfred Douglas's recent work in "The Academy." Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready next month.

THE CATHOLIC ANTHOLOGY

Being a Collection of Lyrics by Members of the Roman Catholic Community.

Selected by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcp. 8vo, pp. 250, 7s. 6d. net.

A specially Choice Edition of this book will be printed on vellum, and limited to 20 copies, price £2 2s. net. [Ready shortly.

"THE ACADEMY" PUBLISHING COMPANY, 63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

THE LATEST FOUNTAIN PEN, 1909 MODEL

One of the leading manufacturers of Gold Fountain Pens challenges to demonstrate that their pens are the very best, and have the largest sale, that no better article can be produced.

They offer, as an advertisement, the half-guinea 2/6
Diamond Star Fountain Pens, 1909 Model, for 2/6 each.

This Pen is fitted with 14-carat Solid Gold Nib, iridium pointed, making it practically everlasting, smooth, soft, and easy writing, and a pleasure to use. Twin Feed and Spiral to regulate the flow of ink, and all the latest improvements.

THE SELF-FILLING AND SELF-CLEANING PERFECTION FOUNTAIN PEN is a Marvel of Simplicity; it deserves to be popular.

It is non-leakable, fills itself in an instant, cleans itself in a moment—a press, a fill—and every part is guaranteed for two years. The Massive 14-carat Gold Nib is iridium pointed, and will last for years, and improves in use. Fine, Medium, Broad, or J points can be had.

This Marvellous Self-Filling Pen, worth 15/-
is offered as an advertisement for 5/6 each. 5/6

It deserves to be popular, and is certain to be the Pen of the Future. Every Pen is guaranteed, and money will be returned if not fully satisfied. Any of our readers desiring a really genuine article cannot do better than write to the Makers, Messrs. RYHART & CO., Ltd., Dept. A, 71 High Holborn, London, W.C., and acquire this Bargain. (Agents wanted.)

NEW BOOKS at the BODLEY HEAD

ON THE TRACK OF LIFE.

The Immorality of Morality. Translated from the Italian of LEO. G. SERA by J. M. KENNEDY, with an introduction by DR. OSCAR LEVY. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Sera is a physician who has deeply studied literature and historical science, and the object of his book is, in the opening words of the preface, "to establish our conception of social life on its original basis." He holds that the diffusion of democratic principles is vulgarising science and art, and that present social conditions, especially work and Christian teaching, are leading to the intellectual and moral degeneration of the race.

A SISTER OF PRINCE RUPERT: Elizabeth Princess Palatine, Abbess of Herford.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY, Author of "English Children in the Olden Time," &c. With numerous Illustrations Reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"No historical biography published during the last few years surpasses this one in the minuteness of its research and the width of the field it has covered."

BRITISH MALAYA.

An Account of the Origin and Progress of British Influence in Malaya. By SIR F. A. SWETTENHAM. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ASPECTS OF MODERN OPERA.

By LAWRENCE GILMAN, Author of "Phases of Modern Music," "Strauss," "Salome," "The Music of To-morrow, and Other Studies," "Edward MacDowell," &c. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH.

Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Nephew of THOMAS CARLYLE, Editor of "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," "New Letters of Thomas Carlyle," &c. With Two Portraits in Colour and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 2 vols. 25s. net.

These are the letters that passed between Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh from the time of their first meeting in May, 1821, until their marriage in October, 1826. There are in all 176 letters, arranged chronologically in the form of "letter and answer." The account of the courtship contained in these letters is more fascinating than a romance. They are brilliant and pathetic by turn, wise and witty; light and grave; and they tell for the first time the story of the early association of this remarkable pair, and the influence of one character upon the other is clearly indicated. [Ready shortly.]

UNDER PETRAIA, With Some Saunterings.

By the Author of "In a Tuscan Garden." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Globe.—"Purely conversational in style as this book is, it possesses that indefinable literary charm which holds fast the reader who has once opened its pages, so that he cannot put it down till he has reached the end. Even then it will be taken up again and again, to be dipped into here and there as the fancy seizes us."

Daily Telegraph.—"The kindness and gentleness of the whole thing are irresistible. . . . It recalls the spirit of Borrow, to whom sun, moon, and stars were all good things."

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL.

Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century. By HORACE BLEACKLEY, Author of "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess." With numerous Portraits Reproduced from Contemporary Sources. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE: During a Tour on the Continent upon its Reopening after the Fall of Napoleon, 1814.

Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A FOOL OF QUALITY.

Or the History of Henry Earl of Moreland.

By HENRY BROOKE (1703-1783). With an Introduction by FRANCIS COUTTS. 2 vols. (New Pocket Library.) Leather, 4s. net. Cloth, 2s. net.

MARIA EDGEWORTH and Her Circle in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon.

By CONSTANCE HILL. Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," "The House in St. Martin's Street," etc. With numerous Illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

Miss Hill's new book deals with episodes in the life of Maria Edgeworth during the first twenty years of last century, for the development of which much unpublished material has been acquired. [Ready shortly.]

MADRID.

An Historic and Descriptive Account of the Spanish Capital, with 450 Illustrations. By A. F. CALVERT. (The Spanish Series.) 3s. 6d. net. [Ready shortly.]

JOHN LANE'S NOVELS FOR 1909

"Youth, with its sunlit, passionate eyes,
And rosy velvet skin,
A plea to cancel a thousand lies
Or a thousand nights of sin."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH A NEW AND STRIKING NOVEL BY ALICE HERBERT

YOUTH—with its hopes and despairs, its loves and griefs, its triumphs and disappointments, its illusions and revelations—is the theme of Mrs. Herbert's daring novel. Francie finds his illusions destroyed, his idols with feet of clay, and his wife a mere doll, to whom he proposed in the glamour of the moment. Still, through everything he preserves his faith in the ultimate fitness of things, and the novel's close finds him "blistered and buffeted, unbuffed still."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH A NEW AND STRIKING NOVEL BY ALICE HERBERT

ON SALE EVERYWHERE. SIX SHILLINGS.

LITTLE DINNERS WITH THE SPHINX.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. 6s.
Observer.—"It is the quaintest, oddest conceit, told with an enchanting simplicity."

BALTHASAR.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. A Translation by Mrs. JOHN LANE. 6s.
Being Vol. VI. of the Works of Anatole France in English.

SOMEONE PAYS.

By NOEL BARWELL. 6s.

LANE'S SHILLING LIBRARY.

LIFE IN A GARRISON TOWN: The Suppressed German Novel. By Ex-Lieutenant F. O. BILSE.

DEAR FATHERLAND. By F. O. BILSE.

A WHIRL ASUNDER.

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON.
"A very enjoyable book; unconventional in its treatment and revolutionary in its plot. The present popular edition should have a wide circulation."—Irish Independent.

With Illustrated Paper Covers, 1s. net each.

JOHN LANE - THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

CONTENTS

Page.	Page.
Life and Letters . . . 915	Panama Canal . . . 921
Daffodil Dawn; Angels. 917	Shorter Reviews . . . 922
THE ACADEMY and the Evening Standard . . . 917	The Field 924
The Naval Crisis . . . 918	Scar 925
Revision of the Prayer Book—II. 919	Meetings of Societies . . . 925
Quiliterisms 920	Correspondence . . . 926
	Books Received . . . 927
	Spring Announcements . 928

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-Class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to The Wilsford Press, Ltd., 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Publishing Offices of THE ACADEMY are at 63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., to which address all business letters should be sent.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply acceptance of an article.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Balkan crisis has this week advanced to its most acute stage. Sir Edward Grey's proposals for a formula of approach of Austria by Serbia have not found acceptance in Vienna. We are told that on Monday or Tuesday next the Austro-Hungarian representative at Belgrade will present to King Peter's Government "not an ultimatum, but a brief, courteous, decisive note," and if the Serbian reply does not please their great neighbours, presumably the guns will fire. Several months ago it was sagely remarked that the greatest security for the peace of Europe was the snow on the Balkans. The snows are beginning to melt. A very large Austrian Army has been mobilised in the cold on the Servian frontiers and in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Servian Army has been also on what was almost equivalent to a war footing. We now hear of fresh Austrian mobilisation, and there is an impression that many Army Corps are converging on the southern frontiers of the Dual Monarchy. Europe has all along wondered exactly what Austria wanted. The proportion of force between her and Serbia, even with the gallant little hill State of Montenegro as her ally, is overwhelming. But small States can be very troublesome. The occupation and pacification of Bosnia and Herzegovina was nearly as tedious as was the Boer War. Serbia wants certain commercial concessions, and others connected with communications. May it not have seemed to Austrians essential that she should take them only from her—hat in hand? With a large Slav population Austria has always dreamt of ultimately acquiring Slav supremacy in the Balkans. She is swayed by this "Drang Nach Osten." Her ultimate ambitions do not end till Salonica is reached. An independent Serbia, and in future a Serbia which will most certainly be hostile, on her left flank, as the pressure towards the East develops would be a great danger, or a grave inconvenience. The cost of keeping this large army mobilised for war all the winter has been very great. Is it to be for nothing? Would not Austria's interests in the south be safer with a king at Belgrade who owed his crown to Austria? The house of Kara-georgewich has not earned the respect of civilisation—King Peter has not yet been formally recognised by all the Courts of Europe. And there is another factor. Russian statesmen have just declared in no uncertain voice that Russia is not prepared for war. What better chance of insisting on Austria's fitness and on her claims to predominate on the road towards the Ægean Sea? The Austrian Army, it is true, occupied Bosnia and Herzegovina. Their last war resulted in their signal defeat by Prussia in 1866. A great army justly proud of itself will some day wipe from their swords the stain of defeat. It must be very gratifying to the aged Emperor to see how a national threat has brought to his support all parties of the Hungarian Parliament. A war is a wonderful riveter of national interests.

A number of the Suffragists, including Mrs. Fawcett, Lady Knightley of Fawsley, Lady Frances Balfour, Lady McLaren, Lady Grove and Mrs. Philip Snowden, have issued a circular in which they give the names of about three hundred "distinguished men" who are in favour of the franchise for women. This circular is intended to be a counterblast to the proceedings of the men's league for opposing women's suffrage; and it is intended, of course, to show that the opinions on this subject are not all on one side. Unfortunately for these well-meaning ladies their list of "distinguished" men turns out to be a very poor sort of affair. At least half of the names on the list are those of people who have no particular claim to be called distinguished, while in the case of others such claims rest on grounds which are not altogether flattering to the persons concerned. Only two peers of the realm figure in the list—Lord Courtney of Penwith and Lord Warwick. Lord Courtney, of course, can justly claim to be a distinguished man, but really in the case of Lord Warwick, except that he is the husband of that eccentric lady, Lady Warwick, we fail to see that he has any claim whatever, apart from his rank and wealth, to be considered a distinguished man. At any rate, if the mere possession of a peerage and large landed property is considered by the Suffragists sufficient to entitle a man to the epithet "distinguished," they must accept the logical conclusion of the situation, which will lead them to the uncomfortable conclusion that the House of Lords is against Women's Suffrage in the proportion of about twenty-five to one. As a matter of fact, the Suffragists can claim some supporters in the House of Lords, whom they have not mentioned. For instance, there is Lord Lytton, whose chief claim to distinction lies in the fact that his sister has just come out of prison; and Lord Russell, who is distinguished by the fact that he has been the hero of two sensational public trials, the second of which resulted in his condemnation and committal to prison for the offence of bigamy.

Under the heading of "Literature" the following names are included in the Suffragist list:

J. M. Barrie, Arthur C. Benson, Sir Percy W. Bunting, Edward Carpenter, F. J. Furnivall, J. E. Garnett, Thomas Hardy, Laurence Housman, John Masefield, Justin McCarthy, George Meredith, O.M., William de Morgan, Sir Henry Norman, R. Barry O'Brien, Rev. James Hannay ("George Birmingham"), W. Pett Ridge, William Rossetti, Alfred Sidgwick, Harold Spender, Herbert Trench, H. G. Wells, Richard Whiteing.

Nobody will deny the claims of Mr. George Meredith and Mr. Thomas Hardy to be considered distinguished men, but what can be said of the rest of them, including such amiable nonentities as Mr. Edward Carpenter, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Pett Ridge and such exceedingly minor poets as Mr. Laurence Housman and Mr. John Masefield? The poor Suffragists are really very unfortunate. Their most determined efforts to advance their cause invariably tell heavily against them, for it is in their nature radically to misunderstand the attitude of the vast majority of their countrymen towards them. The mere fact that they like it to be known that they have the support and approval of the persons whose names we have mentioned under the head of "Literature," and various other people included in the list, such as the Bishop of Hereford, the "Rev." R. J. Campbell, "Dr." Clifford, and others too numerous to mention, proves the hopelessness of the state of mind in which they welter. The name of any one of the last three whom we have mentioned attached to any cause would cause the average man to regard it with great suspicion. The lady Suffragists must try again.

While we are on this subject we may as well refer to Mr. Geoffrey Howard's Franchise Bill, the details of which had not been made public when we went to press last week. It turns out to be a Bill which might easily have been conceived in Colney Hatch, and the fact that it passed a second reading by the comparatively small majority of thirty-five indicates the utter defeat which is overtaking the Suffragist movement. It is not likely that in the next hundred years a House of Commons will exist containing even a quarter of the extraordinary cranks and wild visionary enthusiasts for absurd measures of so-called reform who now adorn it. So that if ever there was a time when such an insane Bill as Mr. Howard's had a chance of becoming law it was last Friday. But even the small majority who voted for the Bill did so in the absolute certainty that their votes could have no practical effect whatsoever. In any ordinary normal House of Commons, such as has existed during the past fifty years and such as will exist again when the nightmare of the present Government is over, there will always be an overwhelming majority against Woman's Suffrage.

We have received the following letter from a gentleman connected with the Humanitarian League in reference to our remarks about pheasant shooting in last week's ACADEMY:

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—As you have referred to the members of the Humanitarian League as "cranks," in your reference to Canon Lyttelton's remarks upon pheasant shooting, I am sure you will in fairness allow me to quote a few words from a pamphlet on "The Horrors of Sport," written by the late Lady Florence Dixie, who spoke from a very large personal and practical experience of the subject.

"I do not think," she said, "there is any form of sport quite so contemptible as covert shooting. There is something so intensely mean about it all. The animals slaughtered are beautiful, gentle, gaily plumed birds, who up to that day of battue have run like fowls to greet the keepers who fed them, but who now drive them to their death."

Canon Lyttelton was quite mistaken in supposing that the Humanitarian League, in its anxiety to attack the Eton Beagles, had overlooked the question of the battue; on the contrary, we have made frequent protests against the practices to which he refers.

Yours faithfully,

HENRY S. SALT.

Humanitarian League,
53, Chancery Lane, W.C.

Mr. Salt, it will be observed, quotes Lady Florence Dixie, who, as he justly says, spoke from a very large personal and practical experience on the subject. The mention of Lady Florence Dixie in this connection is an amusing confirmation of the remarks which we made some weeks ago on the state of mind of those people who inveigh against field sports. Our exact words were as follows:

Our experience, however, inclines us to believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred of those who fulminate against field sports are people who are either incapable of indulging in them, or who, having lost the power to enjoy them, proceed to make a virtue of necessity.

Lady Florence Dixie was an exceedingly amiable, if somewhat eccentric lady. She happens, moreover, to have been the aunt of the editor of this paper, and he therefore will be acquitted of any desire to reflect upon her memory when he recalls the fact that for at least twenty years of her life Lady Florence Dixie was an ardent devotee of every form of field sport. In addition to being one of the finest horsewomen and cross-country riders, male or female, who ever got into the saddle, she was a fine shot, and in her life she must have been responsible for the death of a great many thousand pheasants. At a certain period in her life, however, she unfortunately became crippled from rheumatism, and it was from this date that her sudden conversion to the views of the Humanitarian League about pheasant shooting is to be reckoned.

We have several times commented on the inordinate affection displayed by Mr. Frank Harris for the amiable gentlemen who emphasise their political opinions by the use of bombs. Mr. Harris is simply unable to keep off the subject of anarchy and anarchists. In this week's Vanity Fair there appears an article signed "E. C. Froom" entitled "Russian Police Methods. How a Colonel was degraded. Tracked to London and back to St. Petersburg." In this article Mr. Froom relates how a certain Colonel Paul Vitozhnikov, who "was a gentleman in every sense of the word, and a good soldier too," was degraded from his rank and sentenced to two years' imprisonment in Siberia for certain actions which Mr. Froom appears to consider were quite innocuous and perfectly honourable. It appears that the innocent and gentlemanly Colonel while in London "came across a number of Russian refugees—men wanted by the Tsar's police for sedition and political offences of various degrees." These engaging persons brought to the notice of the Colonel a revolutionary publication, printed in London, called "Kolokol," and they persuaded him to agree to take several copies of this publication as well as several letters addressed to Socialist friends in Russia. With a view, no doubt, to greater security the Colonel concealed these documents in his boots, and having been watched all the time, unknown to himself, by Russian detectives, he was arrested on his return to Russia. "In his top-boots," says Mr. Froom, "the police found copies of the prohibited 'Kolokol,' while from his pockets they extracted the letters addressed to various prominent Socialists and Anarchists."

The Colonel, easy-going man that he was, and with no sympathy for those who desired the overthrow of the Russian Government, was astounded. True, he knew that the men in London whose acquaintance he had made were refugees, but he had quite understood that they were innocent of any crime beyond that of being slightly in advance of the age, as all reformers are.

Unfortunately for the Colonel, the Russian police were unable to take this benign view of the intentions of the benevolent "reformers." They probably thought, as simple-minded people might be apt to think, that persons who were in the habit of conducting political propaganda by means of cowardly and wholesale murder, were rather too much in advance of the age to be treated with leniency. Accordingly, to the sorrow and breast-beating indignation of Mr. Frank Harris and Mr. Froom, the gallant Colonel was subjected to the punishment to which we have referred. Most people who are not quite so much "in advance of their age" as Mr. Harris and Mr. Froom will come to the conclusion that on the whole the Colonel got off very lightly considering the nature of his offence. That he was not then and there led out and shot may be taken as a direct refutation of the malignant charges of cruelty and injustice which it is the habit for "advanced" newspapers to bring against the Tsar and his Government.

We have received the following touching communication from Mr. Bottomley:

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

DEAR SIR,—Herewith I have pleasure in handing you a very early copy of my book (popular edition), which will be published on Saturday next—by which time all printer's errors and other "literals" will have been attended to.

I venture to express the hope that—especially at this juncture—you will find its contents of sufficient general interest to warrant a special notice—the honour of which I shall greatly appreciate.

Yours faithfully,
THE EDITOR.

John Bull Editorial Offices,
67, Long Acre, London, W.C.,
23rd March, 1909.

Accompanying this appeal Mr. Bottomley has been kind enough to send us a copy of his great work, "Bottomley's Book." We quite agree with Mr. Bottomley that his book is of sufficient public interest, "especially at this juncture . . . to warrant a special notice." All our notices of Mr. Bottomley have been special notices. We hope that we shall never notice Mr. Bottomley otherwise than in a special manner. Our mature criticism of his masterpiece must, however, be deferred to a later issue, as it has only reached us just as we are going to press. At present we will merely state that we have been surprised and pained to notice that the promised "character-sketch by Herbert Vivian" is not forthcoming. We have noticed with ever-increasing regret the absence of Mr. Vivian's name and pseudonym from the columns of Mr. Bottomley's paper ever since the fatal day when we had occasion to draw attention to the vile and slanderous attack which he made in that journal upon Lord Roberts. Can it be that in future we shall have to describe the rejected of Deptford and Constantinople as the rejected of Bottomley also? In other words, can it be that, while Mr. Bottomley is unable to summon up sufficient grace and sense of honour to apologise to Lord Roberts for the gross violation of good manners and good taste which he has permitted in his paper, he is yet sufficiently ashamed of his lapse to have decided to dispense with the services of his gallant lieutenant. We should be sorry if it were so, for, while we cannot pretend to any admiration for the views or the principles or the writings of Mr. Herbert Vivian, we feel that it would be most unsportsmanlike of Mr. Bottomley to throw him overboard at the present juncture. Mr. Bottomley's responsibility for the appearance of the outrageous attack on Lord Roberts is quite as great as Mr. Vivian's. It is quite certain that it could not have appeared in John Bull without the approbation and consent of Mr. Bottomley; or, for the matter of that, without the approbation and consent of Messrs. Odhams, the printers of John Bull. At any rate, the appearance of the article on Lord Roberts was discreditable to Mr. Bottomley and discreditable to Messrs. Odhams, and if Mr. Bottomley imagines that he can avoid his responsibility by suppressing Mr. Vivian and saying nothing more about the matter he is vastly mistaken. An apology and a withdrawal are needed, and until they are forthcoming THE ACADEMY will continue from time to time to take "special notice" of Mr. Bottomley.

DAFFODIL DAWN

WHILE I slept, and dreamed of you,
Morning, like a princess, came,
All in robe of palest blue:
Stooped, and gathered in that hour
From the east a magic flower,
Pearl and amber flower of flame . . .
Then she hastened on her way
Singing over plain and hill—
While I slept and dreamed of you
Dreams that never can come true . . .
Morning at the gates of Day,
Gathered Dawn, the daffodil!

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

ANGELS

WHEN life is difficult, I dream
Of how the angels dance in heaven!
Of how the angels dance and sing
In gardens of eternal spring,
Because their sins have been forgiven . . .
And never more for them shall be
The terrors of mortality!
When life is difficult, I dream
Of how the angels dance in heaven . . .

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

"THE ACADEMY" AND THE "EVENING STANDARD"

THE editors of evening papers are generally supposed to be busy men; and we have no reason for supposing that any exception would have to be made in the case of the editor of the Evening Standard. We have no knowledge as to the identity of this gentleman, and he is unknown to us either by name or by reputation. It appears, however, that his multifarious occupations do not debar him from a careful perusal of other journals. We are enabled to arrive at this conclusion by observation of his paper, where, from time to time, he prints a column headed "The Pith of the Papers," containing short extracts from his various contemporaries, daily and weekly. For several months past, at any rate, on Saturdays, he has been in the habit of including among these selections a paragraph taken from THE ACADEMY. We do not complain in the least. On the contrary, we rejoice to think that his apparently voracious appetite for the Daily Mail and the other hapenny papers, and the more "advanced" Radical and Socialistic weeklies does not prevent him from an occasional glance at the interior of some more reputable journals. For a common commercial, and on the whole illiterate, evening paper to quote paragraphs from THE ACADEMY would, on the face of it, appear to be a sign of grace; but there is a form of quotation which is a less satisfactory indication of the mind of the person who quotes. And of this form of quotation in the Evening Standard from the pages of THE ACADEMY we will give three examples. The first is taken from the Evening Standard of January 23rd, and consists of the following sentences:

The Sounder Attribute.

We are well aware that in the twentieth century honesty is no virtue, but a sort of old-fashioned vice. Cleverness is a much sounder attribute.

Here we have a case of an obviously ironical remark. Anybody who is acquainted with the views on honesty and virtue of THE ACADEMY must be well aware that THE ACADEMY does not think that cleverness is a much sounder attribute than honesty and virtue. The editor of the Evening Standard, by taking an isolated passage out of its context has succeeded in conveying to his readers the impression that THE ACADEMY thinks more highly of "cleverness" than of virtue and honesty. As we have said before, the editor of the Evening Standard is probably a very busy man. It is therefore curious, to say the least of it, that he can spare the time to search diligently through the columns of a contemporary to find a sentence which, by being removed from its context, is capable of giving an entirely false impression of the views of that contemporary. If this were an isolated instance it might well have been put down to carelessness or stupidity. But on January 31st, exactly a week later, we have the Evening Standard coming out with the following extract from THE ACADEMY:

Meredith—An Acquired Taste?

It has been said repeatedly that the appreciation of Mr. Meredith's work is an acquired taste; and there is some truth in the remark. We can well imagine a neophyte who had departed from some library with a copy of "The Egoist" under his arm settling down for a lazy hour by the fire, becoming alarmed at that extraordinary opening chapter, and, after giving up in despair, informing his friends that he "couldn't get on with Meredith."

Here the misrepresentation of the views of THE ACADEMY is again insidiously brought about by the use of the query which the editor of the Evening Standard has fixed to his own question. It is as much as to say, "Is Mr. Meredith an acquired taste? Surely not to anyone who professes to be a judge of literature." Between the word "remark," which ends the first sentence quoted and the sentence beginning "We can well imagine a neophyte," there are six lines, which the editor of the Evening Standard has deliberately omitted from his quotation. He has carefully suppressed any indication of this omission, and the quotation reads exactly as if it were taken as it stands out of the columns of THE ACADEMY; the result being, of course, as the editor of the Evening Standard intended it to be, completely to garble the sense of THE ACADEMY's observations. The third instance (and in quoting these three instances we do not wish to say that they are the only ones we could mention) occurred on February 20th, when the editor of the Evening Standard quoted the following passage from THE ACADEMY:

Shakespeare and Milton Forgotten!

If it were possible to make English ears require fixed and definite syllable-quantities, all our past minstrelsy would suffer. We cannot have it both ways, cannot appreciate quantity in one form of verse and not miss it in another. If racial habits count for anything, quantitative metre will be enjoyed when Shakespeare and Milton are forgotten—and not till then.

In this case he neither dovetailed portions of the text nor omitted the necessary context. He simply put the headline, which appears in black type with an exclamation mark at the end of it; his object being, of course, to convey to his readers the impression that THE ACADEMY was hopefully looking forward to the time when Shakespeare and Milton would have been forgotten. The sentence, of course, bears precisely the opposite sense. When THE ACADEMY said, "If racial habits count for anything, quantitative metre will be enjoyed when Shakespeare and Milton are forgotten—and not till then," it meant, of course, that quantitative metre would only be enjoyed when people had ceased to have appreciation for the masterpieces of English literature—that is to say, humanly speaking, never. It is just barely conceivable that an extremely stupid schoolboy might honestly have misunderstood THE ACADEMY's meaning, and, of course, if the editor of the Evening Standard is ready to plead guilty to wooden-headed stupidity he has a perfect answer to the charges we have brought against him, and we will gladly apologise to him for affirming that he has been guilty of spiteful manipulation for his own ends, of the written words of a contemporary.

THE NAVAL CRISIS

THE question of Naval Supremacy remains practically where it was last week. The Government seem determined to adhere to Mr. McKenna's statement of their intentions and to lay down only four Dreadnoughts this year; and they pledge themselves to make provision for the immediate construction of four more on April 1st, 1910—but only to make such provision if, in their judgment, the building programme of Germany makes it necessary. It seems, therefore, that the Government will face the Vote of Censure to be proposed by Mr. Balfour on the day which the Prime Minister has fixed—Monday next. It seems to us exceedingly regrettable that this Vote of Censure on the Naval policy of the country should become necessary. The Navy has hitherto stood above party politics. It has been the one article of faith to which all parties adhered that the British Navy should be supreme, and it was only a few months ago that Mr. Asquith gave the most solemn assurances that the Navy should be kept at the two-Power standard with a margin of 10 per cent. in our favour. But on his own showing, following the statement of the First Lord, that standard cannot possibly be maintained two years longer on the building programme now proposed and now being carried out. Not only cannot a two-Power standard be maintained, but we are steering very close to bare rivalry with Germany in what we now are taught to regard as Standard ships. It is without doubt unreasonable to rule out of consideration our forty battleships of pre-Dreadnought days. Such ships as the Lord Nelson, King Edward and Formidable will have to be reckoned with by any enemy's fleet—though it be a fleet of Dreadnoughts—which may attack us. But Mr. McKenna acknowledges that the lives of our earlier ironclads are shortening, and we do not wish our sailors to fight for us except on the most perfect engines of war. The year 1912 seems to be the danger-point. Admiral Tirpitz, in the Reichsrath, declares that Germany will have only thirteen Dreadnoughts ready then. Mr. McKenna had asserted, on the 16th instant, that she might have seventeen, and on the present programme might be ahead of us. Against this possibility powers are to be taken for the preparation to begin four more Dreadnoughts on April 1st, 1910. Now England must be supreme in other seas besides the North Sea. She must be able to hold her own in the Mediterranean, where Austria (Germany's close ally) will soon have afloat six Dreadnoughts; in the Atlantic, where the American fleet is fast attaining great strength; in the China Sea and Pacific, where our ally, Japan's Navy, is growing steadily in power and efficiency. Mr. Asquith's pledge was to maintain our standard against any two Powers, however friendly, however strong. The feeling of the Empire that the proposed building programme is insufficient is finding very strong expression wherever the flag flies, and has reached its culminating point in the splendid offer of New Zealand to "bear the cost of the immediate building and arming by the British Government of one first-class battleship of the latest type, and if subsequent events show it to be necessary to bear the cost of a second warship of the same type." The Government have replied not ungraciously, but decline in effect the whole gist of the offer, which is to provide for the immediate building of New Zealand's gift ship. Lord Crewe has replied that "provision and powers for which sanction has been asked in the Naval Estimates now before Parliament afford ample security," and then he accepts the offer conditionally: "In view of the uncertainty that exists as to the character and extent of the demands which may be made on the National resources." Under these circumstances we must support Mr. Balfour in his determination to dissociate himself and the Unionist party from the responsibility which the Government are taking in imperilling the Naval position of the country—even at the cost of a Vote of Censure. There is another question which will probably also be pressed home against the Government—the insufficiency of the personnel of the Navy. New ships of all kinds are being commissioned and laid down, but no increase is being made to the numbers of our seamen. A sailor begins his education, happily, in our Navy very young and it takes from three to five years to make an able-bodied seaman. An increase of ships should mean a certain increase of Warrant Officers and men—not proportional, of course, because some of the older vessels will go to the scrap-heap. And we fear we must shift the chief responsibility for this neglect to other shoulders than those of the Minister responsible to Parliament. The Sea Lords are the expert advisers of the First Lord, but we can bring the charge still closer home. Since 1905 the First Sea Lord is himself charged with practically every detail which ensures the efficiency of our fleets. Sir John Fisher is said to have initiated the placing of these vast responsibilities on the First Sea Lord's shoulders, and he alone has yet borne them. We cannot congratulate the country on the experiment. During Sir John Fisher's tenure of office there has happened a very wild relegation to the scrap-heap of many ships that were still of use; (2) the system of nucleus crews; (3) shortening the service of our seamen with a view to creating a small reserve; and (4) the vast reductions of our unrivalled corps of Royal Marines. The envy of all nations has been our long service Navy—and a Navy chiefly recruited from our coast population. But to maintain the numbers we require we must look far ahead of present needs, and that should be the First Sea Lord's special pre-occupation. The French have their "inscription Maritime" and have a vast reserve of seamen on their coasts. The Germans, with universal service, draw their seamen from all over the empire, but, as in the case with France, the evil of short service produces compensation in a large reserve. Our reserve is very small, and Mr. Arnold-Forster, in the book that was published the day before he died, rightly deplored the neglect of any organisation to use our fishermen and merchant sailors for the defence of our coasts.

Was Sir John Fisher wise to close his speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet, sixteen months ago, with these words:

"I turn to all of you and I turn to my countrymen, and I say: sleep quiet in your beds and do not be disturbed by these bogies of invasion and otherwise which are being periodically resuscitated by all sorts of Leagues?"

Has he helped enough to make them true?

REVISION OF THE PRAYER BOOK—II.

In our former article we considered the addition proposed to be made to the Preface of the Book of Common Prayer as a serious danger to the peace of the Church, and a manifest infringement of the liberty of Churchmen.

We shall now examine three great changes of far-reaching importance which are manifestly not "loyal to that ancient order" of which the Archbishop of Canterbury professed himself to be so conservative. They are these:

1. Alteration of the Rubric before the Athanasian Creed.
2. The alternative Form of Absolution in the office for the Visitation of the Sick.
3. The omission of one of the questions to candidates for Deacon's orders.

It is proposed that the reading of the Athanasian Creed is to be optional at the discretion of the minister, the new Rubric reading "may" instead of "shall be sung or said instead of the Apostles' Creed, the Confession of our Faith." We desire to avoid as far as possible the strictly theological aspect of the Creed, as being outside our present scope.

The danger lies first in the repudiation by the English Branch of the Church Catholic of the ancient authoritative declaration of Faith, and, secondly (as a minority of the committee point out), in leaving to the discretion of the minister "the decision" in "so grave a matter," instead of allowing it to "rest on the authority of the Church."

The American Church omitted the Athanasian Creed in 1786. What is known as the great outbreak of Unitarianism occurred in 1815. The Church of Ireland, in 1877, discarded the Rubric before the Athanasian Creed, and seriously weakened her natural union with the sister Church of England. It is laid down in the 34th Article that "every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish, ceremonies or rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority," but such authority clearly does not extend to tampering with the Catholic Creeds or Doctrines of the Church. Such interference or rejection of Catholic authority is the source of all dissent, and the breaking up of Catholic Unity. That so far-reaching a change should be in the hands of a small close committee, or even proposed by them, is a menace to the Catholic position of the Church of England. It would be just as intelligible to place an optional Rubric before the Nicene Creed. Yet that would mean an absolute and final break with the rest of Catholic Christendom. Dr. Rashdall, in "Anglican Modernism," in effect wishes that that should be done. With modernists the Nicene creed is, equally with the Athanasian, "a discredited formulary," as Dean Stanley contemptuously said. To discredit such formularies is the way to lasting schism, as is shown by the history of the Church. We are not here specially concerned with the so-called minatory clauses, which are often all simply charitable warnings against the dangers of unbelief. Though we are fain to observe that, if you grant the existence of God, it is illogical to suppose that beings who wilfully reject Him could continue to possess God, which is what we understand by heaven and salvation.

The fact is that a Pro-British Heaven has too long been regarded as the exclusive possession of Englishmen, but the growth of Imperialism makes it all the more important that the Church of England must emphasise, not disagreement, but substantial and visible agreement with both Eastern and Western Catholicism, and thus maintain "loyalty to ancient order."

Before leaving the matter we should point out that this optional use of the Athanasian Creed would be certain to lead to that friction between bishop, priest, and people of which we spoke in our former article; especially in cases where one or two influential laymen protested vigorously against the public recitation.

The provision of an alternative form of Absolution in the Visitation of the Sick might seem to some a light matter. But what is its real significance? In the first place, it should be remembered that our Prayer Book is the Prayer Book of 1661, when the Anglican Church deliberately repudiated the Protestantism of the Puritan Revolution, and took its stand in loyalty to ancient Catholic order. And if we go back to 1552, when foreign sectaries from Geneva were doing all they could to destroy every vestige of our Catholic heritage, the Church deliberately retained in our Prayer Book her witness to the Priest's authority in words which admit of no compromising misinterpretation:

"I absolve thee from all thy sins."

But to-day, in this alternative form, a way out is to be found for weak-minded bishops and priests, together with all who reject the ancient faith of the Church, that our Lord did leave power to His Church. If this alternative were adopted future generations would be able to point to the beginning of the twentieth century as the time when the Church of England began to disbelieve in Christ's authority as committed to His Church, and began to be openly disloyal to ancient Catholic usage, custom, and order.

In the face of this suggested alternative it must be supposed that certain bishops do disbelieve, though it might seem incredible that any man could accept the office of a bishop, and then be guilty of the cynical profanity of ordaining priests, to whom he with the utmost solemnity commits the power to absolve, in express words, at the very moment calling it the power of the Holy Ghost.

The Church of Ireland, in its revised Prayer Book, made no change in the Form and Manner of Ordering of Priests, we believe for the practical (if not worldly) reason that any alteration in the Ordinal would have at once created difficulties and placed obstacles in the way of priests in Irish orders obtaining preferment in the Church of England. But it is on record in the Preface that such change was desired by some, and also that the Absolution in the office for the Visitation of the Sick has been a cause of offence to many. Very probably. All that is sacramental in our Prayer Book is a cause of offence to many—viz., to the whole body of Dissent in England. That appears to us the strongest of reason for not altering any, even the smallest, portion, let alone matters that are vital.

What business of Dissenters is the teaching of our Prayer Book? We hold the Catholic Faith, and do not desire either ratepayers' or Parliamentary religion.

The third main alteration is the alteration of the question to candidates for the Diaconate:

"Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments?" for which is substituted:

"Are you persuaded that the Holy Scriptures contain sufficiently all doctrine required of necessity for eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ?"

This change might appear harmless, and perhaps not unreasonable.

But read in the light of the views of certain modernists it assumes a most serious aspect. We have been told in a recent volume of essays by a certain school of Anglican modernist clergy that there are many who regard such doctrines as the Virgin Birth of our Lord and His bodily Resurrection as not essential to Christianity. The same men issued a circular for signature stating their conviction that "it is not without grave responsibility and peril that any of us should build the faith of souls primarily upon details of New Testament narrative."

In short, their manifest aim is to find a way into Holy Orders for men who are simply Deists or Unitarians.

This alteration makes that way much simpler, and must, therefore, be regarded as a grave departure from the ancient Catholic Faith of the Church.

It is not a question, as might be supposed, of belief in the literal, verbal interpretation of the Scriptures, but of faith in the cardinal doctrines of Christianity.

Such vital alterations as these we consider would impair the Catholic position of the Anglican Branch of the Church in Christendom. They are, moreover, distinctly contrary to the position of the Reformation Settlement.

REVIEWS QUILTERISMS

Opinions on Men, Women and Things. By HARRY QUILTER. (Swan, Sonnenschein and Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

THE publication of a controversial work after the demise of its author leaves the reviewer at something of a disadvantage. It assures him of an easy and, indeed, contemptible triumph. He is free to write what he will, and his assertions will never be challenged. In such a case silence were perhaps the better policy. De mortuis nil nisi bonum is an excellent motto. As, however, it was persistently disregarded by the author of this volume, one may be permitted to criticise without incurring the charge of having violated the canons of either good taste or literary etiquette.

The stray papers collected within the covers of this volume have for the most part a merely retrospective interest. The late Mr. Quilter was a man who, in his day and generation, made no little stir. The echoes of that controversy are now silent, however, and posterity, intent on other matters, has passed him by. One excellent quality he must be admitted to have possessed. Like Browning—though here, indeed, the likeness ends—he was "ever a fighter," nor should the fact that he invariably espoused the wrong cause blind us to the recognition of his splendid and spirited pugnacity. To this must be added a certain, though not considerable, talent for English composition. He had sat for some years at the feet of Ruskin, from whom he may possibly have learned the art of sentence-weaving, but from whom he most assuredly did not learn that vice of the split infinitive to which he was incurably addicted. As the result of much sedulous study and patient practice—his industry has never been called in question—Mr. Quilter contrived to master the chief secret of success in journalism, which is the concealment of the commonplace. His truisms have almost the air of epigrams, and though the platitude lurks behind all these ponderous aphorisms, it is not always immediately apparent. As an art critic he was frequently in hot water, and though few took him seriously, still fewer could resist the pleasure of crossing swords with him. Among his antagonists was Whistler, who forms the subject of one of the most piquant papers in this volume. The two men were naturally antipathetic, Whistler—with all his defects and limitations—being undeniably dowered with genius. They met on two occasions only, on the second of which Quilter contrived to score off his opponent. But to score off Whistler was a dangerous thing to do, and when a little later Mr. Quilter purchased the house in Tite Street which Whistler had built for himself and failed to maintain, when, too, he proceeded to make certain structural alterations—as, e.g., the addition of a bath-room—the artist may be excused if he experienced a vague feeling of annoyance. In a letter to the World, which, despite its length, we cannot resist the pleasure of quoting in extenso, he let himself go:

O Atlas! What of the "Society for the Preservation of Beautiful Buildings"?

Where is Ruskin? and what do Morris and Sir William Drake?

For behold! beside the Thames the work of desecration continues, and the "White House" swarms with the mason of contract.

The architectural gable that was the joy of the few and the bezadement of "the Board" crumbles beneath the pick (as did the north side of St. Mark's), and History is wiped from the face of Chelsea.

Shall no one interfere? Shall the interloper, even after his death, prevail?

Shall 'Arry, whom I have hewn down, still live among us by outrage of this kind, and impose his memory upon our pavement by the public perpetration of his posthumous Philistinism?

Shall the birthplace of Art become the tomb of its parasite in Tite Street?

See to it, Atlas! lest, when Time, the healer of all the wounds I have inflicted, shall for me have exacted those honours the prophet may not expect while alive, and the inevitable blue disc embedded in the walls shall proclaim that "Here once dwelt" the gentle master of all that is flippant and fine in Art, some anxious student, reading, fall out with Providence in his vain effort to reconcile such joyous reputation with the dank and hopeless appearance of this "model lodging" bequeathed to the people by the arrogance of " 'Arry."

J. McNEILL WHISTLER.

It says something for " 'Arry's " appreciation of the caustic in controversy that he was willing to preserve this epistolatory gem.

Mr. Quilter's incursions into the region of literary criticism were even more unfortunate than his lucubrations on art in the pages of the Spectator. The fatuous absurdity of such a paper as that entitled "The Gospel of Intensity" is surely without a parallel. Such a tilting at windmills has never been seen since the days of Don Quixote. Mr. Quilter sets out valiantly to destroy the "decadents," those authors and artists, that is, who believe that a due regard for technique is an indispensable requirement in the production of a work of beauty. Will it be believed that he groups together, as exponents of the same movement, such names as George Egerton, Oscar Wilde, Arthur Machen, Arthur Morrison, Grant Allen, Aubrey Beardsley, Phil May, Dudley Hardy, and the irreproachable Mr. Townsend, of Punch? Stupidity has here reached its limit. After this no one need feel surprised at learning that Mr. Quilter regarded the late Sir Lewis Morris (of Caermarthen) as a great poet.

In the concluding paper of this volume Mr. Quilter tells the story of the Universal Review, an ill-fated venture which he embarked upon about twenty years ago. Mr. Quilter assigns a variety of reasons for the non-success of this periodical, but the real one we suspect to be this, that the Universal Review was not a paper of universal interest. A glance at the contents page of the first number fortifies us in this impression. It was scarcely possible—nor was it, perhaps, desirable—that a review which opens with a "proem" by Sir Lewis Morris should inspire much confidence in the world of letters. At all events, fail the Universal Review did, despite the pontifical benediction of Mr. Edmund Yates.

The paper, however, is not without interest as revealing Mr. Quilter's opinion of advertising as a profession. The writer of this review is not in a position either to endorse or confute Mr. Quilter's statements, having never been brought into personal contact with an advertising agent. But the following passage may be quoted for the benefit of any such, should he in a moment of idleness be tempted to glance at these pages:

Advertising is nothing more nor less than a gigantic game of brag, in which the most fluent and most unblushing liar has the best chance. The whole foundation of the business is falsehood, and so entirely is this the case that it is, as I was told, and quickly learned, impossible to make anyone connected with advertising, either agent or principal, believe a simple statement of fact. As various commissions are deducted from each order according to the manner in which it is obtained, length it has to run, and the agent who supplies it, so every advertiser discounts the representations made to him on behalf of this or that advertising medium. If you want to be believed as having, say, a circulation of 10,000, you must state that you have one of 20,000, or you will be thought to have one of 5,000, and so on throughout.

One rises from the perusal of this volume with a sense of amazing futility. Gifted with no mean mental endowments, Mr. Quilter failed to fulfil the promise of his early manhood. He might have been a writer of distinction and charm—there are indications of such a destiny in the paper called "Cœlebs Abroad," which is certainly the most readable contribution to the volume. He preferred, however, to devote his life to the placid pursuit of the obvious, to a series of futile controversies, and to misunderstanding his contemporaries. The word "Philistine" was frequently on his lips, always to the accompaniment of a well-bred sneer. But, indeed, he himself was among those who dwell in Meshech without constraint, and whose habitations are to be found in Gath and in the streets of Askelon.

THE PANAMA CANAL

The Panama Canal and its Makers. By VAUGHAN CORNISH, D.Sc., F.R.G.S., F.G.S. (Unwin, 5s.)

ALMOST every reasonable being must have contemplated, at one time or another, the tremendous outline of the two Americas spreading their lazy, curious length across the map, and wondered at the sheer geographical and geological ill-luck which permitted three thousand miles of width to dwindle tantalisingly to a neck of land thirty-six miles in span and then to spread again into another continent, without the narrowest sea-passage between. It is so insignificant a distance, apparently; a mere day's tramp—presuming the existence of a moderately good path; a morning's bicycle ride; a run of three-quarters of an hour, given any tolerable railway facilities; yet sufficient to baffle the ocean-traffic of the world and send it thrashing down the Atlantic on its interminable way through the Magellan Straits, and up the great Pacific, before Occident and Orient can meet. Nature seemed to have concentrated her adverse forces at this one spot for the express purpose of denying man his urgent desire of uniting the two seas; to the difficult contour of her lands she added the dread yellow fever and the insidious malaria, until it was small wonder that the solution of the problem was delayed and almost abandoned. But of the magnificent struggle and ultimate victory over her unkindly moods Dr. Cornish tells in this fascinating book, and when in the year 1915—the date anticipated for the opening of the Panama Canal—the first vessel has floated securely across that extraordinary Isthmus, the project and the event will take a place in history due as much to those who battled with fever and death as to the skill of those who actually cut through the hills and left their more enduring record on the face of the earth itself.

Of the story of the great Canal most persons have a vague idea. From south to north the early explorers sought for a channel which should pierce the continent and give them the key to the East Indies: sought even as far north as the Gulf of the St. Lawrence River, which, not unnaturally, they imagined to be the end of their quest. In 1520, however, it became certain that the Magellan Straits were the only means of access by ship from sea to sea, and in the seventeenth century the idea of an isthmian artificial channel was considered feasible. Not before the middle of the nineteenth century, though, did that idea begin to assume a practical shape, and then the Nicaraguan route was supposed to be the better. The completion of the railway, however, from Panama to Colon, to cope with the rush of gold-seekers to California, determined De Lesseps, flushed with his triumph at Suez, to sever the barrier between these two ports, and the congress at Paris, in the year 1879, resulted in the formation of the "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Inter-oceanique de Panama." The later career of that unfortunate and extravagant company will be within the memory of many readers. Following upon its liquidation in 1889 came various negotiations and agreements, international and local, and the works were at last taken over by the United States in 1904. After much discussion as to the advisability of a tide-level cutting or a high-level canal with locks, the scheme of the latter was adopted, and the undertaking is now in full progress. The details, reasons, etc., which led to notable decisions are clearly set forth by the author in his preliminary chapters.

To most readers, however, the chief interest of the book will lie in the account of the actual work, the description of the men of different nationalities who are employed thereon, and the tale of the fight with disease. The whole affair is a fine romance of science and engineering. Dr. Cornish is an enthusiast, as the following sentences will show; referring to the Culebra Cut—the one piece of rock-obstacle with which the labourers have to deal—he says:

The sight never palls, and is one of the wonders of the world. The Pyramids are another wonder of the world which in common with many thousands in all ages I have thought it worth going to see, but to go to Culebra is as if one were privileged to watch the building of the Pyramids. Yet how few go to the Isthmus on purpose to see these things, and, mirabile dictu, how few Americans! How is it that this people, so enthusiastic in all that relates to national achievement and addicted to foreign travel, does not include the Isthmus among its many recognised places of pilgrimage? Of the many Americans whom I met on the Zone there was scarcely one who had come voluntarily for pleasure. The hotel accommodation, it is true, is limited, but it is more than sufficient for present needs, and is good, as hotels in the tropics are reckoned. Moreover, Panama is now one of the healthiest places in the Equatorial Zone. English tourists going out to the West Indies by the Royal Mail are generally able to cross the Isthmus and see something of the work while their ship is unloading at Colon; but I would venture to suggest, to such of these who care to follow the world's progress, that they should make arrangements beforehand to step off at Colon, cross to Panama, put up there, visit thence the canal works at various points, and proceed by their next ship. The West Indian tourist season coincides with the dry season on the Isthmus. At Panama the mosquito is almost an extinct animal, and though the heat there is sometimes trying, a run up to Culebra brings one to a dry and bracing atmosphere where a fresh breeze is almost always blowing.

The total number of men actually on the roll of the Isthmus is over 30,000, of which about 5,000 are Europeans; these figures include the railway, which is being re-located. At various times troubles have arisen with regard to labour, as is only natural when the problem of dealing with such a mixed quantity was complicated by fear of fever: the wheels now run smoothly, however, and the deadly "yellow jack" is practically exterminated, thanks to the indefatigable and scientific attacks of the two thousand members of the sanitary staff on the mosquito pests which conveyed the infection. The kindred but less fatal scourge of malaria has also been effectively hindered. Buildings screened by fine wire mesh accomplished much in protecting the men while the destruction of larvæ and the draining of swampy ground were proceeded with; in fact, the Commission found that without these precautionary measures the Canal would never be finished, so greatly was the morale of the force endangered by fear.

A most interesting chapter summarises the general shortening of sea-routes which will come into operation when the Canal is open. From it we may select a few paragraphs which will indicate the far-reaching results to be anticipated:

Taking New York as our port of reckoning on the Atlantic, the distance thence to Panama and all ports north thereof on the Pacific seaboard of Central and North America will be reduced by 8,415 miles.

The actual shortening to Iquique, the nitrate port in Chile, is 5,200 miles. We shall not be far out in saying briefly that the distance between New York and South American Pacific ports will be shortened by an average of 5,000 miles.

The Canal shortens the distance between the Pacific coast of the Americas and the ports of Europe also, though in a lesser degree. Thus, taking Liverpool as our example (and the reductions are much the same for London, Antwerp, or Hamburg), the Canal will shorten the distance to Panama and all ports on the coast to the north by a constant quantity, viz., 6,046 miles.

The opening of the Panama route leaves unchanged the relative distances to the Atlantic coast of South America, to Africa, and to Asiatic ports south of Shanghai, but it is New York and not Liverpool which is now the nearer port to Yokohama, Sydney and Melbourne, and Wellington, New Zealand, formerly nearly equi-distant, is placed 2,739 miles nearer to New York than to Liverpool. With reference to Northern China, however, it is to be noted that although the Panama route shortens the distance between New York and Shanghai by 1,629 miles, Liverpool will still be the nearer to Shanghai by 295 miles, assuming the New York vessel to call at San Francisco.

What the total cost of the Canal will be is not precisely known yet, but it was stated in evidence given in January, 1908, that probably a sum of 250,000,000 dollars might cover it, while it was possible that 500,000,000 would have to be expended; even the former figure exceeds by 45,000,000 dollars the combined cost of the Suez, Manchester, and Kiel canals, so it will form no inconsiderable item in national accounts.

We have nothing but praise for Dr. Cornish's remarkably interesting and impartial book, and the excellent large-scale map at the end of the volume greatly increases its value; indeed, without it the first few chapters would convey little meaning. Photographs are freely interspersed, and the author is to be congratulated heartily on his style and on the clarity with which he has treated a subject that in the hands of a less able man might conceivably have been a mere uninspiring collection of facts and figures.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Canon's Dilemma. By VICTOR L. WHITECHURCH. (Unwin, 6s.)

For the short story par excellence we do not turn to the magazines, as a rule, unless we are so unfortunate as to find ourselves immured pro tem. in a railway carriage, with our particular pocket edition far away. The set of sketchy stories collected and published in this book is of the usual light and "entertaining" type calculated to please the editors—no, we will be charitable and say the readers—of the various monthly marvels, the covers of which produce such a chaos of colour at innumerable bookstalls. There is nothing to be said against those here noticed; they are all harmless, most of them bring at least a smile, and two or three of them are really good. "The Sale of the Morning Star" we are inclined to select as the best of the bunch; it relates in capital style how an old tramp-steamer was advertised for disposal by auction, the sale to take place on board, and how the captain and owner, having his victims, auctioneer and prospective bidders, safely in his clutches, started the Morning Star ostensibly on a trip round the harbour to show off her paces, and headed her in reality for the open channel, where the auction was conducted amid serious digestive disturbances on the part of the "passengers." None of the other stories approaches this one for humour, but each is clever and bright, which is more than can be said about many collections of this description.

Teresa. By EDITH AYRTON ZANGWILL. (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)

"TERESA must have her visions." These words, spoken by one of the characters, supply the motive of this remarkable novel, which should add materially to Mrs. Zangwill's reputation as a writer of fiction. "Teresa," though in one sense it may be described as a love-story, does not move along conventional lines. It is a study in the conflict between two temperaments. The heroine, a young and ardent girl, but just escaped from the bondage of school life, meets a man many years her senior. The man, who has had many "experiences," is attracted by the freshness and innocence of the girl. It has at least the charm of novelty. He proposes marriage. Teresa, who has never acted on her own initiative, consults her mother, with the result that she consents to an engagement. Of the real nature of marriage she knows nothing. She finds, however, the prospect entirely "satisfactory"—to use a word of which she is inordinately fond. The result might have been foreseen. Disillusion is quick to follow, and with it comes a certain loosening of the heroine's hold on life, an adjustment of her theories, a revolt against reality. Her husband, to whom the charm of innocence makes but a temporary appeal, quickly seeks, and discovers, satisfaction elsewhere. In the meanwhile Teresa has been accumulating experience, and an event happens which is destined to transform her whole life. Ultimately, though by what means we refrain from revealing, harmony is evolved out of discord, and the birth of a baby to Teresa forges a link between the husband and wife. The story is powerfully and convincingly told, and the author has indicated, in a subtle manner, the shattering force of moral purity.

